LETTER FROM DAMASCUS.

Arrival at Damascus—Scene of St. Paul's Conversion—Last Feast of Ramadan—Mosque of Ommiades—Dwellings—Ladies of Damascus—American Mission and Schools at Damascus.

THE EVENING we arrived at this ancient, oriental city, after riding all the morning through a valley excessively warm and tedious, although Mount Hermon was on our right all the way, with its summits wreathed with snow. The soil appeared fertile as we advanced towards the city. Its domes and minarets are seen, embosomed amidst groves of ever-green beauty. Vineyards, and orchards of apricots, almonds, figs, with a variety of other fruits and nuts, abound in rich luxuriance.

The surface of the earth surrounding the mountains is a perfect level, watered by many streams. Two rugged looking hills open a gorge, through which the river Abana (supposed to be Scriptural, the ancient Ahanu) flows, making the valley which surrounds the city a perfect garden.

The thoughts which interested us the most, as we drew near Damascus, was the conversion of St. Paul, where the glory and display of sublime power was so Divinely manifested, in a light above the brightness of Heaven at mid-day; under the weight and splendor of which he fell to the ground, hearing the voice of Jesus speaking to him saying—Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? By this event, which transpired 1800 years ago, which has enriched the whole Cristian world with its divine results, forms the chief attraction to Damascus, and invests it with the most thrilling interest; casting in the back ground, by its immortal radiance, the glory and splendor of the present world, by communications of that fadeless glory which lies beyond the grave. Who could look upon such a place, with these hallowed recollections, and not feel a secret emotions heart-stirring within them? That heart which feels indifferent, must be insensible to all that God has done for the salvation of the world.

This is truly an ancient, oriental city—existing in the days of Absolom. Its rivers peculiarly interest, from reference to them by Naaman, captain of the host of the King of Syria, in reply to the messenger sent by Elisha to bathe in the Jordan seven times, for the cure of leprosy—"Are not Abana and Parphar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?" Beautiful indeed are these rivers which so fertilize this valley, making a paradise of earth.

There are no ruins except a wall, which has the appearance and is said to be of high antiquity. A place is shown, from a house upon it—as in St. Paul's time, with windows towards the country—which, tradition says, he was let down, and escaped from the Jews who sought to slay him.

We visited the house of Ananias, reputed to be the one at which St. Paul stayed after his miraculous conversion. We went down several steps into vaulted chambers, with artificial lights, where we saw rooms fitted-up like a chapel—an altar, and a picture of the Virgin Mary and the child Jesus.

At the termination of the street straight outside the eastern gate, they fix the site of the miraculous conversion—though the place is occasionally changed.

We reached Damascus at the feast of Ramadan, or fast and feast, for the Mohammedans fast all day and feast all night—they neither eat, drink coffee nor smoke, during the day; but at night they enjoy all of them. There were multitudes collected in the Mohammedan part of the city, which was lighted with thousands of variegated colors. From a coffee-house, a pyramid of lamps threw their rays around with considerable effect. They were suspended also in different forms, in fanciful figures, illuminating every place contiguous—where tables and stalls were filled with fruits, candies and sweetmeats, for the feast. In the temple, a stand was erected and lighted by lamps, where priests or official characters sat, elevated above the rest. One of them had an instrument which he beat which produced indifferent sounds, and appeared to interest all the listeners but ourselves. They seem to have no ear for sweet sounds.

We passed out into a garden or open court, where the river Baruda passed along, a beautiful and most lovely stream; upon the opposite bank, trees flourished in beauty—for the streams of this river produce a vegetation perfectly astonishing—creating an earthly paradise in the environs of this city, filled with sweet odors of fruits and flowers. We left this feast of the lanterns, where the Turks were sitting quietly around, smoking the chiboque and narghile in the full enjoyment of their pipes, drinking coffee and feasting, to make up for the privations of the day—interesting to us only for its novelty.

In the morning, we went to see the great mosque of the Ommiades, said to have been a Christian church dedicated to St. John before the Mohammedan conquest. It is of immense size, with large dome and towering minarets, rising above all others; we had an opportunity of looking down into it; by ascending the terraced roof of the adjoining house, by means of broken panes of glass. We had a fair view. It had more the appearance of a church than a mosque. There were near 2000 Turks collected upon the floor as worshippers. A woman, standing upon another house near us, was indignant at our presumption in looking upon that holy company at prayer. She was scolding us at a great rate; her violent gesticulations and vehement manner betrayed her feelings. Our guide understood her Arabic; he said she was angry.

From this place we went into the bazars, and entered a workshop of gold and precious stones. Ornaments of all kinds were wrought in this place—enormous ear-rings, brooches set with diamonds, snuff-boxes set with pearls and diamonds were perfectly dazzling. A great number were employed in these shops. The bazars are said to be superior to those of Cairo; they are more thoroughly oriental, having nothing European about them. But they were not full of fanciful goods at this time. The damask silk, flowered with gold, for table-covers and divans, were beautiful. But, for wearing apparel, their silks were not equal to European.

When the pilgrims return from Mecca the bazars are said to be replenished. In these public resorts, all the Eastern characteristics are represented, in their different costume—Turks, Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, Egyptians, Persians, Shieks of the nomadic tribe, hostile-looking Bedouins with cloak of camel-hair and shawl tied round the head with camel-hair rope, a leather belt round his waist, carrying his lance with an air of defiance through the city.

A Greek stayed at our hotel, he wore embroidered crimson leggings and tunic, with sleeves of the same, elegantly embroidered, and short white kilt, in folds so thick, that it stood almost in a circle, just below the waist; the shawl was worn about his waist, upon his head the fez, embroidered with gold, with a tassel on one side; his costume was very picturesque. The Albanians dress somewhat in this style. Every tribe in the East is distinguished by their costume.

Some of the houses in Damascus are very beautiful, although the entrance to them are quite the reverse. We visited several distinguished for their elegance; the style of building is similar—an open court in the centre, paved with mosaic in colored marble, with different designs. Orange trees grow alongside the walls, and in the centre is a marble fountain—all the rooms enter into this court. The parlor of the second one was superior to all in the richness of its furniture: the floor paved with mosaic, and a fountain in a corner of the room, the upper part reached by one high step—all of them are built in this style. The divans were of blue satin embroidered with gold, the cushions also; the ceilings are high, ornamented with mirrors, star-shaped, with gilded borders; the walls, upon the back-ground, are set with mirrors, covered with a filigree of gilt in various forms, as if looking at mirrors through a net-work of gold. Each room had different furniture and colors, even to the smoking-room. The Jew's house was new and more brilliant, but not more splendid—built much like the others, with a few exceptions.

The ladies of all these houses received us kindly; were richly, but slovenly dressed, and with all the gold and diamonds glittering about them, an American lady in a simple muslin dress looks vastly better—some of them were pretty, but had that indolent languishing expression, which looks better in painting than life. The eyes of the Jewesses were deeply tinged with khol, dark touches in the corner of the eye, and eye-brows arched with a pencil, giving them a peculiar look; we saw the little children with eyes stained in this manner, which destroys, instead of heightening the beauty of childhood. The ladies walk upon wooden stilts, which lifts the foot a quarter of a yard from the ground, they do very well in muddy streets, but upon their mosaic floors clattering about, they appear very awkward. The entire absense of intellectual cultivation, soon renders the beauty of these Eastern ladies insipid; they appear to have no employment but smoking.

The hotel at which we stay is as splendid as any dwelling in Damascus, although the approach to it is through a mean alley, it opens into a large court paved with marble-mosaic, very beautiful in design, with a lovely fountain of colored marble in the centre, of cool refreshing water always flowing.

Around the walls of this wide court, open to the fresh air, are orange, citron and lemon trees, with flowering shrubs—among them the damask rose, so highly fanted, in full bloom, but we have seen roses of equal beauty in Louisiana, but they are indiginous here.

A large lemon tree, shading my window at the second story, is still full of fruit and flowers filling the atmosphere with their rich perfume. Citrons dropping from the branches of the tall trees opposite upon the marble pavement, bursting with ripeness.

The parlor is magnificent—the floor inlaid with colored morble, a fountain in the centre of the lower floor, the upper part ascended by a step, and divided only by an arch with gilded cornice on a ground of blue, the floor is surrounded by divans—its walls, fifteen feet high, with double rows of gilded cornice, set with mirrors ornamented with gilded filagree work, like those above described; blue ceiling with gilt border; arches in the walls on the lower floor, elaborately ornamented; a splendid glass chandelier was suspended over the fountain, ornamented at the top with small mirrors set in gilt for reflection; and light muslin curtains.

Another room, occupied by an Austrian Prince, is equal in beauty and splendor: but there are striking contrasts in these oriental palaces—some shades to these brilliant lights.

Many of the streets and houses are mean, the walls falling down. We rode to a very remarkable tree, standing in one of the streets called the plane tree, with a trunk thirty feet in circumference—it had the appearance of great age. The sacred street, through which the pilgrims pass, is the widest—a place where they stop to rest, going to Mecca.

The environs of Damascus constitute its beauty; for miles around, it is one perfect garden. The "Abana and Parphar" enrich it with their waters, and the valley teems with a luxuriance unsurpassed in any country. The streams are conveyed along in every direction, either turned in their course by art or naturally pursuing their way to enrich the soil; such luxuriant grounds, fruit trees, and walks amidst them, of oriental beauty, are seen only around Damascus; and so extensive, that they in reality make an earthly paradise, fragrant with the rose which breathes its perfume upon the air, and the orange, whose blossom sends forth its unrivalled fragrance. These sylvan scenes contrasted, with the bold rugged cliffs which crown the barren mountains which surround them, heightens by contrast the beauty and freshness of the landscape so exquisitely lovely. The snow-clad summits of Hermon rise in the distance above these fascinating gardens, groves, and valleys of oriental beauty, with its bleak hills and rocky eminences, showing in relief by the back-ground of the picture, a coloring so unique, of a dusty brown or a reddish tinge, upon which a thin fleecy cloud is always resting, that it gives light and shade, of a character peculiarly suited to the finish of the picture, uniting the sublime and beautiful, blending in perfect harmony. We did not stay long in this lovely city embosomed in sylvan scenes. We found some persons so charmed with the fascinating environs, as to take a house and stay in it for some time. They certainly surpass all poetical description, and it is impossible by the most brilliant imagination to paint them in colors of fancy too vivid. This city retains its oriental position and customs, with little or no innovation from the European world. Christianity in its simple form of purity, is the only means by which it can be improved and enlightened; and when woman is elevated by its renovating influence, and feels the dignity of her social position, a change will come over the spirit of this Eastern world, and never until then. To dress and decorate her person with silks, gold and diamonds; eat, smoke and sleep, seems, to fill out an existence as unworthy of her undeveloped mind, destined for immortality as the silk worm which spins its thread, lays its eggs, and dies—the latter acts as designed by its creator; the other falls below in degradation of noble faculties spent upon perishable things, when designed to fill the place of angels by throwing around them a hallowed influence upon earth, of moral and intectual power, and in heaven to shine as the stars forever and ever. If the women of my own country knew their superior social position over those of all the countries of Europe, Africa and Asia, they would send forth songs of praise for such high and exholted priviledges—suppress vanity and raise the moral standard of usefulness higher than they now do, by cultivating all that is great, noble, and good, which contributes to the happiness of society, preparatory for that state of existence which lies beyond the tomb.

There is a successful American Missionary Station in Damascus, under the Presbyterian board. We saw the Rev. Mr. Pontes, the talented Irish gentleman at whose house we called; who is in union with this mission, and gave an interesting and encouraging account of their schools. They appear to be in a flourishing condition, with a prospect of much good to the people; but a government so defective as this Ottoman Power, promises nothing for the future but degradation, and a blessing will it be to the people when it falls into the hands of the civilized world to control its destinies. The hatred of the Mohammedan towards the Christians, is proverbial, they do not mind throwing stones at them as they pass some places of their sacred mosques of Holy Worship. A religion of sensuality so suited to the natural turpitude of the heart of man, is not easily abandoned.

The Mohammedans have their books everywhere. They read the Koran in the stalls of the bazars, on the roadside, and in all places—like their prayers, they bow before company, in market-places, upon their boats on the river, in their shops, and all places; the faithful are found at prayers, touching the ground with his head, bowing seven times—nothing divert them from it—they will look at you, and mutter their prayers, and keep on bowing, as mechanical operations which no one can disturb. The course of education is exceedingly limited, confined chiefly to reading the Koran in their schools, and a few other branches.

OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Religion in Scotland—Intemperance—Illegitimacy—Abolitionism—Signs of Good—Lay Preachers—Daily Union Prayer Meeting—Ripeness of Past Centuries being Demolished—Probability of a Gracious Revival.

IN MY LAST I wrote as to the present state and workings of Methodism in Scotland, etc.; and in the present shall proceed to give you some account of the state of religion in that country; with such other items as occasion may bring up in review, while doing so.

To all outward appearance the Scotch people as a whole, are the most religious people in the world. Their attendance on public worship—their strict observance of the Sabbath, their punctual attendance on, and use of all the means of grace; their established integrity in their dealings one with another, and all these done under a deep and abiding awe and reverence for the character and perfections of the Almighty, at once, bespeak the existence of a strong religious principle, that is at the same time both refreshing and commendable. And yet their national statistics, which are kept with great accuracy, exhibit them at the same time, as the most dissipated and licentious people in Christendom. I heard two of their ministers declare the same thing from their pulpits. I am not able to account for it, because every where chastity and sobriety seem to pervade all classes of society. But the annual exhibit of the excise office, detailing the number of gallons of ardent spirits made or manufactured in that part of the United Kingdom; and secondly, the report of another class of officers detailing the number of gallons sold and consumed there, shews an array of figures frightful to look upon. I am quite sure, however, from an observation of thirty years and upwards, that a great change for the better has taken place in the social habits of all grades in society, in this respect; for formerly, in every convival or social company, it would have been an exception to what was considered politeness not to have and use such fiery liquids as were adapted to the taste of the parties; while now, to do so, would be the exception and not the rule. With many opportunities, during a stay of four months, and mixing freely among all classes of people, I had ocular demonstration of this fact. If my memory is not at fault, I was not asked oftener than twice to take wine. Still figures, that can't (it is said) tell lies, show that millions of gallons of ardent spirits and intoxicating drinks are annually consumed by this sober and religious people.

So with their statistics of marriages and births—their registers of such events being almost faultless. The number of illegitimate children born during a year is truly appalling, and their ministers from the pulpits and in their solemn convocations do not in the least mince the matter. Why it should be so with so much outward decorum and propriety every where to be met with, I cannot judge, only surmise; and I am inclined to the opinion that the mixing and association of all ages and sexes of the working classes, so promiscuously together, in factories, collieries and agricultural employments, have to be looked to as the occasion of this great reproach against the whole people. Still, as I have said in the outset, see them in one of their large cities, or in the country, on Sabbath morning near the hour for public worship, men, women and children, in their best (and they dress well) seem all in motion, and with becoming reverence and haste are making for the house of God. Indeed, so dense is the multitude that you are at once impressed with the belief, surely no human being is left at home; and then looking at the solemnity and decorousness of all, you are tempted to exclaim, surely, the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ flourishes and abides here. I fear, however, that much of this outward appearance of truly religious life, arises much more from a habit begotten in the mind by early education, than from the presence in the soul of experimental godliness. Try one of these seeming saints by differing with them a little in doctrine, and he at once almost treats you as a heathen man and a publican. The shade of your doctrinal belief there, is the test and proof of your orthodoxy. I do not say so because such was the rule in my case, for such was the very reverse to your occasional correspondent in his intercourse with the ministers of different denominations there. Indeed so courteous were the ministers of the Free church, the United Presbyterian church and the Congregational church, in their advances to a stranger that, if I had been able, I might have spoken publicly every day in the week, and twice or thrice on Sunday.

The Scotch are terrible abolitionists, more however, I think, from an innate love of liberty belonging to their whole race, than from any enlightened view of the subject or system of slavery. I always let it be known that I belonged to a church that had no religious test as to the existence or non-existence of slavery, in its members or ministers; and many were my conflicts or conversations upon the subject, in consequence. By always keeping in a good humor as to all they said, and by bringing their course in judging of their brother to the test of the Scriptures; and especially, according to the example and rule of Peter and the Apostles in meeting prejudices in another case, (Acts xi 17,) your correspondent is vain enough to believe that he generally left them in some doubt as to their christian charity towards others upon this subject. One evening, in particular, in the social circle of a new friend I made there, the lady of one of the magistrates of the city of Aberdeen had a long conversation with me for the benefit of the company generally, upon the subject of slavery. She concluded by propounding this question: "Is it right for christian people to give money to assist slaves to run away?" I had previously heard that they had such a society there. It is not right I answered, if the example and instruction of an inspired Apostle are worth anything as a rule for christian people to walk by. See Paul's epistle to Philemon, where the Apostle sends back Onesimus, a runaway slave, to his master, begging the master to receive the fugitive for ever, as he would now be profitable as a faithful servant and brother, by reason of his conversion; which he had not been before his flight and conversion. That was the last question and answer I had upon the subject. They did not seem to know or remember before that there was such a letter in the Bible as that of Paul to Philemon.

It would be wrong to say that I did not meet with people who I had every reason to believe had been converted and lived in the exhibition of many of the fruits of the Spirit; and yet I am compelled in candor to say that I had to regard active, living religion among professing christians, as at a very low ebb. But I am very glad in this connection to say that, up to the time of my leaving that country, there were very cheering signs of "a better day a coming," in this respect, also. For two years past various laymen, men of family and property, have been travelling to and fro over Scotland, addressing the people wherever they could be got together, upon the subject of personal salvation: among whom may be mentioned, Mr. Brownlow North, Mr. McDougal Grant of Arndilly, Mr. Gordon of Parkhill and Mr. Peter Drummond of Stirling. The Scotch are very cautious and slow to identify themselves with any new movement, but the labors of these men have not been without their effects, for by the first of last summer they began to evince great interest in the subject dwelt upon by these men, though irregular preachers, by coming out in great crowds to hear them. Their interest was no doubt excited and increased by the good news that they were receiving from across the Atlantic, of the great revival then being experienced in the United States of America; so that up to the first of October it was stated in the papers that thousands, as many as 10,000 in one instance, were in attendance upon the ministry of these lay preachers.

About a week before the Queen's arrival at Aberdeen in September, and during the great cattle and agricultural show of Scotland, in that city; Mr. Gordon and Mr. Peter Drummond with a few others proposed to hold a daily union prayer meeting, similar to that held in New York and elsewhere in the United States. This was at once done by assembling in the lecture room of the Mechanics' Institute, to obviate the objection of denominational prejudices, by meeting in a church for such a purpose; but this place soon became too narrow and they adjourned to the county, or assembly rooms. They met at two o'clock for praise, prayer and reading of the Scriptures. I went there first on the day of the Queen's journey towards Balmoral, and after the meeting was over, was soon by a friend introduced to the ministers and prominent men present. They immediately pressed me to agree to tell the meeting of next day, in a speech of fifteen minutes, what I had seen and knew of the American revival. In fear and trembling I consented to do so. But when two o'clock next day came, they had but one prayer and then insisted upon my occupying the remainder of the hour; and there before a dense crowd of eager listeners, of all denominations—and upon the same floor where thirty years before in common with other foolish college boys we had danced and tried to forget God—your occasional correspondent spoke to quite a different gathering, of the wonderful works of God among the people in another part of the world. You seldom see such hearers as I had on that day; and the chairman, Col. O'Brien of Bath, in the name of the assembly, returned me thanks for the good news which they had that day heard. They made by far too much of that address, for it was reported and published in the papers, British Magazine, etc.

In these union prayer meetings all the denominations, I believe, were daily represented—men of mark and standing from each acting alternately as chairman. This was something new indeed in Scotland; for there, as I have already intimated, it has been true of the denominations, if true anywhere in this day, that the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans. It was no doubt owing to the grace of God, present and abounding in the breaking down of the middle wall of partition erected by the bigotry and denominational prejudices of past centuries; which there and elsewhere have kept the people of God so far apart. They do nothing without a chairman, and they generally have some prominent man in that office. The earl of Kinnaird had conducted a meeting in one of the churches, and the Earl of Kintore had officiated in another. While the day before I left, Lord Haddo, member of Parliament for the county and eldest son of the Earl of Aberdeen, conducted the religious devotions of the worshippers in the union prayer meeting of that day. The lay preaching of the gentlemen already mentioned, and the prominence taken in the union prayer meetings by the nobility and men in the upper walks of life, seem to indicate that the usual progress of the Gospel is about to be inverted there, in beginning at the greatest and extending to the least. They had also established and were vigorously prosecuting a union prayer meeting at night, for the benefit of the working classes. I should have said perhaps in the proper place that besides the assembly rooms above noticed, I was also called upon and urged to repeat the address on the American revival, in six other places in and around the city of Aberdeen. I have considerable hope that their prayers and labor will grow into a gracious work of revival among all the people; which may God grant for Christ's sake, and let all the people say, Amen.

My words have multiplied beyond my expectations, and I have not yet been able to touch upon other topics that I wish to set before your readers, while my paper is nearly out again. I shall resume some part of the subject, with observations by the way, and then close the labors of your Occasional Correspondent. J. M.

THE INSANE ASYLUM OF LOUISIANA.

TEN YEARS since the Legislature of Louisiana established the Insane Asylum at Jackson, Louisiana; and from time to time, the State has appropriated its thousands so liberally, that now the buildings, grounds, and accommodations for patients are such as to reflect honor upon the Commonwealth; and from this munificence great good is now accruing to suffering humanity.

The poor, suffering insane! What should be done with them? What is done with them in Heathen lands? Shall they be permitted to wander, doing themselves and others harm; and suffering from hunger, cold, cruelty and abuse? And shall they finally be permitted to die in misery and want? Or shall they be confined by their friends in garrets or cellars, or in uncomfortable, out-of-the-way buildings alone, to waste their days where confinement and terror are enough to madden even the sane? No, let us bring them to the asylums of Christian civilization, where all is convenient, comfort and cheerfulness. Glorious christendom with her humane institutions! Where do we find temples and palaces for the insane, blind, deaf and dumb, save in the lands where He is known, who when on earth went about doing good and healing all of these diseases? And who, that lives in this land of Bibles or in any other land where the Gospel is known, is not proud, and at the same time humbly thankful that his home is in Christendom? But I must not stay to moralize, as I took my pen only to speak of this particular asylum.

Situation.

It is situated in the town of Jackson, Louisiana, twelve miles east of Bayou Sara, and its beautiful buildings are one of the ornaments of the place. Jackson is also the site of Centenary College, with her splendid new edifice just on the opposite hill over against the asylum. These two magnificent edifices, as they face and seem to greet each other, impress the beholder with the enterprise and benevolence of the Church and the State as they try to educate the young and relieve the distressed. Though Jackson and of course the Asylum, is in Louisiana, yet it is among the pine and magnolia hills, for here the high lands on the west side of the Mississippi river commence, and there are hardly ten acres of swamp within ten miles of the Asylum.

Buildings.

First, there is one great centre building containing parlors, reception rooms, dining rooms, dormitories for pay patients, and a beautiful chapel, all furnished in good taste, and all kept in the best order. In this Dr. Barkdull, the Superintendent, and his family reside. To this building are attached two large wings, with rooms, halls for ventilation, galleries, etc. Most comfortably accommodating a large number of patients. There are also two substantial buildings further from the main one, for the accommodation of the more violent inmates. Other out buildings combine with these to make up the little town for the insane, until this, to the eye, seems to be one of the most comfortable homes on earth; and so it is to many a poor sufferer, for here are fathers, and mothers, and brothers and tender sisters, whose weary feet are worn with the rugged thorny paths of life.

Grounds.

Ample pleasure grounds surround the buildings. The surface is undulating and is shaded by native beech, bay, oak, and pine, and in these cool retreats the patients may walk, talk, sing, shout, dance or pray as their inclinations prompt; and they may be seen at all of these occupations, and many others, at all times of day. Then there are large gardens and large fields affording opportunity for out-door exercise to all who desire it. And here let me say that, good judges think this the best climate in the world for the recovery of the insane, as they can have so much healthy, out-door amusement and employment.

Number of Patients.

There are now 140 patients in the Institution; 80 of them are males, 60 females, 10 of them are free negroes, and 1 is a slave. Of the 140, 25 are pay patients and the rest are state patients, or patients supported by the State. When the buildings are completed many more can be comfortably accommodated.

Labor, Exercise, Worship, Reading, etc.

All the inmates who are accustomed to work or who desire it have opportunity for chopping, hoeing, plowing, gardening, sewing, washing etc. etc., while on the Sabbath all who are able to leave their rooms, are convened in the chapel for worship, in which many engage with seeming delight, while nearly all give good attention and join in the singing with great pleasure.

Government.

The government is mild and parental, yet firm; and Dr. Barkdull, who is both Superintendent and Physician, gives special attention to the sick as each case requires.

No more responsible office, no more humane position is filled by any man in the State, than the one filled by this Christian gentleman. May heaven help him in his mission of mercy to the suffering, the insane.

Do any Recover? Do any Die?

Yes, both; but more recover than die. During the past year 40 have been restored to their right minds and sent home to their friends, while only 26 have died; and, when it is remembered, that many who are sent to the Asylum are sickly as well as insane, this will be seen to be a small mortality.

A few Reflections.

How dreadful to be insane! How dreadful to have the god-like mind dethroned, anarchy and confusion enthroned in its place, and man no more a man to himself or to his race! Heaven make the sane thankful that they are sane, and Heaven save the sane from insanity.

Here are, men and women from nearly all the nations under heaven. Here are men and women whose minds have been ruined by a thousand and one causes. Love, Murder, Money, Avarice, Vice, Religion, and more frequently the want of it; Poverty, Cruelty, Crime, Disease, Bankruptcy, all have their victims here. Here are warnings to those who are yet themselves. There is danger in excess everywhere.

Here are to be seen the wonders of a diseased imagination. One man thinks himself Napoleon, and cumbrous large armies. One thinks himself the Messiah, and has salvation for all his fellows.

Another thinks the government of this nation is upon his shoulders, and tries to support it with the dignity of an emperor. Another thinks herself the Virgin Mary; another the Queen of England, and deports herself like a princess. And thus each seems happy to the pursuit of his own favorite idea, save now and then a maniac who raves as only the really mad-man can, or one who sits in gloom as though hope and happiness were forever fled, and so indeed it may be; but Oh, how the poor sufferer is to be pitied!

The insane have been objects of interest to me. I have visited them often; and my impression is that they suffer almost infinitely less, and enjoy almost infinitely more, than cared for in communities by themselves, than when scattered over the country, and also that more of them are restored than would be without this humane Institution, where they are cared for by the munificence of the State and constant attention of the Superintendent and his twenty assistants. Let all good men pray for the blessing of God on the insane, for who more need it than they, and the blind, and deaf, and dumb—the unfortunate sufferers of our race. And let the sane be thankful for the proper use of their powers of thought, reason, feeling, emotion, and imagination, though they have nothing else on earth. S. S.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

THE action of the late Methodist Protestant Convention, assembled at Springfield, Ohio—"withdrawing all connection and co-operation from the Conferences tolerating slavery and slave-trading"—is thus commented upon by the Methodist Protestant, an organ of that denomination published at Baltimore: "The deed is done. A separation is consummated. The Northern and Western Conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church have, by what must be considered revolutionary action, withdrawn themselves from all official association with their brethren in the Southern states. The full proceedings are not yet before us. We have, however, newspaper authority for the statement that the Rev. George Brown presided, and preached the opening discourse from 2 Cor., v. 14: 'For the love of Christ constraineth us.' Strange text, it would seem, from which to gather courage for an act of severance of ties of brotherly love—a severance as widely divergent from the New Testament teaching (as Dr. Brown has himself, on a former occasion, shown,) as can be conceived. We wonder if Dr. Brown included in that discourse the stern remonstrance against making slavery the basis of a separation, which has been so often uttered by him during the last four years! It would seem not. Whatever phraseology may have been given to the resolutions of withdrawal for the accommodation of Dr. Brown, one thing is certain, the basis of the action is ultra abolitionism, and nothing else.

We have occasion enough here to say sharp things. But we shall not indulge the temptation. It can accomplish no good. Wherefore should we say them now? Wherefore show up the inconsistencies of some who have been prominent in this thing? We have a budget in memory that is strongly illustrative of human weakness. To open it to the world would perhaps give unnecessary pain. We shall hereafter try to bury it with the past, lest our confidence in the professions of good men in the future be too deeply shaken.

The General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, thank God, is not the actor in this dishonor. She remains a unit. Every effort was made by the dissentients to involve her in the act of separation, but with no effect. The result is a secession, voluntary and absolute. No official act of her properly constituted authorities has in any wise sanctioned this procedure.

The separatists contemplate a union with the Wesleyans of the North. This is a body originating in the leadership of Rev. Orange Scott, a lay-delegationist and an ultra anti-slavery man. What the numerical strength of the body is we are not prepared to state; but it is said to be influential in certain Northern localities."

IN HASTE.

We clip from a Southern exchange the following notice, for which we make no change:

"The Discipline, New Edition expurgated, is now to be had at the Charleston Depository. Price 50 cents, with usual discount to wholesale purchasers."

This refers we suppose, to the rule on slavery. The Conferences of the Church, South, have not all held their sessions yet—not even the South Carolina—and yet here is a Discipline expurgated by a two-third vote. The deed is done, and one Church at least has no longer a rebuke for an institution which excites the honest indignation of all Christendom. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, stands alone. If she is right, she has nothing to fear; but if—and the bare possibility is enough to terrify—if she is wrong, how dreadful must be the account of those men who have led her step by step for fourteen years to her present position! [Pittsburg Christian Advocate.

Well, we insert it, also; but make a charge, and that charge is, the Pittsburg Advocate is either badly posted in the history of the Church, or it is not willing to give fair play, and present both sides. The General Conference of 1808, on motion of Bishop Asbury, ordered that one thousand copies of the Discipline, with the section and rule on slavery omitted, should be prepared for the use of the South Carolina Conference.

Now, if the doctrines promulgated at the North on the subject of slavery be true, what a horrible set of pro-slavery men those composing that Conference, with Bishop Asbury at their head, must have been! But they were not pro-slavery men, in any objectionable sense, although Asbury did believe, and said, that emancipation was impracticable, and the Church had better have directed her efforts towards the spiritual than the temporal condition of the slaves. Once or twice since 1808, expurgated editions of the Discipline were circulated in South Carolina. If the Pittsburg editor did not know this, then he is badly posted in the history of the Church; and if he did know it, why then the above looks as though he were not exactly willing the whole truth should be known.

All he says about the Church, South, "standing alone" is mere bother. Where stand the Protestant Episcopal, the Presbyterian, the Baptist, and all other influential Churches in the South? What have they in their Disciplines on this subject? Aye what? [St. Louis Advocate.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

"IT WAS GOOD TO BE THERE."

So I have thought and felt and expressed myself, in reference to the late session of the Mississippi Conference at Woodville. We had the sweet-spirited Bishop Paine, to preside over us, who manages to keep everybody in a good humor, and push the business through.

But my thoughts have gone more frequently to the sermon on holiness, preached by our venerable brother John G. Jones to the class of young ministers ordained on Sabbath afternoon, and to the deeply impressive address of the Bishop to them, on entire consecration of themselves to God and his work. The spirit was resting on them. And I felt in my soul, satisfied that God had selected our young man, then ordained, as a missionary to China. Surely there is need for him there. Will the Church pay for him? A. MEMBER.

DR. A. H. MITCHELL AND DR. JEFF. HAMILTON.

WE ARE pleased to learn that Rev. Dr. Mitchell, the esteemed pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church of this city during the past year, has been returned to the same charge by the Alabama Conference

Dr. Mitchell is a gentleman of cultivated mind, enlarged and liberal views and genuine piety. Fully imbued with a sense of his responsibility as an ambassador of God, he has during his residence here, made himself most acceptable to our people, urging the importance of attending to the soul's salvation not only in the pulpit, but also by private and earnest counsel upon the street and at the fireside of our homes. His return is hailed with satisfaction by all who know him, and we trust his labors for the coming year may be abundantly blessed and rewarded.

We are also highly gratified to be able to state that Rev. Dr. Hamilton has been appointed Agent to the Book Depository within the bounds of the Alabama Conference, and will make Montgomery his residence. Dr. Hamilton's great ability as a preacher, and sterling worth as a man, are generally known and appreciated. He deservedly ranks among the first theologians of the country, and we trust that many years of usefulness and honor in his high calling yet awaits him. [Montgomery (Ala.) Mail.

LATER FROM SAN FRANCISCO.

MR. EDITOR:—Our Conference session is over, and we are again at our work. The last was a year of great prosperity to the Pacific Conference. Fifteen hundred and sixty-eight had been received, mostly on probation, in the several charges, and quite a number of recruits were added to our ministry. Two additional districts were formed, and our borders considerably enlarged. About fifty preachers were sent out into the work, and yet the cry is for "more!" Still crying, Oregon remains unsupplied! Yet I have it attached to my district, (San Francisco,) and hope to visit it this year, after the arrival of the Bishop with more men. Last year the work on my district was too heavy and too important to leave long enough to visit Oregon. I believe near eight hundred were added to the Church in this district alone. At our seven camp-meetings over five hundred were added. I need not tell you that both my preacher and myself were worn down almost beyond endurance. But glory be to God for such work, such toil! The revival flame is still burning, and we are looking for another glorious year. God send it! Let all the Church pray for us with confidence, for God is with us.

What I predicted in my letter to the late General Conference, is now, and has been for months, gloriously fulfilling. Let us only be faithful to God, and follow up the openings of his providence with energy, and, Southern Methodism will, by God's blessing, soon be the Methodism on this great Pacific. It is even so now in efficiency, in moral and spiritual power. God increase it a thousandfold! Still, like the old conquerers, "we want more men and money." We hope the Bishop will bring a good supply of both. Your brother in Christ. O FISHER.

HESTER ANN ROGERS'S TOMB.

A PLEASING instance of Christian liberality has lately taken place at Birmingham, England. Hester Ann Rogers, the wife of one of the early Methodist preachers, whose memoirs have been read with great interest and profit by the great Methodist family, and to attain to whose excellence has been the aim of thousands, after a life of eminent holiness and usefulness died at Birmingham, 1794, and was interred in the graveyard of St. Mary's. A plain stone was erected over her grave, containing an inscription, which may be found in her Memoirs. It had become so much defaced by age and exposure, that its restoration was a matter of necessity, if the last earthly resting-place of this excellent woman was to be recognized.

The Rev. J. C. Barrett, A. M., the incumbent of St. Mary's, has most Christianly and liberally, at his own expense, restored the stone, and to the original epitaph has added one on a child buried in the same grave, which, though inserted in the memoirs, was never put on the stone until now.

The Methodists generally are placed under a debt of gratitude to the reverend gentleman, for having voluntarily restored to notice the humble memorial of one whose name is worthy to be had "in everlasting remembrance."

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1859.

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Our Paper.

Many and pleasant proofs, from all parts of our field, of the favor with which the Advocate is received, encourage us to endeavor to make it still more attractive and useful for the present year.

Talented Contributors.

We have engaged, and are still engaging, the service of some of the very best writers to be found in the country. When we shall have perfected our arrangements in this respect, we trust that our readers will find no occasion to seek elsewhere the literary entertainment and benefit which should be furnished by their own paper.

The Pecuniary Ability.

We never can make the New Orleans Christian Advocate what it ought to be until we have, at least, ten thousand paying subscribers. (We ought to have twenty thousand.) Every improvement, however slight, costs money—a certain amount a week—to be paid in advance—making a considerable sum at the end of the year. Whenever our preachers and people give us ten thousand paying subscribers, they will obtain more than an equivalent in the improvement of the paper.

Ten thousand this Year.

At the Conferences the preachers promised to exert themselves to increase the subscription list to ten thousand during the present year. We affectionately exhort them not to forget these promises. And we respectfully invite all our readers to join the preachers in this work. Let the figure be reached. It is easily done by a unanimous and vigorous effort. Why waste years in accomplishing the work of a few months.

Begin with the Year.

As in all other duties pertaining to his "office and work," the preacher who does not begin to work for the Advocate, at the beginning of the year, is not apt to do much. The habit of attending to this duty regularly should be formed. Let all be done that can possibly be done in January, and then you will be in training for February and the rest of the months. Some preachers, by adopting this course, would be astonished, at the end of the year, at the amount of good accomplished.

We have Tried It.

When we were editor of another paper we recollect preaching in three different towns on three consecutive days, and making a speech for the Advocate at the close of each; the result was, about thirty new subscribers in each place—near one hundred in three days. And this was where the preacher thought everybody that could be induced, already took the paper. It may be said, the editor can do more for his paper than any body else. It is only because he tries harder.

Send for the Accounts.

Let every travelling preacher write to us at once, giving us direction, if he has not done so, to change his paper, if it is to be changed, from such a post-office (giving the name) to such a post office (giving the name). Please, also, to send a list of all the post-offices in the bounds of your charge, so that we may send you the Advocate accounts at the beginning of the year. We are greatly perplexed and greatly injured too, by failure in this matter. Write plainly—be particular—as the Clerk, into whose hands your letter will go may not know you.

Settle as for Yourself.

In reply to all questions as to how disputed accounts should be settled, we have to say: You are one of the owners of the Advocate: settle us though it were your own private business. Make the best collections you can, and settle fully with this office without writing to the office for advice. Were it your own private business, you would try to collect the whole amount in cash, at once; so do for us.

Get Cash Subscribers.

It is much the best to send the money with the name of a new subscriber. Send none without the money, unless you are satisfied they are reliable and punctual. Thousands of dollars are lost to the office every year by a different course.

Send us Money Now.

Since the preachers left their charges to attend the Conferences, say for about two months past, but little money has been sent us. But our weekly expenses are the same as before. We earnestly call upon all our Agents to exert themselves, at once, to make up this loss to us by large cash remittances. Where no Agent is convenient, we trust our subscribers will remit for themselves. We regret, when a large subscription bill is presented, to hear it complainingly said, "No Agent called upon me." Be your Agent, if necessary, as in your other affairs—remit in time, and do not get behind.

Separate Departments.

In writing for publication, if you put business matters on the same half-sheet, the Clerk will probably never see it. In writing on business, if you put matter for publication on the same half-sheet, the Editor, will probably never see it. Matter for publication should be on a slip entirely to itself; business matter should be on a slip entirely to itself; and letters to the Depository, or to the Missionary Treasury, should be separate from both the former, and from each other; though all may be enclosed in the same envelope.

Memoranda.

In writing to the Advocate office, on business, or sending matter for publication, address Rev. C. C. Gillespie; in writing to the Depository, address Keener and McTyeire, Agents; in writing to the Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society, address Rev. J. C. Keener.

The Advocate is sent gratis to all our Agents, who send for it. The itinerant preachers are all Agents. The price of the paper is $2 00 a year in advance; $2 50, if not paid within six months; $3 00 at the end of the year.

Memory.

Never depend upon the mere memory of the Editor, in reference to matters you wish attended to in the office. He has no memory of any business matter, except it be legibly written, with pen and ink, on paper. It is impossible to remember such things. And business should not be transacted in that way. Write everything—write fully—write as though you were not known at the office—for the Clerk, who has to attend to your business, may not know you, and the Editor's time is worth too much for him to be compelled to explain fifty letters a day. In this way we shall be able to please both you and ourselves.

Apologetic.

Our only apology for being thus particular in our directions is, that we wish, as much as possible, to prevent mistakes, to correct any that may have been made, and to keep affairs between ourselves and our agents and subscribers from becoming confused. Most mistakes and misunderstandings arise from the careless, confused, and illegible letters written to us.

Sunday Efforts.

Presenting the claims of the Advocate at the close of Sunday service is just as legitimate and meritorious as presenting the claims of missions, or of any other interest. The Advocate is the common and indispensable supporter of all our interests. Make speeches for it in every congregation—canvass your field fully.

CONTROVERSIAL BITTERNESS.

Newspaper writers, when engaged in controversy with opponents, are extremely liable to fall into the very great error of using bitter, unloving, and consequently, unchristian language. Especially is this the case in controversies between writers of different christian denominations. But frequently, we are sorry to say, brethren, and even ministers, of the same Church, and sometimes of the same Annual Conference, in discussing differences of opinion in reference to Church interests, fall into the same error.

Some specimens of this kind of writing have, we are grieved to say, appeared in the columns of this paper. Our only excuse is, that free discussion demanded the admission of articles from writers who seemed incapable, intellectually, morally or educationally, to write in courteous christian phrase. But such writings shall no longer receive the undeserved honor of a place in this paper, while we are concerned. We trust we shall be spared the disagreeable duty of reading and rejecting such things in future. Men have no more right to be uncharitable in language than in spirit; and that ministers of the gospel should be deceived into committing sins that are as hateful to God as any other sins, is a matter of surprise.

"Took a Pen to" Dr.—Visiting the fine drug-store of our friend and brother, Rev. Robert H. Read, on Canal-street, a few days since in order to purchase some of those necessary articles which he keeps in abundance, he presented us with a very excellent editorial pen, with which we commence our labors for the New Year. Call and see him. He may not give you a pen, but he will, if you suffer him, use one in your behalf—and in his too.

Dr. Gilbert.—Read the advertisement. That dreadful disease, Cancer, can be cured by him, if human testimony is worth any thing. Dr. Gilbert has had a long history of success in its treatment. But read the advertisement, and send all your acquaintances, afflicted with Cancers and Tumors, to him without delay.

A Happy New Year, with all temporal and spiritual blessings to all our readers.

PERSONAL.

Rev. Lovick Pierce, D. D.

We were most agreeably surprised a few days since to meet the venerable Doctor in this city. Though now over seventy years of age, having spent fifty two or three years in the itinerant service, he is Dr. Pierce still, rejoicing as ever in a well-preserved manhood, physical, intellectual, and spiritual. He preaches with unabated vigor, power, and eloquence. He preached on Sunday last at Morean street in the morning, and at Carondelet in the evening. And the Doctor preaches all the time. Whether at home or abroad, in the pulpit or the private circle, he has always, ever since we have known him, "opened his mouth and taught them, saying" wonderfully wise and win some things, "as one having authority, and not as the scribes," thus following the example of his Master, whose he is, and whom he serves.

Taken all in all, he is one of the most remarkable men ever produced by American Methodism; and, with his compeers, Soule, Andrew, Capers, Hope Hull, and many others, helps to form a constellation in our ecclesiastical firmament which will shine with increased lustre and beauty as it passes above the horizon of the present, and rises to the noon of history. Judged by the Evangelical Methodist standard, but few, if any, have ever surpassed him as a regular Methodist preacher. He has little or no fancy, but his imagination is most healthfully exuberant, making the seeds of his living and logical thought, in private converse and in the pulpit, to bud and bloom into foliage and flower at every step, like the influence of the spring-time upon the seeds hidden in the bosom of the earth.

Dr. Pierce is on a hasty visit to Texas, to see and comfort a recently widowed daughter. The good wishes and prayers of the whole Church attend him, wherever he goes.

Rev. J. C. Miller, A. M.

The President of "Centenary College of Louisiana" attended both the Conferences, patronizing the College; Mississippi and Louisiana. He is a member of the Mississippi Conference, and the College is located in that part of Louisiana belonging to that Conference. But it is in the State of Louisiana, and has its name. And President Miller's brother, Rev. A. G. Miller, one of the Professors, is a member of the Louisiana Conference. Moreover, both Conferences have a joint interest in it, and it it most eligibly located, not only for the patronizing Conference, but for the entire South-west.

President Miller adopts the true philosophy for all our men who are entrusted with the conduct of great public interests—he is indefatigable, wherever he goes, in the promotion of the weal of the College. At the Mississippi Conference he succeeded in procuring the appointment of a first rate Agent for the Endowment Fund, Rev. Vernon H. Johnson, the man who was on the banner circuit, in missionary matters, for the past year. On Bayon Pierre Circuit, Mississippi Conference, he collected $1960 missionary money—the largest amount raised last year on any circuit in the Southern Church. We trust he may have proportionate success in his present field. The Louisiana Conference heartily seconded the movement made in Mississippi for the endowment of Centenary, and passed a resolution recommending that the Fund be increased to $100,000, and also that an Agent be appointed in the Louisiana Conference. But the Bishop could find no man that could be spared for the work. Will not the wealthy and liberal friends of the Church, of Centenary, and of education, within the bounds of the Louisiana Conference, do their part of the work, without an Agent? We hope they will. We ought to bring up the endowment to $300,000. The "Southern University," at Greensboro', Alabama, has about that sum for endowment, all raised in our Conference. Cannot Mississippi and Louisiana do as much as Alabama? Why let Centenary be second to any College in the Church? Centenary College is in as good a location for a magnificent seat of learning as there is to be found in the United States—in the very centre of the wealthy and rapidly developing South-west. Its buildings, for commodiousness, convenience, and architectural taste, are, we are informed, unsurpassed in the South. It has been on the high tide of successful operations for years, having graduated over one hundred and fifty young men whose career since they left the College halls, so far as known, reflects honor upon the institution, the Church, and the country.

Rev. T. C. Thornton, D. D.

We were pleased to meet and become acquainted, at the Mississippi Conference, with Dr. Thornton, President of Madison College, Mississippi. The Doctor is a man of varied acquirements, a popular preacher, and a very efficient member of the Mississippi Conference. Our mission to China, especially as represented by "Rev. J. W. Lambuth, and Mary his wife," is his greatest church interest, apparently, and right worthily does he advocate it. The Doctor preached several times to our people in New Orleans, and his hearers were pleased and profited.

Rev. J. W. Shipman.

We learn from the Texas Christian Advocate that Rev. J. W. Shipman, of the Texas Conference, formerly Presiding Elder of the Victoria District, and who was, at the recent session, appointed Agent of the Depository at Galveston, has also been appointed Fiscal Agent of the Advocate there. We congratulate the friends of the paper upon the appointment of a gentleman, a christian, and a man whose name will be an advantage instead of an injury to the paper, to that office. Above all, we congratulate the editor. It must be a matter of infinate comfort to him to have such an associate in the office. Our confidence in the success of the Texas paper begins now to flourish anew.

President Halsey.

The President of Soule University, Chappell Hill, Texas, William Halsey, A. M., with his lady, who is at the head of Chappell Hill Female College, attended the Louisiana Conference, and has been spending some time visiting old friends in this city, and in Mississippi. The University is patronized by the Texas and East Texas Conferences, and it is intended to be, when completed, an institution worthy of its name, and of that great country. It is now in successful operation, with a fine faculty.

Rev. Jesse Boring, D. D.

At the recent session of the Georgia Conference, at Columbus, Georgia, Dr. Boring was transferred to the Rio Grande Mission Conference, and stationed at San Antonio. Georgia was loth to give him up, and both before and at Conference, most munificent offers were made him, by wealthy friends in different parts of the State. But San Antonio had been left open for him, he had placed his heart in that country, and, though doubtless touched by the generous friendship of his old Georgia friends, he would not swerve from his purpose, and is now, we learn, on his way to his new home. May God make him "a burning and a shining light" in the Far West.

A GRAND PROPOSITION.

One of our esteemed local preachers, residing within the bounds of the Mississippi Conference—quite wealthy, by the way—suggested the other day, the propriety of having all the hotels of the city, and the steamers too, we believe, supplied with the New Orleans Christian Advocate, for the benefit of the passengers. He suggests than this be done by private donations for the purpose. We think much good might be done in this way, if the means were furnished. And there are many other places where the Advocate might be sent with equal promise of benefit. The poor in this city, and also, where, by the appropriation of not a large sum of money, might be supplied with profitable and interesting reading, in this way.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI.—No. I.

Congregational Church.

Mr. Editor: It is a matter of interest to all succeeding generations of Christians to know when, and by whom, Christianity was first introduced into their country. But if the question was now asked, "when, and by whom, was protestant Christianity first introduced into what is now the State of Mississippi?" perhaps not one in a thousand of all the professors of religion among us could give a satisfactory answer, and yet it is not too late for that question to be answered satisfactorily.

Being a lineal descendant, by both my parents, from the families that first organized Protestant Churches in this country, I have it in my power, not only from uniform family tradition, but also from well authenticated family records, to give at least, a correct outline of the history of those Churches. In doing this I may differ in some dates and facts from others who have attempted it, but I consider my sources of information more reliable than those of mere memory.

Of the secular history of the country I shall say but little, as that has been amply detailed by those who have written expressly on the subject. It is the religious phase alone which I wish to bring to view. From 1763 to 1779 the province of West Florida, including what was then called "the Natchez country," was under British rule. The fertility of the soil in the Natchez District of the province, and its being bordered on the west by the great Mississippi river, made it very desirable to occupy the country by permanent English settlements. In order to this great inducements were held out to adventurers to remove to this tempting locality. Among the first who came was Amos Ogden, a reduced captain in the British navy. On the 13th of May, 1767, George III, issued a Mandamus to the governor of his majesty's province of West Florida, "to grant unto Amos Ogden under the seal of the province 25,000 acres of land, and to have the same surveyed in one contiguous tract wherever the said Ogden or his attorney may choose." The conditions of the grant required the land to be located and permanently settled by a certain number of families. Captain Ogden, finding himself unable to comply with the conditions of the grant without assistance from others, fortunately met in the city of New York, two wealthy planters from Morris county, New Jersey, by the name of Richard and Samuel Swayze, (generally pronounced Sweze,) to whom he sold 19,800 acres of his grant at twenty cents per acre, on condition that they would assist in the selection of the land, and settle their proportion of families thereon.

In the spring of 1772 Captain Ogden and the Messrs. Swayze came in person to the Natchez District, and located their grant on the Homochitto river in what is now the south eastern portion of Adams county. In the following October the two brothers, Richard and Samuel Swayze, chartered a schooner, and with their families and connections consisting mostly of their married children, set sail from the port of Perth Amboy, for their new home in the south west. After a tedious and perilous voyage, having touched at Havana de Cuba, they landed at Pensacola where they discharged the schooner. They there provided themselves with a suitable number of open boats in which they embarked with all they had in the way of personal property. They followed the line of coast westward to Lake Borgne, through which they passed into Lake Ponchartrain, and from thence through Lake Maurepas up the Amito river, and through the pass Manchac into the Mississippi river, and from thence they ascended the opposing current of that majestic stream by slow and tedsome stages to the mouth of the Homochitto, and following the sinuosities of that river up to their grant, landed in time to raise corn in 1773. They settled near Kingston and formed what is still known as the "Jersey Settlement." For the sake of mutual protection from hostile Indians, they at first settled in village-form on a creek which from thence took the name of "Town Creek" which it still bears. I might say much that would be of interest to their descendants about their privations, hardships, and exposure to hostile savages, but I will pass over this, and in my next advance to the main object of my correspondence.

No. II.

Mr. Editor: Rev. Samuel Swayze, one of the original owners and settlers of the famous Mandamus Grant, of which I made mention in my last, was a Congregationalist Minister, and had sustained the pastoral relation in that Church from early manhood. As the birth of his children dates back to 1753, it is likely that he had been a minister of the Gospel thirty or forty years previous to his removal to the Natchez country. Most of his family and connections who came with him were, probably, members of his church in New Jersey. Soon after their arrival at their new home in the wilderness, they were regularly organized into a Congregationalist Church, and Mr. Swayze took charge of them as their pastor, and continued to serve them, as he had opportunity, until his death in 1784. He was beyond doubt, the first Protestant minister that ever settled within what is now the State of Mississippi, and his Church was the first Protestant church ever organized in this country. From some documents in my possession, I see that our Baptist brethren claim to have been the pioneers of Protestantism in the Natchez country, but in this they are evidently mistaken, as I expect to show in subsequent numbers of this correspondence. Rev. Samuel Swayze and his little flock had to endure many hardships, privations, and dangers in their wilderness home; one of the most appalling of which was the stealthy and repeated incursions of hostile Indians. Several persons were killed by them, among whom was a Mr. Corey, a grandson of Richard Swayze. These troubles had not abated, when in 1776 the Province passed under Spanish rule, and Roman Catholicism was declared by law to be the only allowable religion of the land. The voice and hand of persecution was soon raised against Mr. Swayze and his little church at Kingston, and their religious privileges were greatly abridged. Search was made for Protestant Bibles and religious books, and whenever they fell into the hands of the priests or their emissaries they were committed to the flames. Mr. Swayze, in order to secure himself and his Bible from the inquisitorial grasp of the Catholic hierarchy, retired to a canebreak on the margin of a small stream, which yet bears the name of "Sammie's Creek," and fixed him a seat in the hollow of a large sycamore tree, where he often sat to read the Holy Book, and in which he kept it concealed from the eyes of his persecutors. About 1780 the Indians, and not much less treacherous, Spaniards, became so annoying to the settlers on the Mandamus Grant, that they removed temporarily to the St. Catherine near Natchez, where Rev. Samuel Swayze and his wife died about 1784. When I had the pastoral charge of Washington, six miles from Natchez, in 1834-5, I was several times visited by James Swayze, a grandson of the old minister, who told me that he had been familiar with that vicinity for sixty years. From him I learned, when and where his venerable grand-parents, Rev. Samuel Swayze and his wife, died; and also that they were buried on a high ridge of land that jutted out to the waters-edge on the Mississippi river, just below old Fort Rosalie, at Natchez. The grave yard has long since caved off into the river, so that the remains of the venerable minister and his wife have been literally,

"Carried downward by the flood,
And lost in following years."

By 1786 the alarm about the Indians, had to a great extent passed away, and most of the settlers returned to their former homes on the Ogden Grant. A son of the deceased pastor, rather informally, took charge of the church for the time being, until they could do better, but he did not long survive his father; so that it was left without a pastor for many years, and was never again organized as a Congregational Church. But the blessed fruits of that original Protestant church in the Natchez country have not been lost. In addition to a large number already gone to rest in Abraham's bosom, many more are now on the way, manifesting in all the details of probationary life, "the unfeigned faith that dwelt" so conspicuously in their godly ancestors. A few of the connection, by marrying into Baptist families, united with the Baptist Church, but the great majority, from some cause, did not seem inclined to affiliate with that branch of the general church, but considered themselves members of their own church, though without a pastor, until the Methodist began to organize churches in the country, and then they as readily united with the Methodist Episcopal Church as though they had been trained up under its auspices. Many of the descendants of the original settlers yet live, on and in the vicinity of the Mandamus Grant, while many others are scattered over Mississippi and Louisiana, and some have gone to more distant localities. A fair proportion yet retain the name of Swayze, but many of the females, having married into other families, their descendants are known by the names of Caleman, Callender, Corey, Farror, Fowles, Fowler, King, Luse, Hopkins, Grifling, Jones etc. etc. It is matter of devout gratitude to God that the lineal descendants of this first Protestant family in Mississippi, have lately built us a superior brick church, near the site of the first settlement on the Mandamus Grant, where our ministers are preaching to large and attention congregations. In a subsequent number I shall ask the privilege of individualizing some of the descendants of this pious ancestry, but as their personal religion, and ardent zeal in the cause of Christ, were mainly conspicuous after their connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church, I shall defer it until I come to speak of the introduction of that form of Christianity into our country.

TEXAS SKETCHES.—By Col. C. G. Forshey,

It is wonderful what recuperative power is possessed by this new empire of fertility.

For three seasons in succession there has been complaint, over a large portion of Texas, that drouth prevailed, and crops were shortened, and in many cases destroyed. The grasshoppers, too, came over certain districts and cut off many crops; rust destroyed the wheat, and the boll-worms, web-worms and cotterpillars, ate up the cotton. "Half a crop," "quarter crop," and "no crop," were the cries of farmers and planters.

Travel over the same area now, and seek for the testimony of past disasters, but you will not find it. The drouth was "very severe across the river," or the "grasshopper ate up many farms in another county;" but you find few who, themselves, experienced the calamity. In fact, "in our region it has always been healthy, and fine crops have been made, though in some places not far off times were pretty hard, and there was considerable sickness."

It was a philosopher that discovered that human nature was prone to a given amount of grumbling, and this being one of the indefeasible rights, it would be asserted under any circumstance. But no amount of misfortune can make men admit of arguments disparaging the productiveness and healthfulness of their own vicinity. In a good many years of residence in the midst of plantations, I have annually heard of disasters that reduced the crop one half, according to the estimates of the sufferers, and yet in all that period of twenty-two years, I have known but a single year when the allegation was true, of any large district of country; and no year at all, in which it was confessed a-year afterwards, that those very localities were liable to such casualties. Last year (1857) was prolific of complaints in every part of Texas west of the Trinity River, and yet you can scarcely find the evidence now. Indeed, you see such abundance in every crib and stock yard; in every gin and cavallard; in every larder and cowpen; in every flock and herd over our endless country, that you would exclaim: This, indeed, is the "land of milk and honey!"

[My neighbor, Daniel Pope, Esq., took the honey from a hive that had produced two swarms of bees this year, one hundred and seventy-one pounds of pure fresh honey and comb.]

[Butter in this county, costs twelve to fifteen cents in summer, and twenty to twenty-five cents in winter; fresh pure and sweet in summer, and nearly equal to Goshen in winter. I purchased butter yesterday, put away in May last, as pure and sweet as I ever saw from Goshen. Wholesale price, twenty cents. Yet there is not one cow in twenty that is milked at all.]

This appears to be pretty well understood and appreciated now, over a number of the Southern and Western States. Such caravans of emigrants as are now pouring into Texas from all quarters, no previous year has witnessed.

From Louisiana and Lower Mississippi, the planter is finding his way to the alluvions near the Gulf, with a view of planting cane and making sugar. From the entire cotton growing region, east and north of the Sabine, the planter comes with his wagons and slaves, and his family carriages, invests his funds, and plants his future home, chiefly on the spot nearest like that he has now worn out and left behind him; clinging still to a sort of instinctive notion, that it takes just such a country to be right healthy. Cotton has not yet been planted extensively north or west of a line running from Paris, in Lamar County, to Austin, in Travis County, and south by Seguin to the San Antonio River, and with its valley to the Gulf. Over the area within this boundary, the cotton planters scatter on every variety of soil: from the dense pine-forests of South-eastern Texas, to the thick brakes of Old Caney, and the rich black prairies of Fayette and Red River, and forty other counties.

From Missouri and Illinois—from Tennessee and Kentucky, the farmers come to cultivate wheat and other cereals; and in vast numbers the emigrants, in every degree of opulence and poverty, are spreading themselves over the northern and western upland regions. Some with slaves, and some with fragments of flocks and herds and farming utensils; and all with a little extra cash for the first year's subsistence.

The sturdy German, too, from far Europe, continues to find his way to the west and south-west uplands, chiefly beyond the planting region; accustomed to raise grain and to manufacturing industry, they plant themselves on little patches of ground, and invariably prosper, or they fill the workshops and do the mechanical labor of nearly all the towns in middle and western Texas. This element of population is not, however, keeping up its per centage in western Texas. There has been a slacking off in German emigration, and in much larger increase from other quarters. But wherever they plant their new homes, they too, bring some extra money for a year's subsistence, and thus add to the general prosperity, by immediate supplies of cash.

And again, there is a large class of men of enterprise, who think they discover that stock is to be the greatest business of the western portion of Texas, and transforming their capital elsewhere into cash, are investing it in stocks of cattle, horses and sheep, and purchasing ranches in the less densely settled districts, and are devoting their attention to the improvement of stock and the extension of their flocks, and herds, and cavallards.

A few gentlemen are venturing to plant grape, and others are establishing themselves for the manufacture of wines from our native grapes. Our best temperance reformers hail with pleasure this prospect of a substitution of the innocent vinous beverage, so common in southern Europe, for the strong drinks, which in some form, have always kept pace with our new populations. It is alleged that the Mustang grape, so vastly abundant in all our middle and western districts, and quite extensively made into an extemporaneous wine the past summer—is wholly without alcoholic ingredient, and yet furnishes a most nutritious and tonic beverage.

Sheep culture is at present, the greatest rage. The price of sheep has doubled in two years in this vicinity, and the flocks along the Rio Grande, and from the hither Mexico, are fast being driven into our upland regions, to be improved by admixtures with imported breeds from northern States and from Europe. Many believe that this is quite the most profitable form of stock growing, and it is very difficult for our coolest heads to avoid the contagion into which this impression is running. A small force, less labor, protects and improves a given capital in this form more than in any other form of industry in Texas.

And now, friend reader, whoever and wherever you be, if you have not taken a journey of at least a thousand miles in this new and grand appendix to the American Republic, then you cannot appreciate the limitless extent of our grassy-fields; the exuberant fertility of our unploughed, unmeasurable acres; the freshness and living beauty of our springs and streams of gushing water; the fresh and cooling breezes that make life a luxury along our Gulf-coast; or the elastic and vigorous airs that play about our picturesque uplands, bringing energy and salubrity to every form of life.

There is greatness, says the gifted Ashbel Smith, "in the mere idea that we belong to a great people; a sort of vernal triumph, in feeling that our country is vast, enlightened, free and powerful."

Let us carry the idea a little further, and we can flatter ourselves, that we are a part of the stupendous progress our State is making in population, intelligence, wealth and material industry. Enterprise of a healthful character and gigantic proportions is around and among us. We have a quiet disregard, if not contempt, for distances. Our near and social neighbors are many miles from us. We drive up our herds from twenty or forty miles of Prairie range; instead of quarter sections or a hundred arpents, we speak of leagues of land, and jest about our eleven-league grants, owned by single individuals. It is easy and very natural, for each of us to appropriate to himself a liberal share of the all prevailing largeness, and if he does not express, he feels his consequence somewhat in proportion to the extraordinary dimensions of all his surroundments.

Come and see us, friends, across the Sabine, and assure yourselves that we do not speak idly, nor feel extravagantly. You will not find us living in houses proportioned to the largeness of everything else; but you will find us with a climate where we can live, if need be, without a house, and be healthier than our friends who have lagged behind, in the dullness of refined society and carpeted parlors, can make themselves in their elegant mansions; and where our hearts, if not our houses, are large enough to give you a welcome.

Come while the "desert still blooms like a garden"—while our splendid solitudes are, a few of them, still unbroken; while still there is room for the teaming thousands from crowded States, and land in abundance at moderate rates, to provide homes for your children in this, the future Empire State of Texas.

NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

The recent session was held in Newbern. From all we can learn, both from the North Carolina Christian Advocate, and from other sources, the session, though charged with the solution and settlement of important and exciting questions, closed most harmoniously, with the prospect of greater unanimity, peace and good will, that has fallen to the lot of the Conference for years. It concurred unanimously in striking out the General Rule on Slavery, and adopting a plan for distributing books, and for the publication of the Advocate.

Case of Rev. C. F. Deems, D. D,

We quote from the North Carolina Advocate.

Saturday, Dec. 11th, 1858.

The name of C. F. Deems being called, his P. E., (D. B. Nicholson,) stated that he was in possession of nothing against him; when Wm. Carter arose and presented (of which he said he had given Dr. Deems notice,) the original charge and specifications preferred against Dr. Deems by Rev. W. A. Smith, D. D., at Pittsboro', in 1854; and also an additional charge with six specifications. Dr. Carter proceeded to give his reasons for reviving the first charge and specifications. The session was prolonged to a quarter past one o'clock. When Dr. Carter had concluded his remarks, he submitted to the Bishop two law questions for his decission.

The session was extended to hear Dr. Deem's reply.

Monday, December 13th.

The case of Dr. Deems coming up, Dr. Carter (having changed the phraseology of his law questions) read a copy of them as laid before the Bishop.

Dr. Deems objected to the questions in their present form going before the Bishop, as they were changed in form from those originally presented, and that without his knowledge. Reiterated the declaration that he was not tried by the committee, at Pittsboro' in 1851, but by the Conference. He declared his readiness to be tried on the charges now or at any time. At Pittsboro' he was not so fully prepared, having received no notice of the charges beforehand; but is now fully prepared to meet the old charges, if it be legal to try them, as well as the new. Dr. D. objected to a decision on the second question, as such decision would be prejudging a fact embodied in the 5th specification of the new charge of Dr. Carter. Thought that Dr. C., in withdrawing his questions and putting them in a different form to that in which they were at first presented and argued, did him (Dr. D.) wrong, but he was willing to forgive him, this time.

At this point, Bishop K. explained that it was at his suggestion the questions were withdrawn, in order that they might be put in such shape as to cover the law in the case instead of the facts.

Dr. Carter wished to explain. He took the position that the articles of settlement at Pittsboro' had been violated, disturbance to the Church had resulted; he wished the matter settled; he does not wish to disturb the harmony of the church nor traverse her laws, and is willing to submit to her decisions. Thought Dr. Deems provoked the investigation or trial at Pittsboro,' when Dr. Stuart promised to have Smith there, which he did. Don't know whether Dr. Deems had been notified or not.

Dr. Deems replied by stating emphatically that he had not been notified of the charges that were presented at Pittsboro'. This war was opened upon him about the time that Dr. Early was made Bishop—thinks this at least a remarkable coincidence. Dr. Smith had been speaking of him,—Dr. Deems, behind his back, and was expected, of course, to intend to bring charges before the Conference of 1854.

When he found that Dr. Smith was not there, he desired the action on the passage of his character should be postponed until Dr. Smith could arrive.

Dr. Carter thought the difficulty originated earlier than the election of Bishop Early; that it originated on the way to the General Conference in 1854, about a certain letter, and called on Rev. Wm. Closs to corroborate him. Mr. Closs rose upon his call and stated that he thought the occurrence alluded to was a mere part of electioneering tactics before the General Conference.

Dr. Carter resumed. He thought the fact undeniable that the terms of settlement had been violated; said he did not allege that Dr. Smith had violated them or that Dr. Deems had; he merely stated a fact.

The discussion was rather desultory. The Bishop called Rev. P. Doub, D. D., to the Chair, and retired to write out his decision upon the questions referred to him, after an additional amendment suggested by himself.

Tuesday, December 14th.

The case of Dr. Deems was resumed. Bishop Cavanaugh read his decisions upon the questions submitted to him by Dr. Carter on Saturday.

The Bishop presented, in writing, his decision upon the questions submitted to him by Dr. Carter. The questions to the Bishop are as follows:

Questions submitted to the chair for decision at the North Carolina Conference, held at Newbern, in the month of December, 1858, by the Rev. Wm. Carter, a member of the Conference.

Question 1st. Is the investigation of a charge of immorality and specifications against an elder, when taken out of the Conference by the consent of the parties and the Conference, and submitted to a committee if Ministers and Laymen, chosen by the parties—a Bishop being chairman, for adjustment; and a settlement made by the committee reported to, and adopted by, the Conference, a legal trial?

Question 2d. Is the settlement made by the said committee, and in view of it, and the evidence in the case, the passage of his character, by the Conference; when either one or both of the parties have violated it, a legal barrier to the trial in the future, of the said charge and specifications according to the law and usage of the Church?

To the first question, I answer that such would be a legal trial. The fact, that the Conference allowed the parties to refer the case to a committee of friends for a plan of adjustment, was an irregularity, but not of such a character as to make the action of the Conference illegal; as the Conference had heard, in the first place, all the evidence against and in behalf of the accused, and in the second place, requiring the committee to report to them, did not allow the committee to settle anything finally. The true position of the committe is that of an advisroy and not a judicial body. This position of the committee renders it not material to the law governing the case, whether the persons composing it were members of the Church or not. Had the committee finally settled the case, it would have vitiated the process, as to its legality; but as they reported the measures which they advised to the Conference, and the Conference adopted those terms of settlement as their own, being fully in possession of the merits of the case, and then passing the character of the accused, made it clearly a legal trial.

In answer to the second question, I would say, in the first place, that from the terms of the first question, the committee did not settle the case finally, but made the terms for the settlement which the Conference adopted. In the second place, after the Conference had settled the case and passed the character of the accused, the subsequent violation of the terms of the settlement, by either one or both of the parties, does not open the way for the renewal of the 'charge and specifications.' Those having been once legally settled, must stand as a barrier to a subsequent presentation; but if in violating the terms of settlement, either of the parties involve themselves in a violation of the principles of propriety or morality, they may be charged to that extent for the violation, and held responsible to the Conference.

H. H. Kavanaugh.

The Bishop having concluded his opinion, Rev. Wm. Carter then declared that he withdrew the charges and specifications preferred by him against Rev. Dr. Deems, and presented a letter to the same effect, asking that if it be the pleasure of the Conference, it be spread on the journals; which request he subsequently withdrew. Pending the discussion upon this request, Rev. Dr. Deems submitted two questions of law to the Bishop.

The following resolution being offered, to wit:

"Resolved, That this Conference does not consent to the withdrawal of the second bill of charges preferred by Dr. Carter against Dr. Deems;"

The Bishop ruled the resolution out of order, and an appeal was taken from the chair. This being discussed, the resolution and appeal were finally withdrawn.

Dr. Carter presented a question of law for the Bishop's decision.

Wednesday, December 15th.

The case of Rev. Dr. Deems being resumed, the Bishop read the law questions proposed to him, and his opinions, which are as follow:

Question submitted by Rev. W. Carter:

"When charges and specifications are presented to an Annual Conference against one of its members, are they in possession of the Conference until they have been formally entertained by a vote of the Conference, and may they not at any time previous to this vote be withdrawn?"

Charges under the circumstances specified in the question, are not in the possession of the Conference, until the Conference by vote agree to entertain them, or shall without the formality of a vote on entertaining, proceed to the investigation of the charges. Until such action is had, the member presenting the charges, may withdraw them.

Newbern, N. C., Dec. 14th, 1858. H. H. Kavanaugh.

Question submitted by Rev. C. F. Deems, D. D.

When a member of an Annual Conference has been notified that certain charges will be presented against him at the Conference next ensuing, and the accuser, so notifying, has read his bill of charges to the Conference, and the Conference has been sometime in consideration of the character of the accused, can the accuser then withdraw his charges, or any portion thereof, without the consent of the accused and of the Conference?"

After a bill of charges has been presented by one member of a Conference against another, after due notification, and the character of the accused has been so far under examination as to have taken evidence against the accused, the accuser cannot withdraw the charges without the consent of the accused and of the Conference. Nor can the accuser withdraw the charges he has preferred against a member, after the Conference has agreed to entertain the charges, without the consent of the Conference.

Newbern, N. C., Dec. 14th, 1858. H. H. Kavanaugh.

Whereupon, Dr. Carter arose and stated that he understood the Bishop to decide that he had the right to withdraw his second charge and specifications. The Bishop answered that he had the right, and Rev. W. Carter withdrew them.

The following preambio and resolution were presented, which being read were adopted by a unanimous rising vote of the Conference:

Whereas, Wm. A. Smith preferred a charge against C. F. Deems before the Conference in Pittsboro', in 1854, upon which the Conference tried and acquitted C. F. Deems; and whereas, the same charge, in substance, was renewed against C. F. Deems by Wm. Carter, at the Conference held at Greensboro' in 1856, and the Conference refused to entertain the charge, for the reason that it is unlawful to put a man upon his trial the second time upon a charge for which he has been tried and acquitted; and whereas Wm. Carter has again presented the same charge against C. F. Deems before the Conference at its present session, and the presiding Bishop has made a decision, confirming the action of the Conference and affirming the legality of the trial and acquittal had at the session in Pittsboro'; and whereas with a knowledge of the facts in the case, this Conference fully endorses the acquittal of C. F. Deems at its former session in Pittsboro':

Resolved, by this Conference, that the decision made on yesterday morning by Bishop Kavanaugh, upon the first question submitted by Dr. Carter, does fully apply to the case of C. F. Deems, D. D., as tried at Pittsboro', in 1854.

Rev. Dr. Deems having retired, his character passed.

The Secretary was authorized to furnish Rev. Dr. Deems with a copy of all the proceedings in his case.

News from our Home Work.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Yazoo City Circuit.—Rev. H. D. Benny, gives the brief sketch of his labors during the year past. "I have preach 100 times; baptized 45 children and 20 ; 75 joined the Church on probation; visited 220 ; paid 650 visits; circulated 8000 pages of tracts; for the different periodicals $35; sold $230 worth gave away $75 worth, held class meetings at all the societies once a month. Received for my as pastor $150, for Missionary cause $12, for Sabbath-schools $15, for Bible cause $10, for Tract cause for Conference collection $14, $25 for performing matrimonial ceremony for three couples; in presents I had to travel 4400 miles and my traveling expenses $56. I think this speaks well for Gainesville Circuit, will discover from the previous year's minutes that Yazoo City Circuit paid the enormous sum of $65.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Book and Tract Society.

Resolved, That it is expedient and proper that the Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference should act, as nearly as may be consistent and practicable, in relation to and have the same interest in the Publishing House at Nashville as the Book and Tract Societies of the other Conferences.

2. That it is the sense of the Conference, that the Book and Tract Society should direct its labors largely to the establishment and propogation of Sunday-schools in the bounds of the Conference.

3. That Bishop Paine be, and he is, hereby requested, to appoint brother H. H. Montgomery, and brother W. H. Merrill, to the Agency of said Society.

The Evangelist.

Whereas, The late General Conference adopted a plan for establishing a cheap religious Newspaper, for the purpose of diffusing Christian knowledge amongst the thousands poor and comparatively uninformed; Therefore,

Resolved, That the members of this Conference heartily approve the plan of endowing and publishing The Church Evangelist; and agree individually to aid, as far as in our power, the execution of the benevolent design to be accomplished.

Resolved, That we cheerfully commend the enterprise of endowing and sustaining said paper, according to the plan set forth and illustrated by Rev. C. K. Marshall in his appeal, as its Agent, to the generous and Christian people of our people within the bounds of this Conference.

Resolved, That the Bishop be respectfully requested, in appointing Agents to the several Institutions within the bounds of our Conference, to require that they shall also act as Agents for The Church Evangelist Endowment Fund.

South-Western Sunday-school Union.

Whereas, Many of our people have been induced to encourage and aid the "South-western Sunday-school Union," at New Orleans, from a misapprehension of the relation of our Church to said concern; Therefore,

Resolved, 1st. That neither the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, nor the Mississippi Conference, has any official connection with the South-western Sunday-school Union.

Resolved, 2d. That we disapprove the introduction of such Agents into our pulpits, in their capacity as such.

H. H. MONTGOMERY.
C. K. MARSHALL.

Delegates to the General Conference.

Resolved, That we have been highly gratified with the attendance on the Conference, of so large a number of our brethren, as lay representatives; and believe their presence and influence have been healthful and salutary, and think that whether the system has been fully harmonized, the joint energies and aims of both parties will and must, be benefitted in a high degree to the interests of our Church.

C. K. MARSHALL,
L. PEARCE.

Course of Study.

The Course of Study was classified as follows: Literary, Historical, and Theological; and Committees appointed accordingly, to examine the Classes for the next four years.

Literary—John C. Miller, W. H. Watkins and W. P. Davis.

Historical—James L. Forsythe, Benjamin Jones and A. J. Wheat.

Theological—H. H. Montgomery, H. M. Booth, and John Boyd.

Committee to examine Candidates for Admission on Trial—B. Drake, John R. Lambuth, and T. W. Brown.

Visiting Committee, Centenar College—H. J. Harris, H. Clinton, J. A. B. Jones.

Sharon Female College—H. H. Montgomery, Wm. M. Curtis and James L. Forsythe.

Publishing Committee of New Orleans Christian Advocate—W. M. Drake, W. H. Watkins, and J. J. Wheat.

GARDEN FARM, AND PLANTATION.

LADY CONTRIBUTORS.—There are many ladies within the bounds of that wide, rich, and growing country patronizing the New Orleans Christian Advocate, who are thoroughly experienced in the practice of horticulture. Will they not write for this department of the paper, tell us how they succeed in producing fine vegetables and beautiful flowers, and thus do immense good to the number of their country-women who have not such experience?

FARMERS AND PLANTERS.—We invite all those who have experience as to the least farm and plantation economy, to write for this head of the Advocate.

Plantation Work for January.

The plantation should be traversed carefully, every defective point noted, and the whole plotted out on paper. Thus you have before you, for constant reference at any moment, a map of your future field of operations. New drains to be laid out at certain points,—defects in the level of your rows to be amended,—at certain other points subsoiling,—and again in some other quarter a report of fertilization. These, and innumerable others of minor character, are matters inconsiderable of themselves, but that their neglect wasteth the soil, and, like moths, destroyer crops. Nor are they defects that may be noticed and amended at any time during the year; but remember your vigilant and prompt attention now at the threshold of the season.

Grade-ditch and horizontal any fields whereon this all important work may not have been previously done. It is folly in the extreme to attempt or expect to improve land, where rain-water either accumulates and remains for any length of time ponded, or where it (rain-water) so runs off as to wash the land, and with it the fertility of the soil. This is the "sine qua non" of improvment. Let me assure you, that however well you may have done everything else, this important step neglected and you have stopped short of the goal of certain success. If we were to write out our system of plantation improvements in aphorisms, the caption should be, allow no rain water to run on cultivated lands! This system of grade-ditching and horizontal culture which we practice, and about which we talk so much, and always first! is simple and easy enough in practice; as intelligent planters in all sections of the country are finding out who try it.

All low, wet places, such as ponds and wet swampy heads, should be ditched, cleaned up and prepared for the plow; these spots being low, are usually the deposit for the vegetable mould that has been washed down from the adjacent higher places by the rains of ages. Undrained, the soil, though rich in all elements of our crops, is sour and in an unfit state for cultivation; uncleared, they are ugly places in the field; overgrown with briars and other brush-wood, they become the hiding places of all the enemies of our crops, growing on the higher land around. This is the proper time to clear up all such ugly but rich places, and to secure their productiveness it is entirely necessary to ditch them out. If they be springy and supplied with water draining from the adjacent hills, as is often the case, a head or semi-circular ditch will be found necessary at that line all along round the margin, where the water makes its appearance at the surface, into this ditch of the proper depth—which experience will very soon indicate—the water will all be collected, and then may pass off by a main drain through the most convenient locality to the slough or creek.

Garden Work in January.

The weather is frequently so inclement during this month, and the soil so wet and heavy, that very little can be done in the garden in the way of planting and sowing. In fact, very little, but trouble, loss and aggravation is gained by sowing seeds as early as January.

The principal work is clearing away weeds and trash and preparing for a better month. Whenever the season will admit of working the soil, spread a good coat of manure over it, and work it in deeply at once, either with the spade or with a good turning plough, so as to have the land ready for the crop. In fact the manuring and deep working of the soil can not be too much urged upon. Good vegetables are one of the greatest, cheapest and most wholesome luxuries, which almost every family can raise with but little trouble; but it is folly to expect to raise fine vegetables without heavy manuring, deep working, and frequent stirring of the soil.

Whenever cabbage plants have been raised in the Autumn under protection, they should now be looked after, and as much air as possible be given them during mild weather, taking care, however, to cover them up again during frosty nights. The best varieties for early use are: Early Wakefield and Early Orkart. Early Peas may be planted, though they seldom come to much. Prince Albert and Extra Early are amongst the best early Peas.

Should the soil be in proper order for sowing, Onions (black seed,) may now be planted; the seed lies in the ground for a long time and should it come up, it is hardy enough to withstand pretty severe frosts; Portuguese and Red Whetherfield are the best kinds. If Parsley was not sowed in the Autumn, it should now be put in the ground as soon as possible.

South of this, say at latitude 31 deg. and farther south, all Spring-work will begin in earnest, sowing and planting all the hardy vegetables, as cabbage, turnips, beets, Irish potatoes, radishes, lettuce and others.

Flower Garden and Shrubbery.

This is a good time to transplant Roses and other shrubbery; also for dividing and transplanting all hardy perennial flowers, except Peonies, which ought to be transplanted in September or October, as they will not bloom when transplanted in the Winter.

It is now too late to plant Hyacinths, Tulips, Snowdrops and others, very early blooming bulbs. True, they will produce a flower, as the embryo-flower is already to be found in the bulb, having already been formed during the Summer. But this bloom will be a very imperfect one and the bulbs will suffer very much. All late flowering bulbs, however, as Amaryllis, Gladiolus, Tuberoses, Ferraria, Japan Lilies and others, may still be planted. Be sure to place the bulbs so deep, as to have at least three inches of soil on the top of them, and be also sure, to surround the whole bulb with pure sand, that rich soil or manure may not come in immediate contact with the bulb.

This is the best month for pruning ever-blooming roses, cut them down freely; in fact, you can hardly prune them too severely. Spring roses, however, such as Banksia, Yellow Persian, Fortunes Yellow, Moss Roses and all of a similar description, should not be pruned now, but in the Summer, immediately after their flowering.

Very early flowering shrubs, such as Spirea, Deutzia Gracilis and Forsythia should not be pruned now, as it will injure their blooming.

If the weather proves dry and mild the seed of nasturtiums may now be put into the ground, if not already done in December.

Effects of Coffee on disease.

Dr. Mosely observes, in his "Treatise on Coffee," that the great use of the article in France is supposed to have abated the prevalence of the Gravel. In the French colonies, where coffee is more used than in the English, as well as in Turkey, where it is the principal beverage, not only the gravel, but the gout is scarcely known. Dr. Faur relates, as an extraordinary instance of the effect of coffee in gout, the case of Mr. Deveraa, who was attacked with gout, at the age of twenty-five, and had it severely until he was upwards of fifty, with chalk stones in the joints of his hands and feet; but for four years preceding the time when the account of his case had been given in Dr. Faur to lay before the public, he had, by advice, used coffee, and had no return of the gout afterward.

To Tell Good Eggs.

The true way to tell good eggs is to put them in a pail of water, and if they are good they will lie on the sides; always; if bad they will stand on their small ends, the large ends always uppermost, unless they have been shaken considerably, when they will stand either end up. Therefore a bad egg can be told by the way it rests in water—always end up, never on its side. Any egg that lies flat, is good to eat and can be depended upon!

To Keep dust From Cream.

HOOPS USEFUL FOR ONCE.—Take rattans and make hoops a little larger than the pans,—stretch thin muslin across, thin enough to admit some air, but not flies and mites. Cover the milk with these as soon as it is cool, and they will prove of great value.

THE NATIONAL MAGAZINE, of the Northern Methodist Church, which, in its earlier years, was one of the best in the country, died recently a natural death, having contracted, some time since, the disease which killed "Putnam," and other Magazines, abolitionism.

PEWS.—The Cincinnati Gazette says: "Selling and renting pews at high prices is equivalent to building a wall around the Church, and saying to all who cannot afford to pay the price of admission, 'Go you your way; you are too poor to seek conversion here.'"

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, January 1, 1859.

THE following table exhibits the ruling prices in our Cotton market this evening.

New Orleans Classification.

Inferior	6¾@ 7¾	Good Middling	11¾@12
Ordinary	8¾@ 9¾	Middling Fair	12¼@12¾
Good Ordinary	10¼@10¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¾@11	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	11¼@12¼	Good and Fine	—@—

The following summary, copied from the New Orleans Price Current, of 1st inst., furnishes the annexed statement of the week's business: The operations of the week have been but to a moderate extent, the business in Cotton being checked by a difference in the views of holders and buyers, unfavorable weather, and a poorly assorted stock offering; and in Sugar and Molasses by reduced supplies. Tobacco continues inactive and depressed, and most descriptions of Western Produce have been dull.....The river is but about four feet from high water mark.....The sales of the first three days of the week amounted to 22,500 bales, of which 22,000 bales were taken on Monday and Tuesday at a reduction of about ⅛c. The sales in the last three days of the week only reach about 10,000 bales; and the sales of the week to 38,500, and the receipts to 43,369 bales.

An active demand for Cotton, on Monday, aided by favorable accounts from Europe, enabled holders to realize full prices, the market closing with ⅛c advance, the sales fully reached 23,500 bales.

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to about 5,000 hhds.; we quote of inferior and refining, 3¾@4¼, common to good common, 4¾@5¼; fair to fully fair, 5¾@5¾; prime to choice, 6@7; centrifugal and clarified, 6@8¼; Refined, 8¼c ₱ lb.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 11,475 hhds; the quota thus being for inferior and fermenting, 25@27; prime to choice, 27½@28½, hf bbls: 32@33½c ₱ gallon.

FLOUR.—The sales of the week have reached about 10,000 bbls. at $4 92½@5 for superfine Indiana and St Louis; $5 25 for fancy, etc.; $5 50@6 00 for extra; and $6 25@7 25 for fir choice extra.

GRAIN.—The supply of Corn is light, and meet with ready sale at full prices—ranging from 75@80c ₱ bushel for yellow and white. Oats sell at 70@78 and 80c ₱ bushel, for good to prime old St Louis.

PORK.—The transactions in Mess have been at $18@18 50 ₱ bbl.

BACK.—Prime Mess and favorite brands, are selling at $12@$14.

BEEF.—Sales at for shoulders 7@7¼, ribbed sides 6@9¼, clear sides 9½@10c, and hams from 9½@14c ₱ lb according to quality.

LARD.—we quote at 11@12c ₱ lb, tierces and kegs.

BUTTER.—Western, 9@13; Roll, 20@22c ₱ lb.

COFFEE.—We quote 10¾@10¾c for fair to good fair; 11@11¼ for prime.

LIVE STOCK.—The supply is ample, and the market easy. We quote: Beef—Western, 7@10c, Texas, $9@35, according to quality; calves and yearlings, $8@11; Hogs 5½@6c ₱ lb; Sheep $3@0; Cows $16 @75 ₱ head.

From many TESTIMONIALS in possession, the following are submitted for the consideration of the public:

Case of Judge Wilson:

LYNCHBURG, VA., June 5, 1857.

MY DEAR SIR: I am glad to learn that you have concluded to spend a portion of the present Summer in the city of Richmond.

I suggested to you while in the city of New York, under your treatment last fall, that it would be an act of inhumanity on your part to do so, as it would be a means of enobling a greater number of those persons who were suffering under such painful affections, of seeking and obtaining relief.

My case was one of intense physical as well as mental suffering, was sufficient to satisfy me that your treatment of cancerous affections was exceedingly skillful. Indeed, the many cases of complete cure, which I witnessed in others, would have had that effect if you had failed in mine.

There has been no indication of a return of the diseases, and I am sure that the cure is radical and permanent.

For the many acts of personal kindness and attention, of yourself and Dr. Kennedy, please accept my grateful acknowledgments.

With my best wishes for your success and happiness, I am your grateful friend,

DANIEL A. WILSON.

To Silas T. Gilbert, M.D.

Case of Col. Sloan:

[From the Charleston Courier, Nov. 13, 1857.]

DR. S. T. GILBERT:

We have had the opportunity of seeing Col. S. F. Sloan, a well known and highly respectable citizen of Pendleton in this State. Col. Sloan informed us that he had been cured of a cancerous affection by Dr. Silas T. Gilbert, while he was in New York during the Winter of 1856, and that he wished to make the facts known for the benefit of persons similarly afflicted. He states that about six years ago the disease made its appearance upon his cheek in the form of a tumor, which afterwards ulcerated, but continued to enlarge and grow worse, baffling the skill of the medical men to whom he submitted his case for treatment.

In October, 1856, he went to New York to consult Drs. Gilbert & Kennedy. Having conversed with Hon. T. Butler King who was in the city, Captain Clarke of the Sun Mutual Insurance company, and other distinguished gentlemen who had been cured of cancer by Dr. Gilbert; those satisfying himself that the Doctor's claim to remarkable skill in the treatment of this disease was just. The Colonel placed himself under the care of Dr. Gilbert on the 1st of November, 1856. The tumor had at that time a diameter equal to that of a silver dollar. In nineteen days the diseased portion was removed, and the ulcer so nearly healed up that the Colonel thought himself justified in leaving for home, which he did; and in a few days after his arrival at home, the ulcer healed up entirely, and has remained so ever since. The cicatrix is perfectly smooth and healthy. There is not the slightest symptom of disease about it.

Too much credit cannot be given to the humane motives which prompted Col. Sloan to make this statement for the benefit of others. Upon this subject, the editor of the Philadelphia City Item remarks: "Unfortunately for the cause of suffering humanity, many who have been cured by Dr. Gilbert shrink from publicity; but enough remains to stamp him a great benefactor."

We take the occasion also to refer to the following testimonial from a well known citizen of Edgefield, S. C. which has just been forwarded to Dr. S. T. Gilbert, since the announcement of his arrival here:

EDGEFIELD C. H., S.C., Nov. 10, 1857.

DR. SILAS T. GILBERT:

Dear Sir: I am glad to learn that you intend to spend a portion of the season in Charleston, and hope that you will have a pleasant time, and meet with the abundant success which I believe your skill in your profession so fully merits.

I shall do all in my power to advise the afflicted to apply to you for relief, without delay. Yours, very truly,

E. PENN.

Case of Miss Eliza Smith:

"REMOVAL OF A TUMOR WEIGHING ABOUT SEVEN POUNDS."

[From the pen of S. B. Britton Editor Spiritual (N. Y.) Telegraph]

EXTRAORDINARY PROFESSIONAL SKILL.

We were next permitted to inspect the case of Miss Eliza Smith, of Maryland. The patient is now fifty four years old. For twenty three years of her life she has suffered from a loose fungus cancer on the right breast and side. The patient commenced the present treatment on the 11th day of October, and at the time we saw her (December 15th), the foul mass, weighing several pounds, was nearly removed.

CHESTERTOWN, MD., June 22, 1857.

DR. SILAS T. GILBERT:

Dear Sir.—Your letter of the 12th June is at hand. I often reflect upon the many acts of kindness that yourself, your father, and Dr. Kennedy have extended to me, and when I do so, my heart swells with gratitude towards you all.

My health since the 16th of February, 1856, the day that I left your office in New York, has been excellent. None but those who have been similarly affected can appreciate the emotions that I experienced when I found myself once again in the enjoyment of health, and the prospect of many happy days before me.

When my friends saw me come home cured, their astonishment was so extreme, that they could scarcely believe the evidence of their senses. They were at a loss to conceive how medical science could be brought to such wonderful perfection as was exhibited in the successful treatment of my case. Indeed the removal of a tumor of such enormous magnitude, without cutting it out, was enough to astonish any one.

Very respectfully,
Your grateful friend,
E. SMITH.

Case of Mr. L. P. Kennedy:

BUENA, ALLEGHANY COUNTY, N. Y., April 25, 1856.

Upwards of thirty years ago, a fungus cancer made its appearance upon the anterior part of my chest, to the left of the breast bone.

In the fall of the year 1836, I submitted to a surgical operation of having the tumor cut out. The operation afforded me no permanent relief. After this, I from time to time, placed myself under the care of a number of the most noted physicians with whom I was acquainted. They could not cure me.

On the 27th of Jan., 1855, I submitted my case to the care of Dr. Gilbert and Kennedy, of New York. By this time the tumor had become as large as my fist, and all times paining me severely and bleeding profusely. It had seriously affected my health. I was compelled to wear a net work of wire over it all the time, to protect it from irritation. My friends had despaired of my ever getting well—but Dr. Silas T. Gilbert, without the aid of any surgical operation, removed the tumor, and healed up the cavity entirely by the 23d of April, 1855, and I have remained entirely free from any symptoms of disease ever since.

While under treatment, I witnessed a number of other very remarkable cures performed by Drs. Gilbert and Kennedy. I sincerely and warmly recommend them to those who are afflicted with such diseases as they treat, as unrivalled in their profession.

L. P. KENNEDY.

In fulfillment of our promise, we went to 483 Broadway, and found in the rooms some thirty or forty persons, all under treatment for various kinds of tumors and open ulcers, some of which we had no hesitation in determining to be cancerous—some very large, some smaller. Some large scirrhous tumors had been fairly taken out, and were preserved in spirits, while the places they had occupied were open sores, though in the process of healing.

A number of the patients—we think most of them—assured us that they had consulted celebrated surgeons, and had been assured their cases were beyond the reach of blue healing art, and many beyond hope from the knife itself; yet we saw no case which did not bid fair to get well under the present treatment.

In one case of fungus hematodes the disease extended to the left carotid artery, so that, when removed, the vessel was uncovered for several inches. When we last saw this case the sore was nearly healed. Upon the whole, we were compelled to admit that what we had deemed incurable tumors and ulcers were, under the treatment of Dr. Gilbert, very manageable. We have seen several of the aforementioned patients from time to time since our first visit—some of them very recently. Several were perfectly cured, and were about returning to their homes; and all were evidently in a fair way of recovery. We have hesitated long and doubtfully, as to the course which we ought to take, as an editor of a paper, in this matter, and have come to the conclusion that we ought not any longer to delay giving the above information to the public. We are to derive no pecuniary advantages from it, nor do those to whom the paper belongs. We publish the foregoing facts and observations, solely for the benefit of the many sufferers who may be thereby pointed to a means of relief of which they might otherwise obtain no information.

CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

Little readers, the Editor wishes you all a "happy New-year." He forgot to wish you a "merry Christmas." That was bad, but you must forgive him. He puts a double good-wish in the happy New-year, to make up for his neglect. Did Santa Claus bring you anything at Christmas? Did you hang up your stocking?

What did you find in it on Christmas morning?

Well, you must all resolve to be better children, now that the new year has commenced. You must try to be better than you were last year. Be more obedient to your father and mother—be more loving to your brothers and sisters—be more friendly to all little boys and girls—be kinder to the servants—take better care of your clothes and books—clean your feet better when you come in at the door, of a rainy day—make less noise in the house—get up sooner in the morning, and be more industrious—keep better guard over your temper, and do not cry and quarrel about trifles, as you used to do—do not scream like a baby every time you stump your toe, or fall down—read your Bible more regularly, and say your prayers night and morning—get better lessons at school and Sunday-school.

You will be better children than you were last year, will you not? But us all try to do better. We may die before another New-year. We must have our sins pardoned through our Lord Jesus Christ, so that if we die we shall go to heaven. We must get to heaven by all means; if we do not, we shall go to hell, and be ruined forever. Let us all meet in heaven, dear little readers.

SUNDAY MORNING DIALOGUE.

"Good morning my little friend."

"Good morning, sir."

"When we last parted, you said, sin was the transgression of the law. I suppose you mean the law of God?"

"Yes, sir."

"The law of God says: 'Thou shalt not steal;' when a man steals, he breaks the law of God, and breaking the law of God, is sin. Now, what is it that sins in this case?"

"It is the soul, sir."

"The law of God says: 'Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy;' now when a man goes a fishing, or a hunting, on the Sabbath, or in any other way breaks the Sabbath, what is it that sins?"

"It is the soul."

"And are not all things that are wrong, against the law of God? And consequently sin?"

"Yes, sir, the Bible says, 'cease to do evil.'"

"And in all cases where any person does wrong, what is it that sins?"

"It is the soul, sir."

"Who then is the sinner, the greatest sinner in the world?"

"The soul, sir, indeed, the soul."

"Now, as you know the body must die, I will not ask about it. But does the soul die?"

"No, sir."

"What becomes of the soul of the sinner, when the body dies?"

"It goes to the bad world, sir; it goes to Hell."

"But can you give me any scripture in proof of this?"

"Yes, sir, 'The wicked shall be turned into Hell, and all of the nations that forget God.'"

"Well, are we not all sinners? And then must we all go to Satan, when we die?"

"No, sir, no, sir. "A Savior, sir; a Savior."

"Then you have also learned about the Savior, have you?"

"O, yes, sir, I have learned a great deal about Him."

"Will you tell me some of the things that you have learned about Him?"

"Yes, sir, God promised him to the world long before He came. The prophets wrote of Him, hundreds of years before He was born. He was miraculously born of a Virgin, in the land of Palestine, more that eighteen hundred years ago. He was very wise, and went about teaching and doing good, and was finally crucified for us, for our sins; and now, if we believe in Him and obey Him, we will be saved from Hell, and saved in Heaven when we die."

"Where did you learn all this?"

"My mother taught me, sir; and then I learned about Him at the Sunday-school, from my teacher, and in the Bible."

"That is all very good indeed; now tell me, do you think this keeping the Sabbath and going to Sunday-school makes you a good child?"

"Yes, sir, I think it helps; nearly all of our Sunday-school scholars are good children. They do not lie, nor swear, nor steal, sir, for they are taught better; and some of them pray and are Christians."

"Well, I suppose you must go now. When we meet again, we will talk more about the Sabbath, and other things." O. S. S.

LETTER FROM PINEY WOODS COTTAGE.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: As you have been so kind as to devote a column to us little folks, I thought I would get my mamma to write a little letter to you for me. I have not yet learned to write, but I can spell some. I am a little creole boy, I was born in New Orleans—but you can tell that little Texas boy, that I have been to Galveston, and I have been out on the big Prairies too, and gathered my hands-full of beautiful flowers; though I was so little, I can scarcely remember it. Now I live away off in the "piney woods," and we have no good Sunday-school to go to here like the little city boys—but I have a good mamma to talk to me, and she reads all the pretty Bible stories, and all the little boy's and girl's letters that you put in the Advocate for us. How sorry I am for the poor little boys and girls that have no good mamma and papa; I love you very much, because I know you love little children. I am going to try and be a good boy, and when I get to be a man, I think I will be a preacher. I have a little brother named Oliver, he is not yet three years old, but he can say his prayers: "Now I lay me down to sleep," like a little man. I love him very much; and when he is older, I will tell him all about Bittle Moses and David and the other pretty Bible stories. I have a little cousin, named Franky, staying at my grandmamma's; his mamma is an invalid, and cannot write for him, so he wants me to give his love to you, and tell you he will write a letter to you as soon as he knows how to write. But my letter is getting too long; my mamma says you like short letters best. But just let me tell you, that I have two good dear grandmammas to love and pray for me, and then I will bid you good bye for this time. Very truly your little friend, EVERETT W. SADLER.

HOW A POOR BOY BECAME A MERCHANT.

Children, and older persons as well, ought always to speak the truth, from a love of doing right, and a loathing of wrong. But it sometimes strengthens upright alms to know that honesty is the best policy, and that one who uniformly adheres to the truth, is certain in the end to prosper. The following story from the New York Chronicle has a moral for young readers:

Two country lads came at an early hour to a market town, and arranged their little stands, sat down to wait for customers. One was furnished with fruit and vegetables of the boy's own raising, and the other supplied with clams and fish. The hours passed along, and each little merchant saw with pleasure his stores steadily decreasing, and an equivalent, in silver bits, shining in his little money-cup. The last melon lay on Harry's stand, when a gentleman came by, and placing his hand upon it, said, "What a fine large melon. I think I must have this for my dinner. What do you ask for it, my boy?"

"The melon is the last I have, sir; and though it looks very fair, there is an unsound spot on the other side," said the boy, turning it over.

"So there is," said the man; "I think I will not take it. But," he added, looking into the boy's fine open countenance, "is it very business-like to point out the defects of your fruit to customers?"

"It is better than being dishonest, sir," said the boy honestly.

"You are right, my little fellow; always remember that principle, and you will find favor with God, and man also. You have nothing else I wish for this morning, but I shall remember your little stand in future."

"Are those clams fresh?" he continued, turning to Ben Wilson's stand.

"Yes, sir, fresh this morning, I caught them myself," was the reply; and a purchase being made, the gentleman went away.

"Harry, what a fool you was to show the gentleman that spot on the melon. Now you can take it home for your pains, or throw it away. How much wiser is he about those clams I caught yesterday? Sold them at the same price I did the fresh ones: He would never have looked at the melon until he had gone away."

"Ben, I would not tell a lie, or act one either, for twice what I have earned this morning. Besides, I shall be better off in the end, for I have gained a customer, and you have lost one.

And so it proved; for the next day the gentleman bought nearly all his fruit and vegetables of Harry, but never invested another penny at the stand of his neighbor. Thus the season passed; the gentleman finding he could always get a good article of Harry, continually patronized him, and sometimes talked a few minutes with him about his future hopes and prospects. To become a merchant was his great ambition; and when the winter came on, the gentleman, wanting a trusty boy for his store, decided on giving the place to Harry. Steadily and surely he advanced in the confidence of his employer, until, having passed through the various grades of clerkship, he became at length an honored partner in the firm.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

The Bird that Sang in May!

A bird last Spring came to my window-shutter,
One lovely morning at the break of day;
And from his little throat did sweetly utter
A most melodious lay.

He had no language for his joyous passion,
No solemn measure, no artistic rhyme;
Yet no devoted minstrel e'er did fashion
Such perfect tune and time.

It seemed of a thousand joys a thousand stories,
All gushing forth in one tumultuous tide;
A hallelujah for the morning-glories
That bloomed on every side.

And with each canticle's voluptuous ending,
He sipped a dew-drop from the dripping pane;
Then heavenward his little bill extending,
Broke forth in song again.

I thought to emulate his wild emotion,
And learn thanksgiving from his tuneful tongue;
But human heart ne'er uttered such devotion,
Nor human lips such song.

At length he flew and left me in my sorrow,
Lest I should hear those tender notes no more;
And though I early waked each morrow,
He came not nigh my door.

But once again, one silent, Summer even',
I met him hopping in the new-mown hay;
But he was mute, and looked not up to heaven—
The bird that sang in May.

Though now I hear from dawn to twilight hour
The hoarse woodpecker and the noisy jay,
In vain I seek through leafless grove and bower
The bird that sang in May.

And such, methinks, are childhood's dawning pleasures,
They charm a moment and then fly away;
Thro' life we sigh and seek those missing treasures—
The birds that sang in May.

This little lesson, then, my friend, remember,
To seize each bright-winged blessing in its day;
And never hope to catch in cold December
The bird that sang in May!

"As Usual."

"As usual," said a handsome fine-looking man, as he picked from the floor a spool of scarlet silk and an emery cushion of the same color, and tossed them ill-naturedly upon his wife's work table, "as usual, the contents of your work-box upon the floor. I scarcely know of which you remind me most forcibly, a careless girl of fifteen, or a slovenly old matron."

"The baby threw them there," said a delicate and almost angelically beautifully woman, as she raised her love-beaming eyes to his face.

And how did he answer that gentle apology, and the mild glance of those eyes, that said as plainly as eyes can say, "Call me pet names, love?"

"The baby threw them there," said he sneeringly, and pray what business had the baby with them. You are the most perfect specimen of female carelessness I ever beheld."

Could he have known the pain those words caused her, surely he would not have spoken them, but it was his way to speak reprovingly and authoritatively to his wife; it had been his way from the time the man of God had pronounced them one and inseperable, and he was no child to be changing his ways. That way was doing its work slowly, but effectually. The winter passed away, spring came with its buds and birds, and while all nature was reviving, the gentle Lucy grew fainter and feebler, until faintness and feebleness compelled her to pass a considerable proportion of each day upon her couch. Others saw it, he did not; others knew what must follow, he never dreamed of it: Why should he? Were not her eyes as sparkling as gems of the ocean, and did not her cheeks wear the most delicate carmine tint? She felt no pain, and of course made no complaint. But see him now as he misses her from the sitting-room, and goes to her chamber to seek her; surely he must be impressed with a sense of her danger, for it is not his way to step so lightly and gaze so fondly at his lovely wife, and their cherub boy. They are sleeping; her right arm is thrown lovingly and protectingly around her babe, the left hand reposes on her cheek, colorless, save one bright spot—her rich, wavy tresses are just enough disordered to suggest the idea of an angel's locks slightly ruffled by the light winds of Paradise, and the brow which they shade call up thoughts of pure white marble, richly veined with blue. All these things are noticed; he grows pale with fear, and wonders if it can be that disease has settled upon her system; he kneels by the couch to assure himself; he gently raises from her cheek the semi-transparent hand, one finger of which is bound with a small gold circle; that circlet awakens recollections long since dormant and unpondered, but how distinctly he now remembers the precise time, the identical spot, the pleasing circumstances in connection with that ring; it has a motto too, a motto that originated with him, and even now he sees the blush that spread itself over her sweet face as she read the engraving, and hears the unfaltering, but faintly articulated words of joy which she murmered, as he placed the bright pledge upon his finger. She was his lovely Lucy, then; she is lovely still, but he sees for the first time that her loveliness is fading, fast fading away; and he feels that if he be not the principal agency in the case, he has at least had much to do with it; he resolves to change his way, but his resolve comes too late for cure; it may mollify the wounds caused by the opposite course—it may lull the pain; but harshness, coldness, and neglect have so entirely transfixed the dart, that not even the strong hand of love can withdraw it. It was only his way. We see him once more as he kneels by the same couch, in the same room, and caresses the same form. No baby boy is by her now, he is crowing in his nurse's arms. No crimson spot beautifies her cheek—no labored breathing and quickly pulsating heart disturb her slumbers, the heavy braids of hair are carefully adjusted, and the thin white hands are folded on her bosom. He is weeping, and passionately kissing her brow and lips; his heart is filled with the saddest remembrances, the deepest regret, and he asks himself how he ever found it in his heart to treat her unkindly. It was only his way. [Methodist Protestant.

Young Ladies and House-work.

A friend of ours, remarkable for strong, good sense, married a very accomplished and fashionable young lady, attracted more by her beauty and accomplishments than by anything else. In this it must be owned that his strong good sense did not seem very apparent. His wife, however, proved to be a very excellent companion, and was deeply attached to him, though she still loved company, and spent more time abroad than he exactly approved. But, as his income was good, and his house furnished with a good supply of domestics, he was not aware of any abridgment of comfort on this account, and he, therefore, made no objection to it.

One day, some few months after his marriage, our friend, on coming home to dinner, saw no appearance of his usual meal, but found his wife in great trouble instead.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"Nancy went off at ten o'clock this morning," replied his wife, "and the chamber-maid knew no more about cooking a dinner than the man in the moon."

"Couldn't she have done it under your direction?" inquired her husband, very coolly.

"Under my direction? I should like to see a dinner cooked under my direction."

"Why so?" asked the husband in surprise, "you certainly do not mean to say that you cannot cook a dinner."

"I certainly do, then," replied his wife. "How should I know anything about cooking?"

The husband was silent, but a look of astonishment perplexed and worried his wife.

"You look very much surprised," she said, after a moment or two had elapsed.

"And so I am," said he; "as much surprised as I should be in finding the captain of one of my ships unacquainted with navigation. Don't you know how to cook, and the mistress of a family? Jane, if there is a cooking school anywhere in the city, go to it and complete your education—for it is deficient in a very important particular." [T. S. Arthur.

Destiny of Idle Bo

He who is idle and vicious in school is still more so when he leaves it. He who fires squibs will in time fire pistols; he who robs hen-roosts and orchards, will, probably, some day, rob pocket-books or safes. He may not do it in the way to expose himself to the penitentiary; he may have his wits so sharpened as to rob legally, by setting up a wild-cat bank, or betraying the confidence of his employer, or of obtaining possession of property without the means of paying for it, or of getting his hand upon the public coffers that he may fill his own, under the soft appellation of "breach of trust."

We would that you could see with your eyes for a little while; you would think with us, that he who, when a boy, could not be trusted, cannot now that he is a man. It would not be proper for us to mention names, or we could illustrate this by numerous painful examples. But they are not necessary. Effect will follow causes; as a man sows, so shall he reap; boyhood is the seed-time, of which manhood is the harvest.

Form, then, the habit, while young, of employing all your time usefully. Never be unemployed. The land is full of idlers, striving to live without labor. It is not to be supposed that you are never to take recreation; this is useful, it is necessary; but if it come after hard study or productive labor, it will probably be healthful and moderate. It is not to be supposed that a boy is to be a man—much less an old man; but in the midst of his mirth and hilarity, he may be innocent and amiable.

OBITUARIES.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. DESDAMONA SEALE, wife of Edward Seale, and daughter of James and Mary Mahon, died on the 5th of December, 1858, in Shelby county, Alabama, of bronchitis and pneumonia combined. Those excellencies which adorn the female character were beautifully exemplified in the life of the deceased. The affability of her manner and cheerfulness of disposition rendered her a favorite in the social circle, while her benevolence and unaffected sympathy for others, in misfortune and affliction, caused her to be much loved by her neighbors, and lamented by those who knew her. What language can express the anguish of spirit, the incalculable loss, of those who mourn the death of a devoted wife and mother? When her moistened brow and hard respiration indicated the rapid approach of death, she requested that those of her children who had not been baptized, should be given to the Lord by the administration of the ordinance; which was immediately done. She became a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, in the year 1837. From the day she joined till the day of her death, she continued a consistent, faithful member—often giving incontestible proof of her Christian life, by praises to God. During her last illness, her calm, strong, unshaken faith, was remarkable. She often spoke of death; and her husband frequently asked her about her future prospects. Her answers were —All is well! there is light in the valley. My confidence is unshaken. Making use of many other expressions, which she repeated with her dying breath. "O, heaven—Sweet heaven! when shall I get there?" A remarkable circumstance occurred the day before she died. One of her neighbors, a man of great wickedness, had previously become offended at her; and did not visit her until he was convinced that she would die. As he entered the room she called him by name, and, as he caught her extended hand, she said, "Mr. ——, I am trying to die right; if I have done you a wrong, I want your forgiveness." He replied, "Oh yes! oh yes! I forgive you; but you have not done me any wrong. You must not talk; it will fatigue you." "No, no; I know I am dying, and going to heaven. Will you meet me there?" He answered, "I will." "Are you willing to go down on your knees, and let these Christians pray for you and me?" As he consented, the tears gushed from his eyes, and he fell upon his knees; fervent prayer was then offered to a throne of grace, in his behalf. Many cheering songs were sung, and prayers offered at her request; and many, and satisfactory, were the answers given to neighbors, respecting her certainty of heaven. A short time before she breathed her last, she called her children around her. She talked to them one by one; advised the unconverted of them to seek religion. At length she came to her little boy, about eleven years old, who had previously professed religion. "Simmy," she said, "I dislike to leave you; will you meet me in heaven?" His answer was quick and prompt, "Yes, mama; I will." She then requested her brethren and sisters to make her children the objects of constant prayer. After having committed them to the Lord, she again repeated, "O heaven—Sweet heaven!" and died. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." "For, I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us." AN EYE-WITNESS.

MRS. ELIZA D. MILLS, died of pneumonia, on the 5th day of December, 1858, at her residence, Perry's Bridge, Vermilion Parish, Louisiana, in the seventy-third year of her age. She was born in Charleston, S. C., was the daughter of Richard and Sarah Humphries. In her twentieth year, she was married to Thomas Mills. After residing in the cities of Philadelphia and Baltimore, emigrated to Attakapas, Louisiana, in 1835. Here, being left a widow, the evening of her life has passed in works of grateful devotion in the cause of God. In Philadelphia, she became a member of the Presbyterian Church. But finding no organization of that church here, she attached herself to the Methodist Church, of which she remained as exemplary and useful member to the close of her life. She soon became warmly attached to the peculiarities of Methodism. Her house was for many years the welcome and hospitable home of the itinerant preacher. She died as she had lived: Full of faith and of the Holy Ghost. She leaves a large family of children and grand-children to mourn her absence. But most of them have yielded to her pious admonitions, and are on their way to meet her in the skies. May they all speedily embrace that religion that gave her triumph in death. And may we all meet her in the sun-bright clime. Amen.

GASTON MARTIN, son of Mr. G. T. Raoul, died on this evening of the 22d December, 1858, at Pouchitoula, La., in the 7th year of his age. E. R. STRICKLAND.

We've laid thee in thy narrow bed,
Dear boy, with many parting tears—
Ah! little thought we, thus thy head
To pillow, in its infant years.

Thy little life was dear to us,
And love would fain have kept thee still,
But shall our selfish hearts refuse,
To bow us to our Maker's will?

He bids us render up the trust,
Our grasp would still so fondly hold,
It wrings our hearts to leave thy dust,
In this damp bed, so lone and cold.

We know thy happy spirit soars
Far off, to realms of light and joy,
But, O! the harder lot is ours—
We can but miss the darling boy.

We'll miss thy little agile form,
At every hour, in every place—
Our household joy has lost a charm,
That leaves on every heart a trace.

We'll miss thee at the early morn—
We'll miss thy step the livelong day;
And when the twilight hour comes on,
We'll miss thee in the children's play.

We'll miss thy little simple prayer,
Repeated at thy parent's knee,
The loving kiss and good night there,
O! blessed be its memory.

No more we feel thy fond caress,
No more we press thee to our heart,
Yet shall thy precious memory bless,
Tho' for a season, now we part. H. S.

JANE KNOX, died October the 8th, 1858, aged twelve years, of a putrid sore throat; the last scenes around the death-bed of this promising child, deserve more than a passing notice. She was a bright example of living faith, and proved clearly that Jesus can make a dying bed,

Feel soft as downy pillows are.

While the poor child lay in that transition state, which was so soon to transplant her into Paradise—while the pain of the throat was agony itself—she called her friends around her, and told them how happy she was; how glad that she was going to die, and live forever with her Savior. She said, "I see the angels—my father and my brother; they say, be good, Jane; thy Heavenly Father has sent for thee." She exhorted all her companions to love and serve God—to meet her in Heaven. Every one who had shown her kindness, she thanked in the most grateful terms, with the same request, "Meet me in Heaven." To Mrs. H., who had the charge of her, she expressed the most beautiful thoughts and sublime feelings. All the pain she was enduring, was nothing to the joy she anticipated in being in a few moments in the arms of her Savior. Her last words to her dear friend, Mrs. H., were words of gratitude and love; and in her arms she sweetly breathed out her young life, full of the hope of a blessed immortality.

EUPHEMIA BUTCHER, daughter of Amos and Eliza Butcher, died, in her fifteenth year, of influenza, at the residence of her uncle, near Vermillionville. She was slightly complaining of sore throat for a week, when, on the night of the 28th, her disease assumed the malignant form of influenza, which defied all remedy from her attentive physician, and terminated in death on the 30th of October. Death, thus suddenly, snatching the young from the walks of the living, and consigning her a place amid the darkness and gloomy quiet of the tomb. A little more than a month ago, she united herself with the Methodist Church at Vermillionville. She was resigned to death. Her aunt told me, that just before her death, she said, "Look at the pretty beings; they have come for me;" and, raising her hands toward Heaven, shouted, "Glory," and expired. May God sanctify this sad and unexpected dispensation of his providence to the eternal good of the friends she has left to mourn her loss; and may the young who read this notice, see the truth of Christ's words—"For in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh,"—and prepare for that certain hour.

W. P. RIMBALL.

JOSEPH ROBINSON, youngest son of Captain John and H. Robinson, was born the 18th March, 1856, and died July the 10th, 1858, in his third year. He went to join his two little brothers, who had gone before. They are now rejoicing and singing praises to God, and are waiting to greet their kindred in Heaven. It is sad to see one so amiable and lovely, thus stricken down in the bloom of childhood; his kindness and gentleness of disposition made him the blessing of his family. He was so affectionate, that he won the love of all who knew him. He has left an affectionate father and mother, one tender brother, and a sweet little sister, to mourn their loss, which is their eternal gain. Farewell, dearest, we will meet the again, where our joys shall never end, and parting is no more.

MRS. M. B. RAGAN died at her residence, in Thibodaux, on the 21st of November. The deceased departed this life after a protracted illness, of long and painful bodily suffering; but, with her usual Christian fortitude she endured all, and now lives to enjoy those endless and unsearchable promises secured to those who believe that Christ is ready and willing to save. The past life of Mrs. Ragan was of a pure and stainless character; we have known her since our earliest boyhood, and feel positive of support in the assertion that, her noble and generous actions will remain long in the hearts of thousands. Above all her strict and unwearied adhesion to those invaluable precepts, which alone give peace beyond the grave. Truly,

"None knew her; but to love her,
None named her, but to praise."

THE GREATEST
Medical Discovery
OF THE AGE.

MR. KENNEDY, of Roxbury, has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures

EVERY KIND OF HUMOR,

From the worst Scrofula down to a Common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases, both thunder humor. He has now in his possession over one hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

Two bottles are warranted to cure a nursing sore mouth.

One to three bottles will cure the worst kind of pimples on the face.

Two or three bottles will clear the system of biles.

Two bottles are warranted to cure the worst canker in the mouth and stomach.

Three to five bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of Erysipelas.

One or two bottles are warranted to cure all humor in the eyes.

Two bottles are warranted to cure running of the ears and blotches among the hair.

Four to six bottles are warranted to cure corns and running ulcers.

One bottle will cure any scaly eruptions of the skin.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the worst kind of ringworm.

Two or three bottles are warranted to cure the most desperate case of rheumatism.

Three to four bottles are warranted to cure the rheum.

Five to eight bottles will cure the worst case of scrofula.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the above quantity is taken.

Nothing looks so improbable to those who have in vain tried all the wonderful medicines of the day, as that a common weed growing on the pastures, and along old stone walls, should cure every humor in the system: yet it is a fixed fact. If you have a humor, it has to start. There are no IFS nor ANIFS, burns nor buts about it, nothing some cases, but not yours. I peddled over a thousand bottles of it in the vicinity of Boston. I know the effects of it in every case. It has already done some of the greatest cures ever done to Massachusetts. I give it to children a year old, to old people of sixty. I have seen poor, puny, wormy-looking children, whose flesh was soft and flabby, restored to a perfect state of health by one bottle.

To those who are subject to a sick head ache, one bottle will always cure it. It gives great relief in catarrh and dizziness. Some who have taken it had been costive for years, and have been regulated by it. Where the body is sound it works quite easy, but where there is any derangement of the functions of nature, it will cause very singular feelings, but you must not be alarmed; they always disappear in from four days to a week. There is never a bad result from it; on the contrary, when that feeling is gone you will feel yourself like a new person. I heard some of the most extravagant encomiums of it that ever man listened to.

Manufactured by DONALD KENNEDY, No. 120 Warren street, Roxbury, Mass. Price $1 per bottle.

LETTER FROM THE EAST.

Route—Druses Journeying to Mount Lebanon—Sources of Jordan—Holiday among the Druses, the Women and Children—Ruins—Druse Temple of Worship and its Priests—Refreshments.

Our route led up hills of a most bleak and forbidding aspect, of a most tedious ascent, without the shelter of a tree to shade us from the heat of the sun, except one, a small ever-green oak, under which we took shelter to take our lunch. We traveled over a most desolate region, but would look back and take a view of the sea of Galilee. We travel over much ground, by ascending hills, but the distance when we looked back appeared but little. We came down upon the romantic valley of Safed, whose ruins we saw upon the summit of a hill at considerable distance. This valley was a great level, for it was flowing with streams of water, and filled with gardens upon its sides where the vine was growing in rich abundance, and the almond tree large as a hickory-tree, most beautifully green and loaded with fruit, though as yet quite small. The whole valley was rich in productions peculiar to the East. The mountain-gorges were terrific---we went down some places so steep, that the party were obliged to leave their horses and walk. But the valleys were clothed with verdure: the fig and pomegranate, orange, lemon and vine, put forth their branches in rich luxuriance, wild and romantic as the region appeared.

Here, in Safed, the Sea of Galilee was seen through the mountain-gorges as though it were close by, although we had been all day climbing the hills and going down them to reach it. Upon the cliffs of the mountain are the ruins of a castle destroyed by an earthquake, which commanded one of the most magnificent views of the whole country below, with the sea, Tiberias and the mountains beyond.

In our ride to-day, we came upon the sight of the snow-capped Hermon, and have kept it in sight all the day; our ride was among precipitous hills, as frightful as any we have trod, and scenes of peculiar aspect in bold and frowning cliffs. We are now in a valley sitting in a grotto, and where we camp for the night, and have felt for some hours the force and beauty of the figure of the shadow of a great rock, in a weary land. Here are departments for horses in case of necessity, and a complete protection from rain in a storm. Before we reached here, we met a whole caravan of the Druses, from Mount Lebanon, going down to Tiberias to enjoy the hot-baths. They were all well dressed, women and children veiled to their eyes, and the men well armed, about a hundred in all, we should think. Tiberias is their Saratoga watering place. Before me on this plain lies the Lake Meron, through which the Jordon passes—and towering away on my left hand is Mount Hermon, over whose height we saw the sun rise in magnificent grandeur, casting his rays over this valley of Naphtuli, once blooming in beauty, where the tribes of Israel revelled in its rich luxuriance, now desolate and dreary—where the wandering Bedouin pitches his tent and occupies the ground.

We started this morning from the plains where Joshua slew all the kings and took possession of the land, even unto the Mount Halek that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad, in the Valley of Lebanon under Mount Hermon. (Josh. 2, xvii.) So Joshua came, and all the people of war with him, against them by the waters of Merom, suddenly, and they fell upon them.

And when all the kings were met together, they came and pitched together at the waters of Merom to fight against Israel. Here Joshua conquered their armies, and hocked their horses and burned their chariots with fire. The grounds were favorable for the mighty armies—the plains so wide and extensive; and hills, for a sudden rush upon their enemies by the circuitous route, winding around among them. The Lake and tributary streams of Jordon, now form one of its most interesting features. The large encampments of the Bedouins form a contrast to some of the other tribes we had seen, their houses were built of cane, like basket-work or bee-hives, giving them a novel appearance in this wild country. They had immense herds of buffalo feeding in the valleys and wallowing in the pools of water like the Hippopotamus. Hundreds of these animals in a drove watched by herdsmen. We sat upon a bank with a reed making a rude kind of music, characteristic of their race. Some arable land which they cultivate with grain, but most of it is pasturage for their cattle, which are very numerous.

We attempted to ford the Jordan, but the stream was too deep and rapid, although very narrow, but we found a bridge higher up, built of stone, safe and strong. We ascended a hill on the other side, almost impossible to climb, it was composed entirely of stone, one lying above another, detached from any kind of earth; such a rocky country as we traveled over surpasses anything of the kind.

We reached a little hill-side, however, a lovely green spot, said to be the site of the city of Dan, with which we most grateful to our sight, where we halted and refreshed ourselves among flowering shrubs and cool breezes under the live-oaks which overshadowed us. This beautiful little hill was isolated and stood alone in the valley, surrounded by mountains on all sides—between the two gorges arose the snow-crowned summit of Hermon of considerable height, forming a variety among the grand and picturesque scenery which surrounded us. We soon approached the ruins of Banias, or Cæsarea Philippi of the scriptures. It is situated in one of the most wild and picturesque regions we ever beheld, where the beautiful and sublime meet to form one of the most lovely sites for a city in the world.

We entered the grotto first, formed in a rock which is one hundred and seventy feet perpendicular; beneath is a fountain under its shelving sides, which looks like a deep pool of water—but seeks an outlet upon a hill-side, where the waters gush forth horizontally at a considerable width, and rush down in a stream, forming one of the tributaries of the Jordon. On the side of the rock, are arched recesses with the sculptured shell in its ceiling, as if desired for a statue—a Greek inscription is seen over one. It is supposed to be devoted to the God Pan. The name of Agrippa is carved over one higher up the rock. The grotto has the appearance of arches beneath, now filled up with earth and rubbish; around upon the side of this perpendicular cliff is a terrace, where a small arched temple is built, which commands a splendid prospect of the wild romantic scenes below. The ascent is difficult, up a ragged footpath, and steps to reach the building, but we were amply repaid for the effort. It appeared to be a fete-day among the Druses, who were assembled to enjoy their sports—about a hundred women and children were dressed in gay costume, enveloped in white veils, but their faces exposed, so we could judge of their features; men also in groups, and nine were engaged in a dance something like the Polka, all locked together and moving in a circle, keeping time with the rude music of the reed, which one young man was playing their natural wild airs with great interest, the party were keeping time and moving with grace; the ladies took no part in the performance, but were priviledged to look at their movements. They seemed to be much engaged in their sports, the object of which we could not tell. We enjoyed the prospect to perfection, which overlooked the ruins of once magnificent city, if we could judge by the remnants which remain—some foundations of temples or palaces upon the terrace surrounded by beautiful water-falls and flowing streams, running in every direction among rocks of the most romantic character; where broken columns and broad, flat stones, which were once pavements or walls of former buildings, scattered about. We rode over bridges and under arches; where the lofty walls were still standing, showing the magnificence of some former designs in courts and squares. The rushing waters of the tributary streams of the Jordon met, and made waterfalls which tumbled down the ledges of the rocks with a continual roar of a torrent, whirling and tumbling like a cataract. Large mounds of earth and square stones which formed the foundations of buildings, rose in magnificence with trees and bushes springing from their crevices.

These ruins were detached, and surrounded with fig and olive trees, growing in wild luxuriance; olive orchards were flourishing near the city, and vegetation was more luxuriant than in other wild places. The summit of the hill, was a thousand feet above the city, crowned with a ruined castle, which may be seen at a great distance.

We rode round the city, in some places in water-conductors made of hewn stone, as the bridge was not seen, and this was over a ravine thickly lined with trees.

People inhabit this village, living in terraced houses on some of the driest spots; the roads and passages, from one place to another, looked fearful.

We left in the morning, passing through one of the most beautiful oak groves we have seen in the country; and at its extremity we looked down over the valley of Naphthula, with Hermon and the mountains beyond, which lined its borders with sublime grandeur—a relief, in this region of rock, delightful to the soul.

This day we left Palestine and passed into another region. Our course lay towards Hoshieza, a large and populous village, embosomed among high and lofty hills. The mountain gorges were frightful, with bold and precipitous sides, we found our way up and down by zig-zag roads.

We came upon the site of a Grecian temple near a little village—pronounced by Dr. Robinson, the most perfect in its design and style of architecture of any in this part of the world—one wall is still standing, composed of very large and massive stones; the cornice is broken, but the corner retain their pilastres and Ionic capitals. The inside is broken, but its niches retain the finish of the artistic style of the Romans. It is situated on the top of a romantic hill, and stands in a field amid olive trees, where nothing correspond with its character, unless it be the bold aspect of nature. It numbers back thousands of years—its history, date and objects, being alike unknown. It is a beautiful specimen of antiquated, workmanship, having the marks of refinement and taste affixed to it.

We left for the city of Hoshieza. This is a wonderful place for the Eastern world, situated in a valley, among hills seven hundred feet high, terraced with trees and houses almost to the top—the roofs of the houses are covered with earth and the walls are of stone. It was one of the most respectable places we have seen. The inhabitants are composed of Druses, Roman Catholics, and Greeks. There are 3000 Druses, the largest sect in the place, an English church, and an American Missionary establishment with a school, a mosque and minaret and the palace of an emir. The country around is very fertile, at least, within its environs. The people are well dressed and amiable, but as soon as our tents were struck in the valley, they were surrounded by crowds of people, hundreds collected to see the strangers; they crowded around our tents and rushed into them as if they had nothing else to do or from idle curiosity, very annoying to us. We had to drive them away. They were handsome in person, at least most of them were, and the children were beautiful. They have such a desire to see how the Europeans dress and to examine their clothes.

In the morning we procured a guide to visit the Druse temple of worship and see the priests. Their buildings were upon the brow of the hill, in a cluster, like a village detached from all other people. There was nothing about any of these houses which looked like a place of worship, but were told that the one into which we were conducted was a place of prayer—a low, mean-looking room, without the least appearance of a chamber, or anything designed for such a purpose. Several priests were present, should think a dozen, who lived in that sacred seclusion—some marry, but most of the number were single. The houses were terraced, with earth upon the top, and steps to go up upon the outside; its roof commanded a fine prospect of the Mediterranean sea, and of the village and the country around. Mount Hermon rose in lofty grandeur beyond, ten thousand feet above the level of the sea.

The priest appeared pleased with our coming, and treated us with kindness; was anxious we should stay dinner, which we declined; they insisted however upon our eating with them, they spread a straw mat under an oak tree, and brought figs, dates, nuts, honey and sweetmeats to refresh us; we could not refuse so much kindness.

They are a singular people, very exclusive, having no intercourse with other sects. They have no stated season of public worship, so our guide told us; but read and pray by themselves. Of their methods we know nothing, and this is the first time we have come in contact with the sect, so numerous in this part of Syria.

We went down the valley again, to see another source of the river Jordon, which issues from a fountain rising beneath a rock, and it rolls off in a stream mingling with other streams, forming one of its chief branches.

We are now within four hours ride from Damascus, having rode all the day along a rough, rocky road through snow banks, along mountain passes many thousand feet above the level of the sea. Snow, in some of the vallies, was lying twenty feet deep, and more. Flowers were blooming by its margin, and the snowdrop was seen in its native soil, in primitive beauty. The purple hyacynth, too, opened its petals to the mountain air, in its own wild home of solitude and silence.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI.—No. III.

Congregational Church.

Mr. Editor: In all I have seen published on the subject, I discover that the Annalists of the Baptist Church, have committed a variety of errors in attempting to give a history of the origin of their church in Mississippi. This I attribute solely to the want of correct information on the subject, which it was not in their power to obtain at the time and place of writing. Some of these errors I will briefly notice.

First, They confound Richard Curtis senior, with his fifth child, Richard Curtis junior, who was the first Baptist preacher in Mississippi; and, hence, they represent their first preacher as being quite an old man with a large family when he emigrated to this country. This is a mistake; Richard Curtis senior, was an old man with a large family at the time of his removal, but his son Richard Curtis junior, was at that time a young man, only about twenty-five years old, with a small family.

Second, Two of their Annalists, who seem to have derived their information from the same source, affirm that the Baptist Church "was the first Protestant community formed in all the wide region of the South-west, below the Cumberland settlements in middle Tennessee." This is also an error, for as I have shown in a previous number, Rev. Samuel Swayze, with his Congregational Church in the Jersey settlement, had preceded them about ten years.

Third, They are also at fault in fixing the time when their first church, under a regularly ordained minister, was organized. The prevalent opinion seems to be that it was in 1795 or 1796. But this could not have been the case, unless it was done in secret, and without an ordained minister, for according to the best authenticated accounts the Spanish government did not terminate in the Natchez District until the 30th of March, 1798; and such was the avowed and uncompromising hostility of the Catholics to the Baptists, that we cannot believe they would have permitted the organization of a regular church while they had authority to prevent it; moreover, Mr. Curtis fled from his relentless persecutors, on the 23d of August, 1795, and did not return to the country as an ordained minister until the termination of the Spanish rule. In the Spring of 1798 is as early as we can fix the organization of the first regular church after the ordination of Mr. Curtis. While I do not claim exemption from unintentional error, it may be well for me to refer to my available sources for correct information.

First, I am a lineal descendant, on my father's side, from the emigrant family that constituted the first Baptist Church in Mississippi. Second, I am familiar with the uniform family tradition in relation to the facts which I shall narrate. Third, I have in my possession reliable family records dating back one hundred and fourteen years. Fourth, I was born and raised, and now live in the vicinity where this emigrant family connection first settled in this country. And fifth I have conversed with a number of aged persons, who in their youth were familiar with the persons and scenes I shall bring to view. Having said this much by way of introduction to the origin of the Baptist Church in Mississippi, I will approach the subject more directly in my next.

No. IV.

Mr. Editor: About the year 1743 there lived somewhere in the region of Petersburg, Virginia, a newly married couple, of Welch descent, by the name of William and Phebe Jones. Mr. Jones soon after died, leaving a young widow and an only son by the name of John. Within a few years of the death of her husband, Mrs. Jones married the man who will hereafter be known in this narative as Richard Curtis senior, by which marriage they had five sons, and three daughters.

After the marriage of Mrs. Jones to Mr. Curtis, we have no very satisfactory knowledge of the family for about thirty years. At the breaking out of the revolutionary war they were found in South Carolina, on Great Pedee river, not far from the mouth of Black river, and about sixty miles from Charleston. John Jones, the son of Mrs. Curtis by her first marriage, had grown up to manhood, and married as early as 1768. At the declaration of Independence, he ardently espoused the cause of the revolutionists, served in three campaigns against the British and Tories, and was in several battles, including the siege of Charleston. By the close of 1779, Mrs. Jones and the Messrs. Curtis, including his stepfather and half brothers, had rendered themselves so obnoxious to their Tory neighbors by their devotion to the Colonial cause, that they found their situation not only vexatious but perilous. In the meantime several of the leading members of the united family had embraced religion, and joined the Baptist church; among whom were John Jones, William, Benjamin, and Richard Curtis and their wives, John Courtney, who had married Hannah Curtis, and John Stampley, who had married Phebe Curtis, daughters of Richard Curtis Senior. We may safely presume that Richard Curtis senior and his wife were also members of the same church. Richard Curtis junior was a licensed preacher at the time of their removal from South Carolina.

While they were annoyed by "wars and rumors of wars" at home, they had heard much said about the salubrious climate, rich lands, exhaustless range, and abundance of game in the Natchez country, and being oppressed in mind, and well nigh exhausted in property by the horrors of war at their very doors, they determined to seek a peaceful home in the far off Western region. Accordingly in the Spring of 1780, they proceeded by land across the country to the Holston river in the north-eastern corner of the State of Tennessee. There they paused to build their boats, during which time they raised a crop of corn for the sustenance of their families. When the water had attained sufficient depth for navigation, about the latter end of that year, they, with other emigrant families, embarked all their earthly substance in three large and well built flat boats, and committing themselves to the protection of God, commenced their perilous voyage.

Such were the natural difficulties in the way of navigation in those early times, that it was, at best, a hazardous undertaking to descend the Holston, Tennessee, Ohio, and Mississippi rivers in such water craft as they were then able to construct; but what made it doubly hazardous was the belligerent stand which the Cherokee Indians had taken against all emigration through their country. They often availed themselves of narrows, shoals, and sudden turns in the Holston and Tennessee rivers to attack emigrant boats. Our voyagers being fully aware of that fact, went as well prepared for it as they could, and kept a constant watch for the approach of their stealthy foe. We, who have had "peace and truth in our days," think it strange that our forefathers would thus, not only peril their own lives, but also the lives of their wives and little ones; but they had already become inured to the horrors of war, and viewed such adventures very differently from what we do. These emigrants, for the sake of mutual protection, agreed to float as near each other as convenient. The foremost boat contained Richard Curtis senior, and his immediate family, including John Jones and his family, and his own sons and daughters with their families. The second boat contained two brothers by the name of Daniel and William Ogden, and a man by the name of Perkins, and their families, most of whom were Baptists. I have no record of the names of those in the third boat. They seem to have fallen in with the other boats for the sake of protection in descending to Natchez. They had in some way contracted the small pox, and to prevent its spread to the other boats, they were required to float a few hundred yards in the rear. After floating unmolested for several days, the hostile savages espied the boats somewhere below the mouth of Clinch river, and fixed on a short bend in the Tennessee river near the north-western corner of Georgia, as the place of attack. The foremost boat, having to float near the shore to keep in the channel, was violently assailed by the lurking Cherokees. All hands on board commenced a vigorous and well directed defence. Mrs. Jones held up a thick poplar stool between her eldest son, William, then in his twelfth year, and the bullets, while he plied the oar; and it was well she did, for it was pierced by one or more bullets. Mrs. Jones, after the danger was over laughingly remarked "that their guns were very weak, as they did not make a very deep impression on the stool." Another lady heroically took the steering oar from her husband, that he might ply his rifle on the foe, and with unfaltering courage guided the boat until disabled by a wound in the back. Hannah Courtney was grazed on the head with a ball, and Jonathan Curtis was slightly wounded on the wrist; but, so far as I know, no life was lost. The second boat, in the mean time, having passed the point of attack, floated by unharmed. The exulted and blood-thirsty savages now directed their whole force to the capture of the third and last boat, and, as it passed the narrows, they boarded it in full force, and killed all on board except one lady, whom they retained as a captive for several years, until, by treaty, she was restored to her friends. But this was a dear-bought victory to the Cherokees, for either from the captured lady, or goods they contracted the small pox, which passed through their villages like the destroying angel, until multitudes of them died. When suffering from the raging fever and thirst, occasioned by the terrible epidemic, they sought relief by lying in the waters of the Tennessee, which only made it the more fatal. Their descendants have, to this day, a traditional horror of that terrible pestilence. It was impossible, from the slow and unwieldly movements of their flat boats, for those who had escaped to round to time enough to afford the captured boat any assistance, even if they had not been so far outnumbered as to render the attempt worse than fruitless; so with gratitude to God for their deliverance, and sadness and sorrow for their lost fellow-voyagers, they pursued their dangerous way, until they landed in safety at the mouth of Coles creek, about twenty miles above Natchez, to the eastward and southward of which they made their settlements.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

"Home," Claiborne County, Dec. 24, 1858.

Mr. Editor: I improve the earliest opportunity since my return from Woodville, to give you such of the proceedings of the Mississippi Conference, as may interest your readers. You were present, I believe, from the second day, to the close of the session, and will doubtless favor your readers with an editorial notice of the acts and doings of the Conference.

The various interests of the Church were duly considered, both in Lay-session and the Conference. The Educational, Missionary, and Periodical causes, were reported upon as usual by committees appointed for that purpose. Centenary College and Sharon Female College were both represented as in prosperous circumstances. These are the only strictly Conference Schools we have, and were both recommended to the patronage of our people. Favorable mention is made also, in the report on Education, of the following schools, academies and colleges, they being mostly, if not altogether under the management and control of ministers and members of our church, viz: Madison College, at Sharon, Madison county, Miss.; "Southern Female College," near Rocky Springs, in Claiborne county, under the Presidency of Dr. Thomas H. Capers; "Port Gibson Female Collegiate Academy;" "Mount Hermon Female Institute," near Clinton, Miss.; "Young Ladies Institute," under the direction of the Misses Chamberlain, Natchez, Miss.

A resolution (proposed by a special committee, to whom the subject was referred,) was adopted, authorizing the Presiding Elder of the Clinton (La.) District, in connection with the Quarterly Conference of Clinton Station, to employ an agent to solicit aid in the establishment of a Female school of high order at that place, to be under the patronage of the Mississippi Conference.

As we propose the publication of our minutes in pamphlet form, I conclude not to send entire reports to the Christian Advocate.

The action of the Committee of the Whole, in lay-session resulted in a more satisfactory report on this subject than we have had for some time; and yet there was one feature wanted in this report, which the committee could not supply, i. e. a detailed account of our Domestic Missions. The preachers who occupy missionary ground ought to come up to Conference, prepared to report the precise condition of their work, and a full description of their mode of operation during the year. The Secretary of our Conference Missionary Society, under the present plan, can only report the condition of the finances. This is only repeated by the Treasurer, and we are unable to present our people with such account of our missionary operations as is furnished in some of the other Conferences.

You heard Bro. Lambuth's (our China Missionary) letter read to the Conference. You saw the sensation it produced. As a Conference we should be profoundly grateful that we have such representatives in that far off field, as our beloved William and Mary Lambuth. There is in many portions of our Conference the, liveliest solicitude for their success and happiness.

There had been some mismanagement in some way, of certain lands intended for their benefit, which had been donated by particular friends and placed under the direction of the Board of Managers of the Parent Missionary Society. The Mississippi Conference took decisive action upon this subject, and resolved, if possible, to secure the directions of these funds, according to the original design of the donors. We were pleased to learn, on reaching New Orleans after the adjournment of our Conference, that the Venerable T. C. Thornton, the devoted, enthusiastic friend of the mission, has ascertained that the sum of $500 or more perhaps, of the funds above mentioned were on deposit in that city, and subject to the order of the Mississippi Conference. Rev. J. R. Lambuth, the father of our missionary, was authorized by the Conference to forward this money to his son, by the most direct route. So, we now have hope, that the aid and relief we promised, will soon reach our friends in China. The Missionary report, or such portions as may be deemed important, will be published.

The Mississippi Conference adopted the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and appointed B. M. Drake, Wm. H. Watkins and J. J. Wheat, as members of the Publishing Committee. Entire satisfaction was expressed with the educational management of the Advocate, with the exception that some thought Mr. Gillespie, ought not to be too severe on the Colonization Society.

The Quarterly Review, Home Circle, and Sunday School Visitor, were each recommended to the patronage of the Church and people.

The great question of a Conference Depository, came up in due course, and was discussed by two or three brethren. The "Plan of the Financial Secretary" was not adopted by the Mississippi Conference. The Resolution approving this plan was laid on the table. I send herewith the Resolutions that were adopted on this subject as they passed the Conference. We have a Conference "Book and Tract Society" with us, already chartered and controlled by share holders, constituting a joint-stock company. Many of the Conference were unwilling to acknowledge our ownership of this establishment. But by a test-vote, it was determined that we should recognize this as a Conference enterprize, at least so far as we had the right under its charter. The Conference then recommended that this be conformed as far as could be, consistently with said charter, to the plan prepared by the Financial Secretary.

You have already been furnished a list of the appointments. I can only furnish the aggregate statistics for the year. The entire table would occupy too much space. Total white membership, including probationers, 18,157, Colored members and probationers, 14,500. Local Preachers, (D's and E's included) 207. This exhibit shows an increase over last year in the white membership of 1115. A decrease in the colored membership, of 303. And in number of Local Preachers, 2. Some of our colored missions were not reported, and it is possible that a full report would at least show that we have had no great falling-off in this department of our work.

Four of our beloved brethren had died during the year, viz: Preston Cooper, Green M. Rogers, Benjamin J. Woodward and Samuel Dawson. These were all on the superannuated list. They had served the Church faithfully in their day. Two of them especially had labored long, in the cause of Christ—travelled extensively, Preston Cooper and Green M. Rogers. The other two had not so long been in the effective work. They were each of them beloved while living, and their death is a loss to the Church. They rest now from their labors, no doubt their works will follow them.

The following preachers were admitted on trial; Nathaniel S. Cornell, William B. Lewis, Andrew J. Wheat, William Glass, William H. Lyon, J. J. Millsaps, C. G. Andrews, R. J. Jones, Jr., James C. Taylor, N. B. Young and Robert B. Downer. From the representations given of these brethren, we have certainly a valuable addition to our effective force.

Richard T. Henmington, W. W. Graves, R. Abby, W. H. Scales and H. Copeland, were admitted into full connection, and W. B. Johnson, re-admitted. Located—James Walton and W. H. Germany and H. Avent, at their own request.

George T. Vickers, T. M. Ward and J. W. Adams, are the Supernumeraries. James Owen, J. J. E. Hird, J. B. Higginbotham, J. M. Turner, T. Clinton, P. James and H. Mullins, Superannunted.

Our Missionary collections amounted to $14,236 81. Of this amount, the Bayou Pierre Circuit paid, I think, $1960. This was the Banner Circuit; and next to this, if I remember rightly, the Society at Rocky Springs, Mississippi, gave the most to this cause.

The Conference Stewards reported, that the sum of $7,766 was necessary to meet deficits, and the claims of supernumerates, widows and orphans. Of this amount, however, only $3205, 90 was collected. They settled with the claimants accordingly.

A financial plan was adopted in lay-session, which I will furnish for publication, by which we hope to improve somewhat. I have noted all I can get now,

H. J. Harris, Secretary.

Reports:

For the purpose of securing uniformity in our financial operations, your committee recommend the following

Plan:

First, The Preachers in Charge shall, at the earliest convenience of those concerned, call a meeting of the Stewards who shall ascertain the amount needed in support the preacher or preachers on their Circuit or Station, as also the amounts appertioned by the District Stewards or Presiding Elder, to meet the claims of the Presiding Elder and of the superannuated Preachers, their wives, and the widows and orphans;

Second, This amount shall be divided out among the entire membership, according to the respective ability of each—by the Stewards, or, by a Committee of from three to six of each church, chosen from among the members thereof;

Third, The Stewards, or Committee provided for in the second item, shall notify each member as soon thereafter as practicable, of the amount assessed to him or her; or any other method they may deem best.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

L. Ercanbrack, Chairman;
H. Jones,
J. P. Thomas,
Jno. H. Stone.

The said Committee to whom was entrusted the duty of devising a plan for raising funds for the purpose of meeting the claims of our Bishops, superannuated Preachers, their wives, children, widows and orphans, ask leave to report that they have given the matter due consideration; and, as the result of their deliberation, would respectfully present the following

Plan:

First, It shall be the duty of the Financial Committee of the Conference to ascertain, at each Conference, the whole amount necessary to meet the claims of the Bishops, superannuated Preachers, their wives and children, and the widows and orphans, for the succeeding year;

Second, It shall be the duty of said Committee to make an apportionment of this amount to the Presiding Elder's Districts, according to their respective abilities;

Third, It shall be the duty of the District Stewards, and, in case of failure on their part, of the Presiding Elder of each District, to apportion to the several Stations and Circuits of the District, according to their several abilities, the amount thus assessed;

Fourth, It shall be the duty of the Stewards of each Station and Circuit to collect and deliver to the Preacher in Charge, Presiding Elder, or Lay Delegate of said Charge, the amount to them assessed, to be paid over at Conference to the credit of said Station or Circuit;

Fifth, To all Circuits, which the Presiding Bishop and Committee on Missions shall deem unable to support a Preacher, an appropriation shall be made from the funds of the Missionary Society, sufficient to insure the disciplinary allowance of the preacher or preachers of said Charge.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

L. Ercanbrack, Ch. } Preachers.
H. Jones, }
J. R. Lambuth, }
Jno. H. Stroud, } Lay Delegates.
J. P. Thomas, }

Amendment to Report:

Sixth, It shall be the duty of the Preacher in Charge, to furnish the Annual Conference a full statement certified to by the Recording Steward, of the amount of money allowed him for his support by the Board of Stewards of his Circuit or Station, and the amount of such sum collected and paid to him; also, the amount of money collected for the support of the Bishop, superannuated Preachers, their wives and children, and the widows and orphans.

THE BOOK OF RUTH.

It is said that Dr. Samuel Johnson on one occasion had gathered around him that select circle of literary friends, who often met to hear the recitations of each other's productions of genius, or to listen to such results of literary discovery as any one might find among the unknown relics stowed away in the corners of great libraries, or among restored fragments of ancient learning which were now and then brought to light. At this interview the celebrated critic and essayist read to his friends what he said was a pastoral in prose, or what they might call a Bucolic or a Georgic, if they could give it a name, and locate its authorship and character. After reading from some manuscript or scattered leaves this entire book of Ruth, his literary associates were enraptured with admiration. They inquired where such an original and matchless production had originated; how it came to be known? and they declared that in all their classical readings they had never seen it, nor the like of it; and that such a relic of literature was now destined to immortality. The reader at length told them that this literary gem could be found in their printed Bibles, far back among the unread records of the Jewish judges and kings; and that, in neglecting these ancient chronicles for heathen classics and for modern literature, they had overlooked the fountain of the purest learning.

Valuable and Rare Book.—A minister has left for sale, at the Depository of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, No. 821 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, a copy of the first edition of the Greek Testament by Erasmus, printed in 1516. A quarto, well bound, and a most beautiful specimen of early typography. The present owner intends that the proceeds of the sale shall be a donation to the Colportage Fund of the Board of Publication. Price thirty dollars. May it find a speedy purchaser.

The purest and finest impression of the Bible is to have it well printed on the reader's heart.

MILTON ON SELF-ESTEEM.

But there is yet a more ingenuous and noble degree of honest shame, or, call it if you will an esteem, whereby men bear an inward reverence toward their own persons. And if the love of God, as a fire sent from heaven to be ever kept alive upon the altars of our hearts, be the first principle of all godly and virtuous actions in men, this pious and just honouring of ourselves is the second, and may be thought as the radical moisture and fountain-head, whence every laudable and worthy enterprise issues forth. And although I have given it the name of a liquid thing, yet it is not incontinent to bound itself, as humid things are, but hath in it a most restraining and powerful abstinence to start back, and glob itself upward from the mixture of any ungenerous and unbeseeming motion, or any soil wherewith it may peril to sustain itself. Something I confess it is to be ashamed of evil-doing in the presence of any; and to reverence the opinion and the countenance of a good man rather than a bad, fearing almost to be virtuous; yet this is but still the fear of infamy, and many such, when they find themselves alone, saving their reputation, will compound with other scruples, and come to a close treaty with their dearer vices in secret. But he that holds himself in reverence and due esteem, both for the dignity of God's image upon him, and for the price of his redemption, which he thinks is visibly marked upon his forehead, accounts himself both a fit person to do the noblest and godliest deeds, and much better worth than to deject and defile, with such a debasement, and such a pollution as sin is, himself so highly ransomed and ennobled to a new friendship and filial relation with God. Nor can he fear so much the offence and reproach of others, as he dreads and would blush at the reflection of his own severe and modest eye upon himself, if it should see him doing or imagining that which is sinful, though in the deepest secrecy. How shall a man know to do himself this right, how to perform his honorable duty of estimation and respect towards his own soul and body? which way will lead him best to the hill-top of sanctity and goodness above which there is no higher ascent but to the love of God, which from this self-pious regard cannot be asunder? No better way doubtless, than to let him duly understand, that as he is called by the high calling of God, to be holy and pure, so is he by the same appointment ordained, and by the church's call admitted, to such offices of discipline in the church, to which his own spiritual gifts, by the example of apostolic institution, have authorized him. For we have learned that the scornful term of laic, the consecrating of temples, carpets, and table-cloths, the railing in of a repugnant and contradictive mount Sinai in the gospel, as if the touch of a lay Christian, who is nevertheless God's living temple, could profane dead judaisms, the exclusion of Christ's people from the offices of holy discipline though the pride of a usurping clergy, causes the rest to have an unworthy and abject opinion of themselves, to approach to holy duties with a slavish fear, and to unholy doing with a familiar boldness. For seeing such a wide and terrible distance between religious things and themselves, and that in respect of a wooden table, and the perimeter of holy ground about it, a flagon pot, and a linen corporal, the priests esteem their ladyships unhallowed and unclean, they fear religion with such a fear as loves not and think the purity of the gospel too pure for them, and that any uncleanness is more suitable to their unconsecrated estate. But when every good Christian, thoroughly acquainted with all those glorious privileges of sanctification and adoption, which render him more sacred than any dedicated altar or element, shall be restored to his right in the church, and not excluded from such place of spiritual government, as his Christian abilities, and his approved good life in the eye and testimony of the church shall prefer him to, this and nothing sooner will open his eyes to a wise and true valuation of himself, (which is so requisite and high a point of Christianity,) and will stir him up to walk worthy the honourable and grave employment wherewith God and the church hath dignified him; not fearing lest he should meet with some outward holy thing in religion, which his lay-touch or presence might profane; but lest something unholy from within his own heart should dishonor and profane in himself that priestly unction and clergy-right wherein Christ hath entitled him. Then would the congregation of the Lord soon recover the true likeness and visage of what she is indeed, a holy generation, a royal priesthood, a saintly communion, the household and city of God.

AMERICAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.

We give another article, says the Christian Advocate and Journal, respecting the American Sunday-School Union, and hope it may be the last. We believe our readers are growing tired of the discussion, and have fully made up their minds about it, as we have allowed both sides to speak largely enough. The question is simple, and embraces about the following points:

1. The American Sunday-School Union has no direct relation to our church. We have a Sunday-School Union of our own, and it suffices for our wants.

2. There are Methodists in the management of the American Sunday-school Union, good men, who have a perfect personal right to be there.

3. As most of the denominations represented in its management are Calvanistic, its theology, it is alledged by Methodists, is liable to be tinged by Calvanism, notwithstanding its rule not to be sectarian.

4. Its agents and colporteurs are not sufficiently explicit in explaining the relation, or rather non-relation, of the Methodist Episcopal church to it. They have very generally, according to our correspondents, given a vague if not a false impression on this subject.

5. The correction of this last difficulty could easily be made by the proper instruction of agents by the authorities of the Union. The great grievance alledged by Methodists is, that the authorities do not give such instruction. The main controversy could be ended by their attention to this point, and we urge the duty upon them; they will lose more than they can possibly gain by its neglect, and the hostile discussions thereby occasioned. The American Sunday-School Union has its appropriate sphere in the land, especially in destitute places; Methodists do not wish to impair its legitimate usefulness. They would feel it a sin to do so. Let the Union then save them the necessity of further disputing about this matter, and may God bless both parties with wisdom and charity to do well their rightful works.

QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Brethren in different Conferences have manifested much interest in the Southern Quarterly Review, and have resolved to make extra efforts for its continuance and support. The Agent has been so far encouraged as to determine upon the issuance of the first number for 1859. It will, however, be sent to no one who has not paid in advance. He is determined to adhere to the cash principle. Those, therefore, who wish to receive the Quarterly, will accompany the order with the money, $2. To those who have subscribed, we will send the January number promptly. It may be that we have not received the post-office address of all who have subscribed. If any of our brethren fail to receive the first number, they will greatly oblige us by giving their names and post-offices correctly, and they shall be furnished without delay.

We have published a large number of extra copies, that we may be able to supply those who may desire to subscribe for the work during the first quarter of the year. Send on subscribers, brethren, and sustain this excellent work.

Agent.

Good on the Violin.—"Well, Mr. Robinson, and how does your son get on with his violin?" "Astonishingly! there were fourteen of us playing together last night and he took the lead." "Capital—admirable!" "Yes, and he kept it so well, sir, that none of us could catch him!"

THE NEW VOLUME.

The first number of the next volume of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, will be the issue of February the 3d—that will be our New Year's Day. Have we not a right to hope that our friends will send us a "New Year's Gift," in the shape of a large list of new subscribers, with the money in advance? Will not each preacher, each friend, each reader, remember us on that occasion? We trust so. We are too modest to say more on this subject.

We shall print a larger edition than usual of that issue, so that new subscribers, received for a few weeks afterward, may get the back numbers, and thus commence with the volume—a thing very desirable. Those commencing then will always know when their year is out, and when they ought to renew.

The commencement of a new volume is a time when it is usual for some to discontinue. We trust we shall receive no such New Year's message as that. We wish to retain all our old subscribers, and get thousands of new ones.

A GOOD BEGINNING.

Rev. J. B. Powers, Harpersville Circuit, Ala. Conf., sends us nine new subscribers, by the first letter after Conference. What would be the result, before the end of the year, if he should keep on at this rate, and if all our preachers should be equally industrious and energetic in your behalf! O for an awakening in this matter! Would that we could send the Advocate, as a messenger of peace and love, and as a means of intellectual and social quickening and refinement, into twenty thousand families, instead of only seven thousand! What a power would be exerted, for the awakening and conversion of souls, for the sanctification of the Church, for the dissemination of right sentiments, for the comfort of the bereaved and afflicted and poor, for the right training of the children!

And brother Powers proves that a circuit or station, where the interests of the Advocate are attended to, is generally prosperous otherwise. He says:

I closed my first round yesterday. This is my second year on this work. Our prospects are good. Last year we received 250 on trial, and they stand firm—the Christmas Holidays have not led many astray. There seems to be a good religious influence all around the work; we look for a gracious revival this year. Our prayer is, "O Lord revive thy work." I send you nine new subscribers, and will soon send you some more. We have set in to build a parsonage, and intend to complete it before we stop. We have over one hundred dollars subscribed in a few days; no difficulty in the way, if we go to work in earnest. We will have it done by Spring, ready for use.

"SOUTHERN AID SOCIETY."

The name and doings of this Society have been before the public for years. It reports itself as doing a considerable amount of good, and in many religious newspapers, of a certain class, very earnest commendations of it are to be found. We have decided objections to it.

1st. Its Societarianism. It is a voluntary society professedly organized for the purpose of advancing the Cause of Christ; and yet it is wholly disconnected with, and independent of the Church of Christ. It is true it is not by itself in this feature. But this is against it instead of for it. It is a new addition to the strength of that already gigantic evil, which we will call "Societarianism," which is threatening to swallow up the Church of God altogether.

We have heard much talk of the conflict of Christianity and Infidelity; of Protestantism with Romanism; of Evangelical Religion with Sacramentarianism; of Orthodoxy with Latitudinarianism. But the time is coming, we apprehend, when the most dangerous conflict will be between the Church of Christ and Societarianism. Give this view to largest possible application, and you will understand what we mean. Societies are even now seeking to usurp the perogatives, as "the pillar and ground of the truth," and the instrumentality of the world's reformation and conversion, which belong only, and that by divine appointment, to the Church of God.

2d. Its Northernism. Its name, "Southern Aid Society," is an offence; as though the South were a missionary field, whose heathen were to be evangelised by the benevolent contributions and labors of Northern Christians and ministers. Any Southern man, or minister, or church, receiving aid from such a society, has a spirit unworthy the soil and latitude. It is perfectly right and proper for any church to raise missionary money, or church-extension money, where it pleases, and expend it where it pleases. But that a society should be established in the North, to raise money for the South, is a presumption not to be tolerated.

3d. Its Sectarianism. The name is a deception, intentional, we fear. It seems to be catholic, intended to aid destitute churches and ministers of whatever denomination. Whereas, the real state of the case is about as follows: A missionary or minister of a certain denomination goes to Texas, or Louisiana, or Arkansas, or to any other State where that denomination has but little strength, and writes back to the North for aid from the above society, representing the country as in "great religious destitution." When, in most cases, other denominations have ministers, churches, stations, circuits, sunday-schools, camp-meetings and revivals, all over the very region in question. So that "money is obtained under false pretenses," the country is misrepresented and injured, the labors and successes of other christian denominations are ignored—What for? For sectarian purposes.

4th. Its Invidious. It makes a great show in anniversaries, annual reports, annual addresses, and the like; but it does not tell exactly what it has done, where it has done it, by whom it has done it, unto whom it has done it, the amount in each case, and how it has been applied. These things are all secret. Why? Ah! "There's the rub."

In the last Nashville Advocate, which, we presume, had not the supervision of the editor, as he had hardly got to work so soon after his return from the Louisiana Conference, we were surprised to see, in the letter of a New York correspondent, a long and laudatory account of the recent anniversary of the above society, with not a word of editorial comment. Are our church-papers to advertise these sinister interests, and gratis at that?

THE OLDEST WORKING METHODIST PREACHER.

Daniel Webb, of Providence Conference, is the oldest effective Methodist preacher in the United States, if not in the world. The New Bedford Mercury says: This gentleman, so well known in this city and elsewhere as one of the most remarkable preachers and worthiest of men, has been passing a few days with his son, Otis Webb. In 1831, the venerable man succeded the Rev. Timothy Merritt in the Elm-street Methodist Episcopal Church of this city. He labored in that church two years with great acceptance. He preached last Sabbath at the Fourth street Methodist Episcopal Church, and in the evening attended a Conference meeting at the Allen-street Vestry. He has been more than sixty years in the ministry, and is now, we believe, the oldest active Methodist preacher in the United States.

THE CASE OF JUDGE WATROUS.

The name of this distinguished gentleman—distinguished alike for his eminent abilities and high position—has, for many years, been before the country, charged with official corruption, in his capacity as Federal Judge of the District of Texas. Twice has the case been before Congress—once before a Committee of the House, and recently before the House itself. The professed object, on the part of his accusers, was, in both cases, to procure his impeachment by the House, that he might be sent to the bar of the Senate for trial. In the first case, the Committee, after a full examination of all the evidence, refused to recommend the House to impeach him. In the second case, the Committee recommended the House to impeach him, which that body has recently refused to do. In the latter case, if we are rightly informed, he, and his most intimate friends, courted the impeachment, that he might have the benefit of a full and fair investigation. But this the House has refused, some of the most able and intelligent men of the Union, Mr. Stephens of Georgia among them, after a thorough sifting of the case, declaring that the charges had no foundation. His case is precisely similar to that of an accused man against whom a grand jury has refused to find a bill.

We have lived in Texas for several years, and traveled extensively over its territory. We know Judge Watrous well, and have known him but to esteem and love him, as a Christian, a gentleman, and a judge of eminent abilities and great industry; and we have taken some pains to become informed in regard to the charges against him. And, as we have before said in the Texas Advocate, we are possessed of a decided conviction that he is an innocent and persecuted man. We may be in error; if so, our consolation will be, if it is made to appear, that we were honestly and conscientiously so. In that case, we shall be as ready and frank to admit it, as we now are to express our present opinion. This opinion is confirmed by the fact, that some of the best and most eminent legal men in Texas, who personally know the whole history of the case, positively assert his innocence, and the frivolousness or maliciousness of the charges. And we have yet to find the first man, whose position and legal knowledge gave him distinguished influence, who asserted, on the ground of personal knowledge, the truth of any of the charges.

But, as it seems impossible to end the case otherwise, we regret that the House did not send him to the Senate for trial. But this, we imagine, was not Judge Watrous' fault. The case has been decided in his favor by the House—equivalent to a declaration of his innocence—by a body as competent to decide as is the Senate; and the case should be regarded by the country as finally settled. With the evidence before them, had there been crime, it could not have escaped the scrutiny of the House. It should be remembered that it is an easy thing to make charges against a man, in many cases more than he can clear up in a life-time. Judge Watrous' friends assert, whether true or not we cannot tell, that the object is, to continually agitate the charges, but to never let the case reach a final investigation—thus perpetually annoying and injuring him before the uninitiated public. The question is often asked, "Why does he not resign?" The reply of his friends is, "this would be granting all that is sought by his accusers, besides tacitly admitting the truth of their charges, and thus blackening his name by his own act." In the mean time, let it be remembered, that none of Judge Watrous' decisions, against which complaints have been made, has ever been reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, if we are correctly informed.

SOUTHERN METHODISM IN OREGON.

The Pacific Methodist says that the introduction of our Church into Oregon has been only a question of time, and it will not remain a question at all much longer. The cry, Come and help us, has been made again and again, and has elicited a heart-response every time. In the Pacific Conference we have the men ready to go the moment they can be spared with a due regard to the claims of the work already on their hands here. That period is at hand, we trust, and the probabilities are, that immediately after the arrival of Bishop Pierce, the pioneer band of Southern Methodist preachers will take up their march for Oregon. We know a dozen who are ready to go at the bidding of the church.

We have before us a letter from an intelligent christian gentleman in Oregon, urging speedy action on the part of the Pacific Conference with regard to the organization of our church there. The writer mentions several prominent points at which ministers of our church are needed, and would be favorably received. "Especially would this be the case," says the writer, "if the right kind of men were sent—men of one business, and men who will emphatically mind their own business. Send us good men—men of God, that have the Spirit and the power." Ah, yes! these are the men needed everywhere. May God multiply the number of such! "I am satisfied [we quote from the letter] that it is the duty of our Southern brethren to send ministers of the gospel to Oregon, notwithstanding it may appear for a time the day of small things. If they are the true ministers of Christ, they will not despise such."

THE COLONIZATION CAUSE.

Some time since, we published an editorial adverse to the Colonization cause, and deprecintory of the Liberian enterprise. We knew not, then, that some of our best friends, and some of the oldest and wisest of our ministers, had been, and were still, its stanuch advocates. At the Mississidpi Conference, while we were on the floor, representing the interests of the paper, objection was made to the article named. Rev. Henry J. Harris, Secretary of the Conference, in a communication in this paper, alludes to it. It was an objection not by the Conference but by individuals. But we have no desire to discuss the matter. Our own individual opinion has already been expressed, somewhat thoughtlessly perhaps. However, we only ask the same charity from those of opposing opinions that we extend to them.

Were it not for the attacks of Northern papers, the organs of our church would never agitate any question connected with Slavery. Abolitionists are responsible for free negrodom—a growing social and political disease—and let them be responsible for its cure, without our help. The Southern, and only true philosophy, for the remedy of this evil—which increasingly afflicts the North—is, to place them back again in their true and happiest relation, as Paul did with Onesimus. Let the South not stultify herself by the partial adoption of a different philosophy.

FENCE RIDING.

Judge Green, of the Lebanon (Tenn.) Law-school, some time last year, wrote a letter to the American Tract Society, in which he admitted that "slavery is an evil, morally, socially, and politically;" and declared that he did not defend it. He was attacked in several papers, particularly those of Montgomery, Ala. Of this he has made great complaint, in his attempts at defence. We judge that all sensible people will know how to class him, without any help from his pen, or from resolutions passed by his students. Connection with these "societies," located in northern cities, and trying to "ride the fence" on this subject, always gets men into trouble, sooner or later. "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light," etc. There is a "philosophy" in these societarian connections, as well as in certain ecclesiastical and literary ones, that facts will develop after awhile.

PERSONAL.

Rev. William H. Watkins.

We have heretofore forgotten to call attention to the fact that the name of Rev. W. H. Watkins was omitted, we know not how, in the list of appointments of the Mississippi Conference, published, some time since, in this paper. He is stationed, for the present year, at Kingston. We learn that he is editing the papers of the late Dr. Winans, and that before long, the public may expect to be favored with the publication of part of them, at least. Mr. Watkins is well prepared, as to literary taste and judgment, for the charge of so important an undertaking.

Rev. Franklin C. Wilkes.

We notice that our friend and brother, Rev. Dr. Wilkes, is Presiding Elder of the Galveston District, Texas Conference, and also Biblical Lecturer at Soule University. He is eminently qualified for both places. There are few preachers, in Texas or elsewhere, possessing more analytical power, or a more pungent style, than Dr. Wilkes. He has taken a high position in Texas as a preacher of the gospel. We are glad that Texas appreciates the interest she has in him.

Rev. James C. Wilson.

James C. Wilson, distinguished as a soldier, a lawyer, an orator, a statesman, and a gentleman, has received, during the past year, that higher in being made the instrument, as pastor of the Church at Gonzales, in the conversion of many souls, there and in the surrounding country. We see that he is returned to Gonzales for the present year. Texas, and the whole Church, has a large and deep interest in him. May the Lord bless him abundantly!

"honor that descends from God,"

Rev. Lewis B. Whipple.

Bishop Pierce, with that wise and discriminating foresight which characterizes him, has returned Mr. Whipple to the important charge in Galveston for another year. Having had the yellow fever last year, and being a devoted and able minister of the gospel, there was a peculiar propriety in his return. When we left Galveston, the first of last July, we never saw a Church under better pastoral cultivation than his. Young in years, much usefulness is before him, if he lives.

Rev. E. E. Wiley, D. D.

President Wiley writes to the Nashville Advocate of a gracious revival at Emory and Henry College. He says: Up to this time eighty of our students have joined the Church on probation, and forty have professed religion. Among these are many of our most substantial and promising young men. There has not been much of the noisy or boisterous in this work; occasionally, however, the shout of a new-born soul is heard amidst the sobs of penitents and rejoicings of experienced believers. A deep conviction for sin, and of the reality of religion, as well as a fixed purpose to find pardon in Christ, constitute the elements of the feeling which prevails in our College community. Inexpressible is our gratitude to God for these displays of his grace in the hearts of these young men."

Rev. W. J. Sasnett, D. D.

The Columbus Ga. Times, speaking of East Alabama Male College says: The College building is said to be one of the most beautiful and imposing structures of the kind in the Union. The endowment fund is to be about one hundred thousand dollars, about seventy-five thousand of which is already received. This College and endowment altogether, is a noble scheme, which, when completed, will remain an enduring monument to the noble and generous people who are engaged in the enterprise. The Trustees, at a recent meeting, unanimously elected Dr. W. J. Sasnett, now President of La Grange College, as the President of the Alabama College. In this selection, they have displayed great wisdom and judgment. Dr. Sasnett enjoys a wide and brilliant reputation in the world of letters and the cause of education. He is yet comparatively a young man, in the prime of life, and in the vigor of manhood.

Rev. R. H. Rivers, D. D.

A Correspondent of the Nashville Advocate, gives an account of a revival in progress at Florence Wesleyan University, and thus speaks of President Rivers: "The various chairs in the College are filled with an able Faculty, with Dr. Rivers at their head as President. Dr. R. is no ordinary man, but is eminently qualified for his station, and works with a will. The principal elements which enter into his composition being brain and nerves; when the former acts the latter takes fire, and he consequently moves with the energy of a steam-engine. He labors immensely, delivering ten lectures, of an hour each, every week, besides preaching once, and sometimes twice, on Sabbath. With such a man at its head, any institution ought to succeed."

Rev. James Porter, D. D.

A few days since we had the pleasure of a visit from Dr. Porter, one of the Book Agents of the Northern Methodist Church at New York. We also enfoyed an evening's conversation with him around our own fireside. Representing, as we regard him, the very straitest type of New England Methodist preachers, we confess to a rare pleasure in having him for a time in association with us of the extreme Southwest. The comparison of notes in such cases is both pleasant and profitable. Some New Englanders may somewhat modify their views of our institutions by visits South; but not so with Dr. Porter. We suppose, however, he regards us as incorrigible, as we regard him. But we have long since learned, and felt anew in our intercourse with Dr. Porter, that men of views as wide asunder as the poles may be brethren in Christ.

Rev. Geo. W. Carter.

The Memphis Advocate says: "Rev. G. W. Carter D. D., of the Virginia Conference, but now a transfer to ours, was with us last Sabbath. He preached a most excellent, pointed, practical sermon to a large and attentive audience at Ashury Chapel in the morning, and also in the afternoon at the State Female College. Brother Carter enters upon his duties in the Mississippi University forthwith." We join with our brother of the Memphis Advocate in welcoming Dr. Carter to the Southwest.

RESULTS IN INDIA.

At a recent missionary meeting in Liverpool, the Chairman, Rev. C. M. Birrell, alluding to a statement made by Sir J. Brooke, the rajah of Serawak, that Christian missions up to this time had proved a failure, and that no progress had been made with the Mohammedan and the Hindoo, stated that the actual and perceptible fruits of the missionary labors of Baptists in India had been proceeding at a constantly augmenting ratio. From 1793 to 1803 there were 26 natives who publicly avowed their Christian profession; in the next ten years there were 161; in the next ten years, 403; in the next ten years, 675; in the next ten years, 1,045; and the average ratio during the current ten years was 2,000. At the end of 1850, the Christian church in India had 551 native preachers, 309 native churches, 17,356 communicants, and 103,000 professed Christians. There are 1,345 day-schools under the charge of missionaries, in which 83,700 boys were receiving a Christian education in their native language; and what is more remarkable, 13,950 girls are in the day and boarding schools. They have brought out grammars in Sanscrit, in Telinga, in Mahratta, in Punjabi, in Cingalese, in Chinese, in Javanese. They have compiled dictionaries in Sanscrit, Bengalee, Hindostanee, and Malayan, for the sake of translating the Bible. The Old and New Testaments have been translated into the ten principal languages of the country.

Renunciation of Popery.—It is computed that since the work of evangelization how progressing in Ireland commenced, Popery has been renounced by not less than 100,000 souls.

Protestantism.—There was not a single Protestant minister in Belgium twenty years ago. Now there are 15,000 Protestants, and eighteen congregations composed exclusively of converts from Romanism.

BUDDINGS.

At the anniversary of the Missionary Society of the Mississippi Conference, at Woodville, it was resolved to raise twelve hundred dollars, extra, during the present year, to send another missionary to China, from that Conference. Cannot each Conference in our Connection do the same? It would not be doing more for China than is demanded from our church in that great field now open to us. If the Bishops, at their next meeting at Nashville, in April next, were to take hold of the enterprise, and call upon the Conferences to do so, the money and men would be ready by their next sessions.

At the anniversary of the Missionary Society of the Louisiana Conference, in New Orleans, five hundred dollars was raised to establish a Mission in Central America. Unless the "authorities" of our church move in that direction, we fear that a filibuster missionary enterprise will deprive the church of her rightful though neglected honors. When will such a Mission be projected, and a channel opened for the Christian enterprise and benevolence, ready for several years past to flow into it. A Mission might have been in operation in New Granada long ago, and history and God will hold somebody responsible for the neglect.

GRUMBLING ABOUT THE NEW PREACHER.

We have some good people among us who have the unfortunate habit of always finding fault with the Bishop, for not sending them a preacher to their liking. What a pity! The Bishop did the very best he could for them. The whole field had to be supplied, and he had only so many with which to do it. What else could he do than what he did? And perhaps God has sent you the very preacher you ought to have. If the Bishop has made mistakes he could not help it. Nothing short of omniscience could. And what good will grumbling do? It will only injure your spiritual condition, and prevent the new preacher from doing as much good as he might do. You have no right to do either of these wrongs. You may be found fighting against God, against the salvation of your own soul, and of that of others. Take care what you do! Are you not constitutionally a fault-finder? Is not this your besetting sin? Poor Methodists those, who do not stand up to their own preacher!

CONSISTENCY.

The papers of the country are making great ado about a certain clause in the Constitution of North Carolina, to the effect that "no person who denies the being of a God, or the truth of the Christian religion," shall hold office under the State. We do not favor any such restrictions; but we think it a little remarkable that these sharp-eyed guardians of civil and religious liberty have never discovered the fact that the constitutions of several States—North Carolina, South Carolina, and Texas among them—have a similar "disability" clause in reference to certain American citizens, simply because of their vocation—that of the ministry. Let us not waste all our patriotic breath about Rotchschilds, and others.

J. R. GRAVES.

This gentleman, who has been regularly expelled from the Baptist Church, but has placed himself at the head of a faction of his own, is thus hit off by a Nashville correspondent of the Southern Advocate:

"Last Sunday night I dropped in at Firemen's Hall and heard the "last of the Mohegans"—ex-elder J. R. Graves. I was led there, I must acknowledge, through mere curiosity. His sermon was the conclusion of his morning sermon from the entire book of Esther. In the course of his remarks he said, 'you all know that our own beloved Bro. Holmes was the first to baptise New England with Baptist blood.' Umph! thought I, Query. Was this baptism by affusion or immersion? What say you Mr. G.?"

"In the pulpit he is very rampant—and in grimaces surpasses any monkey we have seen."

LOANING CHURCHES.

A correspondent of the Southern Churchman complains that two Episcopal Churches were loaned to the Methodists, during a late session of the Methodist Conference in Norfolk. The Editor replies: Last Summer this matter was very thoroughly argued in our columns, and it was shown beyond the slightest shadow of a shade of a doubt, that there is no canon which forbids the loan of an Episcopal Church to a denomination of Christians for the purpose of worship. At one time it was thought, a rule of the church forbid it; but the Bishops of the Church, assembled in General Convention in 1820, declare their opinion that the canon referred to, "does not prohibit—the lending of any church to any respectable congregation on any occasion of emergency." Thus our correspondent will perceive that, our Bishops being the judges, there is no "violation of ordination vows," and "no perjury" in these brethren leading their churches upon an occasion they deemed one of emergency.

A HINT TO POETASTERS.

Dr. Plumer, in a late address at the opening of a Female Seminary at Wheeling, Virginia, made the following remarks, which are commended to the careful consideration of newspaper poetizers especially. Turning to the Principal of the Seminary, the Doctor said: I hope, sir, you'll not teach poetry here—I mean what some people call the science of composing poetry. If it will come from some of these youths, let it come, but don't force it. I feel about the writing of poetry something like the Methodist preacher who was giving a charge at a class meeting about some regulations. While in the midst of his charge, one old lady let slip a shout. 'Now,' says he, 'brethren and sisters, since the subject of shouting has come up, I'll give you my views on the subject. Never shout from a sense of duty. If you feel that you can't hold in, why, then shout, but not otherwise. I hope, then, that no one here will ever write poetry from a sense of duty. Poetry is despicable unless it is first class. Poor poetry is about the meanest of all mean things. As the Latin satirist has said, 'neither gods nor men can endure it.'

METHODISM IN TEXAS.

In the year 1840—just eighteen years ago this Christmas—the first Annual Conference was organized in Texas, by Bishop Waugh. Then the whole itinerant force consisted of eighteen preachers, nine of whom only were in full connection. This year Bishop Pierce has presided over three Annual Conferences and stationed some two hundred preachers in Texas. The Rio Grande Conference, just organized, bids fair to become a power in that great frontier State. The Texas Christian Advocate says: The Rio Grande Conference is well manned. It has a fine country for its operations. We have no doubt its progress will be as rapid as that of the other Conferences has been. If the advancement of the future be equal to that of the past, as we hope and expect, we may in a few years more exclaim, with even greater enthusiasm than at present, 'What hath God wrought!'

TEXAS COTTON GOING TO MEXICO.

A Gentleman of San Antonio, who has just returned from New Braunfels, informs the Ledger that $12,000 worth of cotton has lately been bought in that place by Messrs. Hewitson & Co. of Saltillo, Mexico, which was paid for in Mexican dollars, at an average price of eight cents per pound. And Mr. G. W. Kendall, writing from New Braunfels to New Orleans Picayune, states that the planters in his neighborhood have all found a new market for their cotton. He says: "In our streets can now be seen a long train of Mexican carts, all the way from Saltillo, picking up the cotton between this and the San Marcos, and lower down the country, all of which is destined for the Mexican factories beyond Monterey and the Sierra Madre.

The endowment fund of $100,000 for Randolph Macon College, has been fully raised.

LAGRANGE FEMALE COLLEGE.

The vacancy in the presidency of this institution occasioned by the resignation of Dr. W. J. Sasnett, who accepts the Presidency of the East Alabama College, has been filled by the election of Prof. William A. Harris. This gentleman has the reputation of thorough scholarship, and has been remarkably successful in teaching in Virginia and in Georgia. In 1851, he was elected Professor of Natural Science and French in LaGrange College, which station he has filled with ability. Success to the LaGrange Female College. Having passed the breakers, an open sea we hope is before it. [Southern Advocate.

Northern Baptists.—In addition to the endowment of the Publication Board, the Northern Baptists are making a special subscription of $10,000 for the Sunday-school branch of their operations. Of this sum, $7000 has been contributed by seven individuals; the rest will be made up in smaller sums. They are aware of the value of the press as an agent for Church extension, and they use it. They are now engaged in an effort, which has made good progress, to raise $100,000 for their Publication Board.

Eclipses, 1859.—There will be four eclipses of the sun in 1859, viz: A partial eclipse on the 2d of February, invisible here. A partial one on the 4th of March, invisible here. Another on the 29th of July, partial, and very small; it will end at 41 m. past 6, evening. Another one August 27th, visible only on the Great Southern Ocean. There will be two eclipses of the moon; the first one, on the 17th of February, will be total. It will commence at 13 m. past 4 o'clock in the morning—middle 6 o'clock—end quarter before 8. The other one, August 13th, will be not visible.

Exportation of a Church Edifice.—The bark Holmes, about to leave the port of New York for Liberia, takes out in frame a complete church-edifice for the Mission, under the charge of Bishop Payne, at Cape Palmas. When erected, this building will contain six hundred persons, and cost five thousand dollars. It is furnished through the liberality of the Sabbath-school children of St. George's, under the rectorship of Dr. Tyng.

Our Presbyterian Friends are adopting the plan of speaking by name of their religious papers from the pulpit, thus securing subscribers. A minister writing to the American Presbyterian says, with great truth, that fifty-two weekly visits of a good religious newspaper to a family, are equal to fifty-two sermons of the best sort.

Rev. John Angell James.—The Church of this eminent and venerable pastor in Birmingham, has nine hundred members. All the qualification for membership is "a credible profession of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son of God and the Savior of the world." Few churches have been distinguished by so much activity in Christian works.

Several of the Bishops of the Established Church in England are urging on their clergy the importance of practicing extemporaneous preaching, to reach the hearts of the people.

NEW GOVERNMENT IN MEXICO.

The New Orleans Delta says: The news of the overthrow of the Zuloaga Government by Gen. Robles, published in the Delta of Sunday, gives very interesting aspect to affairs in Mexico, especially in reference to our own relations with that country. This result seems to have been clearly foreseen by the friends of the Constitutional government now or recently sojourning in this country, with whom there are reasons to believe our own Government has a friendly understanding and sympathy.

Our readers will remember the passage through our city a few days ago of certain prominent chiefs of the party, General Trias and Admiral Zurman, and the quasi recognition of Colonel Matta, the representative of the constitutional President Juarez, at Washington. The mystery attending these transactions is now fully explained by the triumphal entry of Robles into the city of Mexico. That sagacious politician and leader has justified the confidence placed in him, by his skillful and successful movement against the usurping government which has held sway in the city of Mexico for some months past, without the power of subjugating the remote States where the Constitutional authorities have never been displaced.

The victory over the Church party is complete when the capital is occupied by the Constitutionalists. The more serious difficulties, however, of the victors commence, when the reins of power are in their hands, and the responsibilities of government rest on their shoulders.

The agency of Robles in the movement gives color to the idea, that arrangements had been agreed upon between the Constitutionalists and our Government, by which a new and hopeful re-organization of the Republic of Mexico may be effected.

This arrangement doubtless contemplates, as its chief feature, the cession of a large portion of the remote States of the Republic to the United States, as a consideration for such aid as it is in the power of our Government to extend to the new Administration of Mexico.

NATIONAL CONVENTION OF GAMBLERS.

The strangest thing in the way of convocations, is a National Convention of Gamblers, which, the Chicago Democrat assures us, is in session in that city. It says:

There will be two important matters to come up before before the Convention.

One will be the revision of the old rules and the adoption of new ones for the various games. The rules are construed differently in different States. Several lives have been lost in broils arising from this difference in their interpretation. Uniformity of construction is demanded by all the delegates.

The other will be the non-interference of professional gamblers in politics. There will be a very warm debate upon this subject.

The Protestant Alliance having memorialized Lord Malmesbury to intercede with Rome in the Mortara case, Lord M. replied that, while the government was indignant at the outrage, it did not think the interference of a protestant power would do any good, after the failure of a catholic power like France.

Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, of New York, objects to preaching in the theatres and Academy of Music on Sunday nights. He thinks the way to heaven is through the church gates, and refuses to have them closed to divert the popular stream to the profane haunts of Piccolomini and Laborde.

Dr. Rosser, the new editor of the Richmond Christian Advocate, writes one of the most urgent financial articles in his last issue we have ever read. The Texas Advocate used to hold the banner, in this line, but the Richmond Advocate is justly entitled to it after this.

Dr. Holmes, the famous "autocrat of the breakfast table," has recently been delivering public lectures at New York, where he was treated with high consideration.

All the clergy of the Episcopal Church in Pittsburg and its vicinity have united, under the influence of Bishop Bowman, for the establishment and maintenance of church institutions for the aged, infirm, helpless and orphan poor.

The trustees of the M. E. Church, North, in Sacramento have resolved to purchase the National theatre, in that city, at $20,000. They will fit it up for a place of public worship, and expend $5000 in repairs.

We learn from the New Orleans Crescent, that the most Reverend John Carroll, the first Catholic Archbishop in the United States, died on the 3d December, aged 80 years.

The Southern Christian Advocate, with the Depository at Charleston, has been transferred to the South Carolina Conference.

The Methodists in the Ohio Conference are talking of establishing a first-class Female University, with a munificent endowment.

FROM THE PACIFIC, AND THE ISTHMUS OF TEHUANTEPEC.

Arrival of the Tehuantepec Company's steamship Quaker City, from Minatitlan, bringing the California mails and passengers of the 20th December, from San Francisco by the steamship John those whom we may hereafter from time to time see to appoint to administer the government of our said territories in our name and on our behalf.

And we, reposing especial trust and judgment of our right trusty and well beloved cousin and councillor, Charles John Viscount Canning, do hereby constitute and appoint him, the said Viscount Canning, to be our first Viceroy and Governor-General in and over said territories, and to administer the government thereof in our name and on our behalf, subject to such orders and regulations as he shall form time to time receive from us through one of our principal Secretaries of State.

And we do hereby confirm in their several offices, civil and military, all persons now employed in the service of the Honorable East India Company, subject to our future pleasure, and to such laws and regulations as may hereafter be enacted.

We hereby announce to the native princes of India that all treaties and engagements made with them by or under the authority of the Honorable East India Company are hereby accepted, and will be scrupulously maintained; and we look for the like observance on their part.

We desire no extension of our present territorial possessions; and while we will permit no aggression upon our dominions or our rights to be attempted with impunity, we shall sanction no encroachment on those of others. We shall respect the rights, dignity and honor of native princes as well as our own subjects, should enjoy the prosperity and that social advancements which can only be secured by internal peace and good government.

We hold ourselves bound to the natives of our Indian territories by the same obligations of duty which bind us to all our other subjects; and those obligations, by the blessings of Almighty God, we shall faithfully and conscientiously fulfil.

Firmly relying ourselves on the truth of Christianity, and acknowledging with gratitude the solace of religion, we disclaim alike the right and the desire to impose our convictions on any of our subjects. We declare it to be our royal will find pleasure that none be in anywise favored, none molested or disquieted, by reason of their religious faith or observances, but all shall alike enjoy the equal and impartial protection of the law; and we do strictly charge and enjoin all those who may be in authority under us, that they abstain from all interference with the religious belief or worship of any of our subjects, on pain of our highest displeasure.

And it is our further will that, so far as may be, our subjects, of whatever race or creed, be freely and impartially admitted to offices in our service, the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, ability, and integrity, duly to discharge.

We know and respect the feelings of attachment with which the natives of India regard the lands inherited by them from their ancestors, and we desire to protect them in all rights connected therewith, subject to the equitable demands of the State; and we will that, generally, in framing and administering the law, due regard be paid to ancient rights, usages and customs of India.

We deeply lament the evils and misery which have been brought upon India by the acts of ambitious men, who have deceived their countrymen by false reports and led them into open rebellion. Our power has been shown by the suppression of that rebellion in the field; we desire to stretch forth our mercy by pardoning the offences of those who have been thus misled, but desire to return to the path of duty.

We already, in one province, with a view to stop the further effusion of blood, and to hasten the pacification of our Indian dominions, our Viceroy and Governor-General has given to understand the expectation of pardon, on certain terms, to the great majority of those who in the late unhappy disturbances, have been guilty of offences against our government, and has declared the punishment which will be inflicted on those whose crimes place them beyond the reach of forgiveness. We approve and confirm the said act of our Viceroy and Governor General, and do further announce and proclaim as follows.

Our clemency will be extended to all offenders, save and except those who have been or shall be convicted of having directly taken part in the murder of British subjects. With regard to such, the demands of justice forbid the exercise of mercy.

To those who have willfingly given asylum to murderers, knowing them to be such, or who may have acted as leaders or instigators in revolt, their lives alone can be guaranteed; but, in apportioning the penalty due to such persons, full consideration will be given to the circumstances under which they have been induced to throw off their allegiance, and large indulgences will be shown to those whose crimes may appear to have originated in a credulous acceptance of the false reports circulated by designing men.

To all others in arms against the government we hereby promise unconditional pardon, amnesty, and oblivion of all offences against ourselves, our crown and dignity, on their return to their homes and peaceful pursuits.

It is our royal pleasure that these terms of grace and amnesty should be extended to all those who comply with their conditions before the first day of January next.

When, by the blessing of Providence, internal tranquility shall be restored, it is our earnest desire to stimulate the peaceful industry of India, to promote works of public utility and improvement, and to administer its government for the benefit of all our subjects resident therein. In their prosperity will be our strength, in their contentment our security, and in their gratitude our best reward. And may the God of all power grant to us, and those in authority under us, strength to carry out these our wishes for the good of our people.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT,
Allahabad, Monday, Nov. 1, 1858.

Her Majesty the Queen having declared that it is her Royal pleasure to take upon herself the government of the British territory in India, the Viceroy and Governor-General hereby notifies that from this day all acts of the Government of India will be done in the name of the Queen alone.

And this day all men of every race and class who, under the administration of the Hon. East India Company, have served to uphold the honor and power of England, are now the servants of the Queen alone.

The Governor-General summons them, one and all, each in his degree, and according to his opportunity, and with his whole heart and strength, to aid in fulfilling the Queen's will and pleasure of the Queen, as set forth in this royal proclamation.

Upon the many millions of her Majesty's native subjects the Governor-General will now, and at all times, look for a loyal obedience to the call which, in words full of clemence and mercy, their Sovereign has made upon their allegiance and faithfulness.

By order of the Right Honorable the Governor-General of India.

G. F. EDMONSTONE,
Secretary of the Government of India,
with the Governor-General.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

MORMONS seem to be dividing into two parties—one inclining on conversion by the Holy Ghost, the other denying all such saving doctrines.

The Chicago (Illinois) Press says, that mails are received daily in the post office of that city by about twenty arriving trains, and 3500 mails are made up each day. Over 1,000,000 letters and 6,000,000 papers were handled during the last quarter.

VICTOR EMMANUEL, King of Sardinia, (the only Constitutional Government in Italy,) is preparing to take the field in behalf of the Liberals of Lombardy and Venice, and assist them in throwing off the Austrian yoke. It is presumed that Louis Napoleon's increasing need of a topic of public interest outside of France will decidedly favor a movement of this kind.

THE COUNTESS MONTALEMBERT, (wife of the French Count) is a woman of distinguished grace of figure and manner, and possessed of considerable beauty—that superior kind of beauty that consists of intelligence, accomplishment and information; talks freely and well; speaks English finently, but with a decided foreign accent. Altogether, she is a woman who would exert a strong influence over a sensible man who loved her. She is a niece of General Lafayette.

IMPEACHMENT OF WARREN HASTINGS.—It is announced in the London papers that the speeches delivered in Westminster Hall on the occasion of the impeachment of Warren Hastings, including the elaborate harangues of Burke, Fox and Sheridan, are about to be published. They will be printed from the Gurney manuscript reports.

MR. W. B. ASTON, of New York, paid his tax-bill to the recorder lately, the amount being $25,000 on personal property, and $60,000 real estate. Total $85,000.

LOOK TO YOUR POLICIES.—Lord St. Leonards, a great English Judge, in his recent book called "Handy Book on Property Law," says: "Very few policies against fire are so framed as to render the company legally liable. Generally, the property is inaccurately described in reference to the conditions under which you insure.

The Times on the Message.—The London Times has several articles upon President Buchanan's Message, and is unusually severe in its criticisms in regard to the policy proposed in relation to Mexico, Cuba and Central America.

The French Portuguese Minister.—The Portuguese Minister has been recalled from France. The reason for this step is not given.

Excitement in Switzerland.—Large detachments of French troops are approaching the confines of Switzerland and concentrating on the frontier. Switzerland has asked for an explanation of this movement of the French troops and there was much excitement in Switzerland in consequence of these warlike demonstrations.

The Telegraphic Cabel.—A new telegraph enterprise is beorganized for the purpose of laying a cabel from Landsend to Halifax. The cable is to be constructed on a new plan.

Large Negro Contract.—It is stated that the French Government or parties under its authority, have contracted to supply a large number of free negroes from the coast of Africa for Martinique and Gaudaloupe.

The President's Message in France.—The President's Message created some surprise in the French Foreign Department, especially that portion of it which refers to the purchase of the Island of Cuba.

The proposition for the purchase, it is said, created the more surprise from the fact that the American Minister had already been notified by the French Government that France, in conjunction with her faithful ally, England would not tolerate the transfer of Cuba to the United States, even if Spain consented to the sale.

SENATOR DOUGLAS was received with great enthusiasm at Philadelphia and Washington. A formidable protective movement has been initiated by the Iron masters of Pennsylvania. The U. S. Senate met on the 4th in the new Senate chamber, for the first time. Vice-President Breckenbridge delivered an address.

ST. LOUIS, Jan. 5.—More Depredations in Missouri—Military Ordered Out.—A dispatch from Kansas reports that Brown's band of Jayhaws were continuing their depredations on the border of Missouri. They had again entered the State and stolen a large number of horses, burning houses and committing other outrages on the inhabitants. Governor Medary had ordered out two companies of dragoons and two companies of militia to pursue them and protect the inhabitants. He has also telegraphed to Washington for arms and ammunition. The whole of the western portion of Kansas is said to be divided into antagonistic marauding bands.

Kansas Legislature.—The Legislature of Kansas Territory met at Lawrence on the 3d inst. A resolution was offered to organize at Lecompton on the next day, but it is thought probable some other place will be selected for the meeting of the Legislature.

NEW YORK, Jan. 5.—The steamship Cahawba, from New Orleans via Havana, has arrived here. She brings dates from Havana to the 31st. Her news is not important. There had been intense excitement in regard to the President's proposition to purchase Cuba, but it had considerably abated. Business was dull. A decline in sugar was expected. The stock of Sugar at Havana was 200,000 boxes. Freights dull and nominal.

MEMPHIS, Jan. 6.—Overland Mail Route.—Mr. Butterfield, the overland mail contractor, is now here and promises to put the Memphis overland mail route on an equal footing with that of the St. Louis route.

Fire in Memphis.—A destructive fire occurred here yesterday morning. The entire row from Adams to Washington street is destroyed. The loss is estimated at about $300,000. Several persons are reported to have been killed. Messrs. Forsyth & Jamison, grocers, about $40,000—on which there was an insurance for $20,000; Sturgis & Son, grocers, lost about $8000—their property was insured for $3000.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Jan. 5.—Re-Election of Senator Douglas.—The Illinois Legislature have to-day re-elected Stephen A. Douglas to the United States Senate by a majority of eight votes on joint ballot.

The recommendations of the President in regard to Cuba, Mexico, and Central America, were generally unpalatable to the British press, and created much attention from all parties.

MEMPHIS, Jan. 8.—The overland California mail of the 13th ult. arrived yesterday, it being the first arrival here on schedule time.... The ceremony of inaugurating the bust of Gen. Jackson came off to-day with an imposing display of military, and large delegations of the Masonic order, in full regalia. The firemen of the city and vicinity turned out, making a very long procession and a fine display. Hon. Andrew Ewing delivered the oration on the occasion. The weather is very cold.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8.—House.—Reports were received in the House from the Secretary of the Treasury and from the Postmaster General, respecting the claim of Corlouck and Rumsay, for damages sustained by the abrogation of their contract for carrying the mails between Vera Cruz and Acapulco, and thence to San Francisco. The subject was discussed at some length without action on the matter.... The committee reported favorably on the bill for the relief of the officers and crew of the Armstrong.... The Committee on Territories reported in favor of a territorial organization for Arizonia and Dacotah, and against organizing Cutona.... The Administration regard the tone of the French foreign office, in relation to the recommendations of the President's Message respecting Cuba, Mexico and Central America, as merely the vaporings of Napoleon III.... The funds in the Treasury were so low yesterday that the Treasurer was obliged to refuse to pay a Treasury note of $1000.

ST. LOUIS, Jan. 8.—The Santa Fe mail of the 20th has arrived at Independence.... The Novajo Indians appear to be willing to make any terms to secure peace.... Nothing had yet been heard from the mail party which left Neosho for Alburquerque on the 15th of October.

LOCAL.

CELEBRATION OF MR. KENDIG.—The 8th of January, the Anniversary of the "Battle of New Orleans," connected, as it was, with a most enthusiastic and magnificent reception of "the greatest military Captain of the age," LIEUTENANT GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT, was equal, if not superior to any thing we have ever witnessed in the way of a public celebration. We cannot pretend to describe it. A grand celebration, in a great city, on a beautiful day, when general enthusiasm prevails, is unimaginable, but not describable—by us.

GEN. SCOTT.—This distinguished military chieftain arrived in this city on last Wednesday morning, and was received with due honors by the city authorities. He attended the celebration on the 8th of January, the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans.

USUAL ANNUITATION OF MONEY.—By the last bank reports it will be seen that the amount of deposits in the banks of this city, on the 1st instant, was twenty six millions of dollars, and the amount of specie seventeen millions. Last year on the same day, the deposits were about six millions. This is only one of the many other evidences, says the Delta, of a progress unparalleled in the history of our city, or, indeed, of any city in the world. With our deposits quadrupled, our exports and imports doubled in the course of twelve months, New Orleans exhibits at present a phenomenon of commercial growth and prosperity.

SUNDAY BUSINESS.—The Home Mutual Insurance in this city closed another year's business on the 31st ult. The amount of premiums for the year reach $600,425; on for losses, they could not have been much, though they have paid for some tolerable heavy, the profits being for the year $170,000. A dividend of 70 per cent. in scrip has been made on the year's business, and interest at the rate of six per cent. declared on all outstanding scrip, and redeeming all scrip issued previous to 1850. Having said this much, we think says the Crescent, we have said enough to prove that the commercial future of New Orleans lies in its insurance companies a pillar of strength and solidity not surpassed in any other community on the globe.

LAST THURSDAY the directors of the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank declared a dividend of four per cent. for the last six months, payable on Monday the 10th inst.

MR. FREDERICK STANTON, of the firm of Buckner, Stanton & Newman of this city, died at Natchez on Wednesday last.

Special Notices.

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

For 1859.

Many and pleasant proofs, from all parts of our field, of the favor with which the Advocate is received, encourage us to endeavor to make it still more attractive and useful for the present year.

Talented Contributors.

We have engaged, and are still engaging, the service of some of the very best writers to be found in the country. When we shall have perfected our arrangements in this respect, we trust that our readers will find no occasion to seek elsewhere the literary entertainment and benefit which should be furnished by their own paper.

The Pecuniary Ability.

We never can make the New Orleans Christian Advocate what it ought to be until we have, at least, ten thousand paying subscribers. (We ought to have twenty thousand.) Every improvement, however slight, costs money—a certain amount a week—to be paid in advance—making a considerable sum at the end of the year. Whenever our preachers and people give us ten thousand paying subscribers, they will obtain more than an equivalent in the improvement of the paper.

Ten thousand this Year.

At the Conferences the preachers promised to exert themselves to increase the subscription list to ten thousand during the present year. We affectionately exhort them not to forget these promises. And we respectfully invite all our readers to join the preachers in this work. Let the figure be reached. It is easily done by a unanimous and vigorous effort. Why waste years in accomplishing the work of a few months.

Begin with the Year.

As in all other duties pertaining to his "office and work," the preacher who does not begin to work for the Advocate, at the beginning of the year, is not apt to do much. The habit of attending to this duty regularly should be formed. Let all he done that can possibly be done in January, and then you will be in training for February and the rest of the months. Some preachers, by adopting this course, would be astonished, at the end of the year, at the amount of good accomplished.

We have Tried It.

When we were editor of another paper we recollect preaching in three different towns on three consecutive days, and making a speech for the Advocate at the close of each; the result was, about thirty new subscribers in each place—near one hundred in three days. And this was where the preacher thought everybody that could be induced, already took the paper. It may be said, the editor can do more for his paper than any body else. It is only because he tries harder.

Send for the Accounts.

Let every travelling preacher write to us at once, giving us direction, if he has not done so, to change his paper, if it is to be changed, from such a post-office (giving the name) to such a post office (giving the name). Please, also, to send a list of all the post-offices in the bounds of your charge, so that we may send you the Advocate accounts at the beginning of the year. We are greatly perplexed and greatly injured too, by failures in this matter. Write plainly—be particular—as the Clerk, into whose hands your letter will go may not know you.

Settle as for Yourself.

In reply to all questions as to how disputed accounts should be settled, we have to say: You are one of the owners of Our Advocate: settle as though it were your own private business. Make the best collections you can, and settle fully each case without writing to the office for advice. Were it your own private business, you would try to collect the whole account in cash, at once; so do for us.

Get Cash Subscribers.

It is much the best to send the money with the name of a new subscriber. Send none without the money, unless you are satisfied they are reliable and punctual. Thousands of dollars are lost to the office every year, by a different course.

Send us Money Now.

Since the preachers left their charges to attend the Conferences, say for about two months past, but little money has been sent us. But our weekly expenses are the same as before. We earnestly call upon all our Agents to exert themselves, at once, to make up this loss to us by large cash remittances. Where no Agent is convenient, we trust our subscribers will remit for themselves. We regret, when a large subscription bill is presented, to hear it complainingly said, "No Agent called upon me." Be your Agent, if necessary, as in your other affairs—remit in time, and do not get behind.

Separate Departments.

In writing for publication, if you put business matters on the same half sheet, the Clerk will probably never see it. In writing on business, if you put matter for publication on the same half sheet, the Editor will probably never see it. Matter for publication should be on a slip entirely to itself; business matter should be on a slip entirely to itself; and letters to the Depository, or to the Missionary Treasury, should be separate from both the former, and from each other; though all may be enclosed in the same envelope.

Memoranda.

In writing to the Advocate office, on business, or sending matter for publication, address Rev. C. C. Gillespie; in writing to the Depository, address Kenney and McTyeire, Agents; in writing to the Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society, address Rev. J. C. Keener.

The Advocate is sent gratis to all our Agents, who send for it. The itinerant preachers are all Agents. The price of the paper is $2 00 a year in advance; $2 50, if not paid within six months; $3 00 at the end of the year.

Memory.

Never depend upon the mere memory of the Editor, in reference to matters you wish attended to in the office. He has no memory of any business matter, except it be legibly written, with pen and ink, on paper. It is impossible to remember such things. And business should and be transacted in that way. Write everything—write fully—write as though you were not known at the office—for, the Clerk, who has to attend to your business, may not know you, and the Editor's time is worth too much for him to be compelled to explain fifty letters a day. In this way we shall be able to please both you and ourselves.

Apologetic.

Our only apology for being thus particular in our directions is, that we wish, as much as possible, to prevent mistakes, to correct any that may have been made, and to keep affairs between ourselves and our agents and subscribers from becoming confused. Most mistakes and misunderstandings arise from the careless, confused, and illegible letters written to us.

Sunday Efforts.

Presenting the claims of the Advocate at the close of Sunday services is just as legitimate and meritorious as presenting the claims of missions, or of any other interest. The Advocate is the common and indispensable supporter of all our interests. Make speeches for it in every congregation—canvass your field fully.

Cheapest Weekly.

No Weekly in New Orleans, is so cheap as the ADVOCATE. Its price is Two Dollars, theirs is THREE.

At Our Risk.

Many Agents, because they do not know that money collected is to be remitted by mail at our risk, keep it for months. This is wrong. Remit at once, at our risk, putting up the money carefully.

GENIUS VS. LABOR.

"Of what use is all your studying and your books?" said an honest farmer to an ingenious artist. "They don't make the corn grow, nor produce vegetables for market. My Sam does more good with his plough in one month, than you can do with your books and papers in a year."

"What plough does your Sam use?" said the artist quietly.

"Why he uses ——'s plough, to be sure. He can do nothing with any other. By using this plough, we save half the labor, and raise three times as much as we did with the old concern."

The artist quietly again turned over one of his sheets, and showed the farmer a drawing of the lauded plough, saying, "I am the inventor of your favorite plough, and my name is ——."

The astonished farmer shook the artist heartily by the hand, and invited him to call at his farm house and make it his home, as he liked.

A QUICK QUARTER.

A boy worked hard all day for a quarter of a dollar. With the quarter he bought apples, and took them to town and sold them on the street for a dollar. With the dollar he bought a sheep. The sheep brought him a lamb, and her fleece brought him another dollar. With this dollar he bought another sheep. The next spring he had two sheep, two lambs, and a yearling sheep. The three fleeces he sold for the dollars, and bought three more sheep. He now had six, with a fair prospect. He worked, when he found opportunity, for hay, corn and oats, and pasturing for his sheep. He took the choicest care of them, and soon had a flock. Their wool enabled him to buy a pasture for them, and by the time he was twenty-one he had a fair start in life, and all from the quarter of a dollar he earned in one day.

THE KITTEN.

A lady tells this story:—I have been out in Indiana on a visit, and while there I found a kitten, which I bought, and brought home as a plaything for my two children. To prevent any dispute about the ownership of puss, I proposed, and it was agreed, that the head of the kitten should be mine, the body should be the baby's, and Eddie, the eldest—but only three years—should be the sole proprietor of the long and beautiful tail. Eddie rather objected at first to this division, as putting him off with an extremely small share of the animal; but soon became reconciled to the division, and quite proud of his ownership in the graceful terminus of the kitten. One day, soon after, I heard poor puss making a dreadful mewing, and I called out to Eddie, "There my son, you are hurting my part of the kitten; I hear her cry." "No I didn't, mother; I trod on my part, and your part hallowed!"

WHY EVERYBODY IS CROSS.

One day little John Wilson came running into the house where his sister was sewing. He held something in his hand which he had found in the back yard.

"Oh, sister Mary!" said he, "I have found a pretty thing. It is a piece of red glass; and when I looked through it everything looked red too. The tree, the house, the green grass, your face, and everything is red."

Mary replied, "Yes, it is very beautiful; and let me show you how to learn a useful lesson from it. You remember the other day you thought every person was cross to you. Now you were like this piece of glass, which makes everything red, because it is red. You were cross, as you thought everybody around you was cross, too. If you are in good humor, and kind to every one, they will seem kind to you."

THE PATIENCE OF A DUMB BEAST EXHAUSTED.

A strange occurrence, says Galignani's Messenger, took place recently at Gardanne, Bouches-du-Rhone. A farmer had been in the habit of ill-treating a donkey, and on the day in question had beaten the poor animal more brutally than usual. The proverbial patience of the long-eared animal appears at length to have been exhausted, and taking advantage of the moment when the man had just taken off its harness the donkey rushed forward, knocked him down, and then began tearing him in the most dreadful manner with its teeth, striking him with its fore feet. The man cried out for assistance, but before aid could arrive he was so badly injured that he died in a few hours.

CROSS WORDS.

"Oh," said a little girl, bursting into tears on hearing of the death of a playmate. "I did not know that was the last time I had to speak kind to Amy."

The last time they were together she spoke cross to her, and the thought of that last cross word now lay heavy on he heart.

This suggests a good rule about kind words. Speak kindly to your father, or your mother, or your brother, or your sister, or your playmate, or your teacher, or the poor, when you are speaking, lest it may be your last time to speak to them. Cross words are very, very sorrowful to think of. [Child's Paper.

CONVERSIONS AMONG CHILDREN.

A letter from a missionary of the American Board in Western India, mentions an instance of eight children recently received into the church of Christ on profession of their faith:

"One of them is the youngest daughter of the missionary who officiated in receiving them to the church. She stood there, with her dark-faced sisters in Christ, and pronounced the vows of God in a strange language. But God understands Marathi as well as English, and heaven rejoices when children come 'from the east and from the west,' and sit down together in the kingdom of our God. Her eldest sister, now the wife of a missionary, was there, wishing that the other sisters also could come from far off America, and share in the holy joys of this good day. Do you wonder that her father's hand and voice trembled from his emotions, as he spoke of the blessedness of Christian parents and their believing children?"

GOD'S CHILD.

Do you feel that you are one of God's children?" asked a lady of a Sabbath-school scholar. "I do not know," he answered; "I only know that once my Savior was a great way off, and I could not see him. Now he is near, and I love to do things for his sake." Here indeed was that sweet spirit of obedience which is the root of all true piety in the heart.

REMARKABLE PROVIDENCE.

In the report of the Board of Managers of the South Carolina Conference Missionary Society, read at the recent anniversary in Charleston, it was stated that, since the organization of the missionary work among the people of color in South Carolina, five hundred and fifty appointments had been made in that field. These, of course, run back for many years. Yet, of all these, only seven missionaries have died while cultivating this portion of the Master's vineyard. This is a remarkable fact, when it is remembered that these missions embrace the most unhealthy portions of South Carolina. Though adapted to the negro, the climate and atmosphere of the swamps are so very prejudicial to the health of the whites that most of them abandon their plantations during the sickly season; and yet those faithful missionaries remain the year round, preaching to the sons of Ham. How wonderfully has God preserved his servants! One says, "The minister is immortal till his work is done."

Rev. Reddick Pierce.—"Who is that?" said we to a member of the South Carolina Conference a few days since, calling his attention to a venerable minister, who sat quietly in the Conference-room. "That is Reddick Pierce," was the reply. Reddick Pierce! We had heard of him often. He is the brother of Dr. Lorick Pierce, and the uncle of the Bishop. Though far advanced in years, and quite deaf, he has all the marks of a great man. His fine face and expansive forehead indicate a superior intellect: he has been no ordinary man. My friend said he was adjudged, in his palmy days, by many, as superior to his brother. Indeed, he was a giant, and slew his thousands. [Nashville Advocate.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

Letter of a Dying Wife:

The following fragment of a letter from a dying wife to her husband was found by him, some months after her death between the leaves of a religious volume which she was very fond of perusing. The letter, which was literally dim with her tear-marks, was written long before her husband was aware that the grasp of fatal disease had fastened upon his wife, who died at the early age of nineteen:

"When this shall reach your eyes, dear George, some day when you are turning over the relics of the past, I shall have passed away for ever, and the cold white stone will be keeping its lonely watch over the lips you have so often pressed, and the sod will be growing green that shall hide for ever from your sight, the dust of one who has often nestled close to your warm heart. For many long and sleepless nights, when all besides my thoughts were at rest, I have wrestled with consciousness of approaching death, until at last, it has forced itself upon my mind; and although for you and to others it might now seem but the nervous imagination of a girl, yet, dear George, it was so! Many weary nights have I passed in the endeavor to reconcile myself to leaving you, whom I loved so well, and this bright world of sunshine and beauty; and hard indeed, it is, to struggle on silently and alone, with the sure conviction that I am about to leave all for ever, and go down into the dark valley! But I know in whom I have believed, and leaning on his arm, 'I fear no evil.' Do not blame me for keeping even all this from you. How could I subject you, of all others, to such sorrow as I feel at parting, when time will soon make it apparent to you! I could have wished to live, if only to be at your side when your time shall come, and pillowing your head on my breast, wipe the death-damps from your brow, and usher your departing spirit into its Maker's presence, embalmed in woman's holiest prayer, but it is not to be, and I submit. Yours is the privilege of watching, through long and dreary nights, for the spirit's final flight, and transferring my sinking head from your breast to my Savior's bosom! And you shall share my last thoughts, and the last faint pressure of the hand, and the last feeble kiss shall be yours, and even when flesh and heart shall have failed me, my eyes shall rest on yours until glazed by death; and our spirits shall hold one last communion, until gently fading from my view—the last on earth—you shall mingle with the first bright glimpses of the unfaded glories of the better world, were partings are unknown. Well do I know the spot, my dear George, where you will lay me: often we stood by the place, and as we watched the mellow sunset, as it glanced in quivering flashes through the leaves, and burnished the grassy mounds around us with stripes of burnished gold, each, perhaps, thought that some day one of us would come alone, and whichever it might be, your name would be on the stone. But we loved the spot, and I know you will love it none the less, when you see the same quiet sunlight lieger and play among the grass that grows over your Mary's grave. I know you will go there, and my spirit will be with you there, and whisper among the waving branches—'I am not lost, but gone before.'"

The Dying Child.

A LITTLE DAUGHTER, ten years old, lay on her death-bed. It was a hard parting with the pet flower of the household. The golden hair, the loving blue eyes, the bird-like voice—the truthful, affectionate, large-hearted, pious child! How could she be given up? Between this child and her father there has always existed, not a relationship merely, but the love of congenial natures. He fell on his knees by his darling's bedside, and wept bitter tears. He strove to say, but could not, "Thy will be done!" It was a conflict between grace and nature, such as he had never before experienced. His sobs disturbed the child, who had been lying, apparently unconscious. She opened her eyes, and looked distressed

"Papa, dear papa," said she at length.

"What my darling?" answered the father, striving for composure.

"Papa," she asked, in faint, broken tones, "how much—do I cost you—every year?"

"Hush, dear, be quiet!" he replied, in great agitation; for he feared delirium was coming on.

"But please—papa, how much do I cost you?"

To sooth her he replied, though with a shaking voice:

"Well, dearest, perhaps two hundred dollars. What then, darling?"

"Because papa, I thought—may be—you would lay it out this year—in Bibles—for poor children—to remember me by."

With what delicate instinct had the dying child touched the springs of comfort! A beam of heavenly joy glanced in the father's heart, the bliss of one noble, loving spirit mingled with its like. Self was forgotten, the sorrow of parting, the lonely future.—Naught remained but the mission of love, and a thrill of gratitude that in it he and his beloved were co-workers.

"I will, my precious child," he replied, kissing her brow with solemn tenderness.

"Yes," he added, after a pause, "I will do it every year as long as I live. And thus my Lillian shall yet speak, and draw hundreds and thousands after her to heaven."

The child's very soul beamed forth in a long, lovleg smile-gaze, into her father's eyes; and still gazing, she fell asleep. Waking in a few minutes, she spoke in a loud clear voice, and with a look of ecstasy:

"O papa, what a sweet sight! The golden gates were opened, and crowds of children came pouring out. O such crowds! And they ran up to me, and began to kiss me, and call me by a new name. I can't remember what it was, but it meant, 'Beloved for the Father's sake.'"

She looked upward, her eyes dreamy, her voice died into a whisper, "Yes, yes, I come! I come!" and the lovely form lay there untenanted of the lovelier spirit.

John Lee rose from his knees with a holy triumph on his face. "Thank God," said he, "I am richer by another treasure in heaven!" [Macedonian.

Flowers.

MANY a bright-eyed girl to-day, who works worsted and dances divinely, does not know that a moss-rose is a first-cousin to a French turnip, and the mangel-wurtzel a poor relation in the poppy family. Flowers are not trifles, as one might know, if we would only think how much pains God has taken with them everywhere; not one unfurnished; not one bearing the marks of brush or pencil. Fringing the eternal borders of mountain winters; gracing the pulseless breast of the old gray granite; everywhere they are humanized. Murderers do not ordinarily wear roses in their button-holes. Villains seldom train vines over cottage doors. [B. F. Taylor.

Our Best Parlors.

DON'T keep a solemn parlor, into which you go but once a month, with the parson or sewing-society. Hang around your walls pictures which shall tell stories of mercy, hope, courage, faith, and charity. Make your living-room the largest and most cheerful in the house. Let the place be such, that when your boy has gone to distant lands, or even, perhaps, he clings to a single plank in the lonely waters of the wide ocean, the thoughts of the still home-stead shall come across the desolation, bringing always light, hope, and love. Have no dungeons about your house—no room you never open—no blinds that are always shut. [Ike Marvel.

Flowers.

How the universal heart of man blesses flowers! They are wreathed around the cradle, the marriage-altar, and the tomb! The Persian in the far East delights in their perfume, and writes his love in nosegays; while the Indian child of the far West clasps his hands with glee, as he gathers the abundant blossoms—the illuminated Scripture of the prairies. The Cupid of the ancient Hindoos tipped his arrows with flowers; and orange buds are the bridal crown with us, a nation of yesterday. Flowers garlanded the Grecian altar; and they hang in votive wreaths before the Christian shrine.

All these are appropriate uses. Flowers should deck the brow of the youthful bride, for they are in themselves a lovely type of marriage. They should twine round the tomb, for their perpetually renewed beauty is a symbol of the resurrection. They should festoon the altar, for their fragrance and their beauty ascend in perpetual worship before the Most High. [Lydia M. Child.

Generous.

MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY, of Hartford, Connecticut, furnished fifty poor families in Boston, Massachusetts, with turkeys or fowls, and pumpkin pies—of the best quality too—for a thanksgiving dinner.

Daily Life.

IT IS by the daily lives of Christians that Christ is either honored or dishonored.

Hair Brushes.

To wash hair brushes, never use soap. Take a piece of soda, dissolve it in warm water, stand the brush in it, taking care that the water covers only the bristles. It will almost instantly become white and clean. Place it in the air to dry with the bristles downward, and it will be as firm as a new brush.

GARDEN, FARM, AND PLANTATION.

Trial of Four Varieties of Wheat.

THE following is an extract of a letter from Mr. George Skinner, of Kaiids, Putuam county, Ohio:

"I will give the results of a small experiment in growing some new varieties of fall wheat, which I have just harvested, threshed and weighed."

The ground on which it was grown was black muck, first crop, recently cleared, and much too flat and wet to produce a large crop; sown broadcast on the 4th of September; and harvested 5th of July—one half pound of seed of each variety sown.

Brento Wheat.—Berry red, long aed hard; heads long aed beardy; straw stiff and stroug; ripens early, yielding at the rate of eighteen bushels to one of seed.

Soft White Wheat.—Berry white, short and oval; heads long and smooth; straw strong and long; ripens with Mediterranean; yielding at the rate of twenty-two bushels to one of seed.

Red Wheat.—Berry light color, short and plump; heads short and very compact, with long beards; straw light; ripens early, yielding at the rate of sixteen bushels to one of seed.

Red Wheat.—Red, long and shruakee; heads moderately long and very compact; long beards; straw light, and ripens early; yielding at the rate of sixteen to one.

The first two named varieties, I think, are valuable acquisitions; the others, with a dry season, would do well." [Ag. Division Patent Office.

Horses and Stables.

BLINDNESS is very common among horses in our cities. This is caused in a great measure by keeping them in dark, confined stables, and shading their eyes with harness blinders. Dark, ill-ventilated cellar-stables are quite common; this stupid practice should be abolished, because such stables are very detrimental to the health of these noble animals. All stables should be dry, roomy structures, provided with windows to afford abundant light, and should, also, be frequently whitewashed. The horse is a native of dry, sunny regions, and requires to be kept dry and warm in order to attain to the greatest perfection.

Close and confined stables, just like those which are so common, are the frequent cause of that violent disease called glanders. A few years since, great ravages were committed among the cavalry horses of France by this disease; but it is now almost unknown in that country. This result has been brought about by simply making larger stables, doubling the size of the stalls, and securing good ventilation. In proportion to their bulk, horses need more fresh air than men, in order to perform the function of respiration; yet they are commonly cooped up in narrow stalls, which are not large enough to keep a dormouse's lungs at work.

As the season is now approaching when, owing to inclement weather, horses will be more confined in-doors; those who possess such animals should now devote some attention to provide them with stables suitable to their nature and wants, and by so doing they will greatly increase their health and longevity.

Hints to Young Farmers.

ALWAYS take one or more agricultural papers; for every number will give you information which will benefit you in dollars.

Be admonished that a stioth in time saves nine, or the laying up of a rail, or nailing on a board, may save the ninth repetition and unruly stock.

Colts must have a great deal of exercise.

Don't be afraid to plow deep. A few more oats in the spring will make many more at harvest.

Feed your lowls the year round if you would make them profitable.

Have a separate pen into which your pigs can go and get shelled-corn and milk.

Judge not hastily; but examine well before you decide.

Keep clear of Shanghais.

Lims should be accessible to poultry.

Make the most of every thing.

Never half do any thing; you may thus lose more in one day than a month can restore.

Often inspect your stock, and keep a sharp look-out for disease and accident.

Pure water should be supplied to every thing.

Quality and quantity should be your maxim.

Vinegar.

THE JUICE of one bushel of sugar beets, worth twenty-five cents, and which any farmer can raise with little cost, will make from five to six gallons of vinegar equal to the best cider wine. First wash and grate the beets, and press out the juice in a cheese press, or in any other way which will do it, and put the liquor in a barrel, cover the bung with gauze and set it in the sun, and in fifteen or twenty days it will be fit for use. By this method, the very best of vinegar may be obtained without any very great trouble, and I hope all who like good vinegar will try it. [Ohio Valley Farmer.

Corn Bread.

ONE QUART of corn meal, one pint of wheat flour, two eggs, and a little salt, with sour buttermilk sufficient to make a very stiff batter. Mix thoroughly, then add one teaspoonful of soda, dissolved in a little hot water. Stir this in, and pour into well-greased pans, sufficient to be one and a-half or two inches thick when cooked. Place in a hot oven, and bake till it is done, say half an hour. Carry to the table hot. If all should not be used, bake over again, and it is as good as when first baked.

Half a pint of flour and one egg will be very good, but not quite so good as the above.

The sourer the buttermilk the better; if it is not bitter. Success depends very much on the due proportion of acid and alkali.

Flae meal makes much better bread than does coarse. If it does not keep as well, provide less at a time. Dent, or gourdseed corn makes better meal than flint corn.

Some are shocked at the idea of eating drugs with their food, and exclaim against the use of alkali in cooking. Let such consider that acid neutralizes the caustic property of the alkali; and if they never eat any thing more unhealthy than that, they will do well. [Germantown Telegraph.

Infalable Rules for Measuring Corn in the Crib.

IF measured in feet:

1st. SHUCKED CORN:—Measure the length, width and depth of the crib in feet; multiply these three dimensions together and their product by 8, then cut off two figures to the right; those on the left will be so many barrels, and those cut off so many hundredths of a barrel.

2d. UNSHUCKED CORN.—Multiply the three dimensions in feet, as in rule 1st, and cut off their product by 5½; cut off two figures to the right, and the result will be barrels and hundredths, as in rule 1st.

If measured in inches:

3d. SHUCKED CORN.—Take the dimensions in inches and multiply them together; take one half of the product and divide it by 2150, and you have the bushels of shelled corn, which divide by 5 to reduce to barrels.

4th. UNSHUCKED CORN.—Multiply the dimensions as in rule 3d, and then take one-third of their product, and divide it by 2150, the result will be as in rule 3d.

These rules have been put to the most critical test by the most thorough as well as the most practical mathematicians of the southwest, and the people using them may rely upon their being accurately correct.

OBITUARIES.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

THE LATE JAS. M. DELOACH.

WHEREAS, In the inscrutable providence of the all-wise and beneficent disposer of the affairs of earth and the interests of Heaven, we as a Conference body, are this day bereft of the society of an estimable associate, and the advice and counsels of a faithful and devoted Steward of the Church, by the natural but unexpected death of our dear brother James M. Deloach, whom we are officially informed departed this life, in the consummate triumph of a living faith, at his residence in Choctaw County, on the 29th ultimo—thereby leaving the endearments of a kind and affectionate family, and sundering the most ardent and generous social ties of a large circle of warm-hearted friends and relations, and presenting to those who witnessed his death, a sublime and affecting scene of the morel majesty of religious truth. Therefore, be it Resolved:

Firstly, That in the death of brother Deloach, the Methodist Episcopal Church, has lost a modest, mild, kind-spirited and liberal hearted Christian man. One whose warmest attachments and liveliest energies ever occupied the alternate channels of her financial and Spiritual Interests.

Secondly, That we, the Quarterly Conference, as the constituted officials of Gaston Circuit, have lost an efficient, prompt, and faithful Recording Steward, whose heart and hand were alike consecrated to the purpose of our Records—and who for the space of four years, during which time he served us in this capacity—was never observed to manifest the least impatience or fatigue, whilst engaged in deliberating the concerns and welfare of the Church.

Thirdly, That society has lost a benevolent, public-spirited and high toned gentleman; who respected all the social relations of life, and was subservient in obedience and honor to the civil institutions of the country.

Fourthly, That his household have lost a provident and benign protector, his wife a "good man," his children a good father and his servants a good master.

Fifthly, That this Quarterly Conference would beguile the sorrows of his desolate household, and assuage the unfeigned sympathies of their own hearts, by appropriating the language of the evangelist, that "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

Sixthly, That these Proceedings be entered of Record upon the Minutes of this Quarterly Conference; also, that copies of the Preamble and Resolutions be furnished to the family of the deceased, and the "New Orleans Christian Advocate," for publication. J. A. HEARN, P. E.

LATE REV. JOHN W. MABRY.

AT a meeting held by the second year's Class in the Alabama Conference—the following preamble and resolutions were adopted.

WHEREAS, the Rev. John W. Mabry, deceased, (a member of our class) not being a member in full connection in the Conference—consequently, not a subject of report from the committee on memoirs; Therefore, we, his class, Resolve.

Firstly, That in him we have lost one of our best young men;

Secondly, That we greatly lament his death; but rejoice to learn that he was perfectly reigned to the will of God, so that our loss is his eternal gain.

Thirdly, That we acknowledge the hand of providence, in keeping us from a like premature death; and will, therefore, endeavor to live more humbly and devoted for the future.

Fourthly, That we do greatly sympathize with the bereaved, widowed mother of the deceased.

Fifthly, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the New Orleans Christian Advocate, for publication, and also another copy to the bereaved mother of the deceased.

J. F. R. BRANDON, Sec. J. B. POWERS, Chair.

Macon Mississippi, December 3d, 1858.

MRS. MARY COBB, wife of Augustus Cobb, died in Liberty, Amite county, on the 21st of November. Sudden indeed was the blast that chilled this cherished flower. The bright rose-tint of health lingered upon her cheek even in the hour of death. Scarcely had she time to bid adieu to weeping loved ones, ere her spirit was welcomed by a smile, unto the home of Him who gave it. It is common to record with eloquent pen the virtues of the deceased, but here need no eulogium; the brightest intellect can but gild the seal, and the halo alone will attract the eye of the stranger—but the memory of good deeds will live in the faithful heart for ever. They who knew her best, loved her most. She was a devoted member of the Methodist Church, a loving wife and fond mother. Long will the sorrow-stricken husband gaze with tearful eye on the vacant chair, and her darling babes sigh for a gentle mother's kiss. May He who noteth even the fall of the sparrow, comfort them in this their hour of deep affection.

"O sweet is the season of rest,
When life's weary journey is done!
The blush that spreads over its west,
The last ling'ring ray of its sun!

Though dreary the empire of night,
She soon shall emerge from its gloom,
And see immortality's light
Arise on the shades of the tomb.

No terror the prospect begets,
She was not mortality's slave,
The sunbeam of life as it sets
Leaves a hale of peace on the grave."

A FRIEND.

SISTER MARGARET F. KING departed this life in her 36th year, December 3d, 1858, at her residence near Brownsville, Hinds county, Mississippi, having been a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for 16 years. The writer who was intimately acquainted with the deceased, had long regarded her piety as unquestionable, and her enlightened and fixed principles as a Methodist, remarkable; under no circumstances would she compromise the principles of the Church of her choice, but firmly adhered to all its tenets. Before her widowhood, she proved herself to be one of the best of wives. Her discipline, among her children, was wholesome and efficient. She has left behind a large family, and many friends, to mourn her loss. During the first 18 days of her illness she was disqualified for conversing with her friends upon the subject of religion, owing to the peculiar condition of her nervous system; but some twenty-four hours before she departed, she became perfectly rational, and gave unmistakable evidence of her readiness to depart. Counselled with her friends, gave special directions concerning her children's future temporal and spiritual welfare, then bade adieu to all—doubtless, she exchanged a world of sorrow and trial, for that blessed estate prepared for the children of God. WATCH-NIGHT IN THE NEW CHURCH, JEFFERSON CITY.

It was around the holy altar—where
The mercy-seat was seen—
A few were gathered for the hour of prayer,
Beneath its cheering beam—
To watch the parting year's expiring breath,
And hail the new, which triumphed o'er its death.

A cloud of incense raund its altar hung,
Formed by the breath of prayer;
Fringed with the rays of God's eternal Son,
In dazzling glory there—
Where angels waft upon the brilliant wing,
The soul's immortal, richest offering.

The air was fragrant with its balmy breath,
As it to Heaven arose—
Casting a balo; o'er this vale of death,
Where friends in Christ repose.

Faith raised the veil of darkness from the tomb,
And with transcendent light dispersed its gloom.

Time seemed a moment—eternity drew near,
With all its mighty power,
And fixed a signet on the dying year,
In that impressive hour!
Set home the truths upon the waiting soul,
Like its vastness, whose waves forever roll!

Throughout our land, how many bow the knee,
Before the Savior's throne;
To consecrate anew to Deity,
Their active powers alone—
While the bright portals of eternal day
Burst as the soul, as dies the year away?

O! may this little Church, at each New Year,
By Jesus thus be blest—
And at its alter flow the grateful tear,
Which calms the troubled breast—
While numbers bow before its holy shrine,
Made sacred by the blood of Christ divine.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI.—No. V.

Original Baptist Church.

Mr. Editor: After the debarkation of our emigrant-connection, the most of them settled on and contiguous to the southern fork of Coles-creek, within ten or fifteen miles of the Mississippi River. They had to endure many privations and hardships, incident to a new country but poorly supplied with even the necessaries of life; and for several years they had to watch with vigilance the repeated incursions of hostile Indians. John Jones, who had ventured to settle on the east side of Coles-creek, just opposite the old village of Union Town, came near being overtaken by a band of these lawless maranders. Having evidence of the presence of Indians in the neighborhood, and not knowing at what moment they might make their attack, he requested his wife to take the children and hide among the spurs of the cane-ridges until he could get the horses ready for their escape to Natchez. A few moments seemed like hours to Mrs. Jones in her lonely retreat, and requesting the children to be quiet, she ventured back in sight of the house to see whether the Indians had not already captured her husband. Seeing that he was in the act of starting, she hastily returned to get the children ready, but in her excitement she missed her course, and was quite put to it to find her "hid treasure." They made good their retreat to Natchez that night; and early next morning Mr. Jones and John Courteny, his brother-in-law, returned as spies to reconnoiter. When they got near his improvement, they saw that the Indians had already destroyed his corn, which was just getting into roasting ears, killed his only milch-cow, and, venturing a little nearer, saw them in the act of emptying the feathers out of the beds, to avail themselves of the cases. Seeing they were too far outnumbered to risk an attack, they retreated. Mr. Jones immediately abandoned this border settlement, and removed to Fairchild's-creek, near the Mississippi, where he built a water-mill, and did the grinding for the community many years.

But as these incidents are foreign to my main object, I will pass them over without further detail. I have already stated that most of the prominent members of this emigrant-connection were members of the Baptist church before leaving South Carolina, and judging from the unwavering fidelity and zeal which they manifested in all their wandering and privations, their religion was that of the heart. They were regular in their family devotions from their first settlement in the country; but the Natchez District, having lately fallen under Spanish rule, which only recognized the Roman Catholic form of worship, and opposed all others, they scarcely knew what to do in regard to public worship. After mutual consultation, they agreed to meet together in their private dwellings at set times, for the purpose of reading and expounding the scriptures, exhortation and prayer, hoping in this way to keep the members united and alive to their spiritual interests. These meetings, which were found to be so profitable to the members of the church, soon attracted the attention of the American portion of the population, many of whom desired to be present, and enjoy once more the beneficial influence of Protestant worship.

Thus things went on through a series of years, without exciting much open opposition from the Catholic authorities. In the mean time, Richard Curtis had died on the 10th of November, 1784, and his son, Richard, had become quite a preacher. John Stampley, his brother-in-law, was also quite gifted in exhortation, as was also his brother, Jacob Stampley, both of whom afterwards became Baptist preachers. William Curtis, an elder brother of Richard, was gifted in extemporaneous prayer, as was also John Jones and several others. By 1790, other American settlements desired to be visited by Mr. Curtis and his lay-assistants, and their labors were soon blessed in the manifest awakening and conversion of souls.

Among the young converts, was a prominent citizen of the name of William Hamberlin, and a Spaniard by the name of Stephen de Alvo, both of whom, with several others, desired admission into the church. These pioneer workmen in the Lord's vineyard now found themselves in straitened circumstances. Mr. Curtis was only a licentiate, and no one in the county was authorized, according to the rules of the church, to administer baptism; and yet here were people desiring it, who exhibited all the usual marks of true conversion. They prudently postponed the matter until they could correspond with the parent church in South Carolina, from which they came. The church, after taking the matter under advisement, returned as their answer, "that there is no law against necessity, and under the present stress of circumstances, the members ought to assemble, and formally appoint one of their number by election, to baptize the new converts." This advice was promptly acted on, and Richard Curtis was appointed to administer the ordinance, which he accordingly did.

Opposition from the Catholic authorities had been on the increase for some time, but now it suddenly broke out in a blaze of persecution, and the little pioneer band of Protestants were perremptorily ordered to desist from all their heretical psalm-singing, praying, and preaching in public, or they would be subjected to sundry pains and penalties.

For a time, Mr. Curtis and his adherents thought the American feeling was strong enough to sustain them; and, moreover, believing their cause was the cause of God, and that truth would ultimately triumph over error, bid their opponents defiance, and even went so far as to have their places of worship guarded by armed men, while they denounced, in no very moderate terms, the "image worship," and other unscriptural doctrines and ceremonies of the Catholic church. I do not pretend to say their zeal was always according to knowledge. In common parlance, they were uneducated men, plain both in language and manners, and I have no doubt but they sometimes imprudently provoked the ire of their enemies. But the history and the results of this storm of persecution I must reserve for another number.

J. G. JONES.

THE GREAT ENTERPRIZE.

Mr. Editor: Your readers are constantly seeking for information on the aims and prospects of

The Church Evangelist.

As for its aim it is simply this; to put into the hands of every family amongst our people, a superb religious weekly paper. We need hundreds of thousands weekly, because we have millions of people who ought to receive and would gladly read such a paper. It is now the boast that the New York Ledger has the largest circulation of any paper in the world; and says it publishes half a million weekly. And yet, with the greatest facilities ever known to Christendom, there be some who think it an overgrown idea for us to talk of publishing 500,000 within a few years, to meet the wants of 3,000,000 of people—among whom in a few years, there will be 1,000,000 of communicants in full Church-fellowship.

The friends of this undertaking want to come up to the demands of the age, and keep abreast with it in its onward way. It is designed to make a noble, elevated paper, and yet to make it so cheap that every body who will read may have it.

How to Do it.

We expect to raise a few hundred thousand dollars as an endowment fund to pay for printing, press-work, mailing, editing, etc. etc., and let the Churches everywhere have them as weekly Tracts, by the dozen or by the hundred, to distribute and use.

Its Prospects.

They are cheering. Letters of enquiry pour in upon me almost daily. Some bring willing and masked offerings for the endowment—now $500, now $1000—again and again. Some of the Advocates wont let their readers know any thing about it. Very well. The people intend to have it. Several of the leading, principal Conferences have adopted it, put their sealed approval on the plan, and appointed agents to aid in endowing it—and every Conference will doubtless do the same, within another year. Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Kentucky, Texas, have taken action on it. Besides, large subscriptions for it tell a noble tale. One gentleman wants 20 copies; a lady, 20 copies; another, 100 copies; a gentleman wants 200 copies per year for life; and another says he shall need about 300 copies weekly, to give away—all these are to give away. But I cannot relate more than a mere fraction.

When To Begin.

Not till at least $100,000 have been pledged in good and reliable notes, bearing interest; and then! No interest will accrue on any note till $100,000 are pledged; and now the great question, is,

Who will take These Shares?

Surely there are 100 men and women in our Zion, who only need to understand the object, and they will not wait for an agent to come along. Write to me, or one of the agents in your Conference, and tell us your proposition. I am at work without pay, and without support from the Church, and cannot afford to go every where: and need not, for God has friends who will attend to this matter willingly. One of the strongest evidences Job produced to prove that he had been the friend of mankind, and faithful servant of God, was, as he says, that, "The cause I knew not I searched out." And Christ teaches us that he expects his friends to go in pursuit of opportunities of doing good. Hence, in the final day, He will say to them, "I was sick and ye visited me, I was in prison and ye came unto me." Search out the openings of usefulness. Dont wait to be asked for aid for this glorious enterprize.

I have asked nobody yet, and thousands of dollars have been pledged, by letter and by personal assurances; I fear I shall have to ask after a while. Have you read the circular? Let me send you one. What is your name and address? I will send any number to any body.

How I wish every body could have heard Bishop Pierce's out-spoken, noble speech for the Evangelist, before the Georgia Conference. It was worthy the cause, the man, and the Conference. All the Church needs is light on the subject. C. K. MARSHALL.

ADVANTAGES OF AN ITINERANT PASTORATE.

Mr. Editor: The notion is generally prevalent, both amongst the Methodists and others, that the success of the followers of Wesley, has been greatly promoted by the itinerant system.

In every thing that has proved itself to be useful, it is well to inquire into the elements of that utility, that they may be preserved in all their force. To what then is the success of the itinerancy to be attributed? What principles of humanity does it operate upon or call into action promotive of success?

In the first place, it furnishes a variety of ministerial talent for every community. The minds of men are variously constituted, some are moved by the beautiful and poetic, some by the astute and logical, some by the bold and strong. In some, the imaginative; in some, the reasoning; in others, the emotional powers preponderate. Access to men is usually obtained by operating upon that faculty of mind which has the ascendency in them individually.

This diversity of mind is found in the ministry and in every community. And by one congregation being served in rotation by ministers who vary in mind, every individual comes to be addressed by the gospel in that way best calculated to insure success. We find amongst the apostles great diversity in mental character. We find the same in the ministry of the present day. If the labors of these are to be confined to single congregations as settled pastors, the advantage of this diversity of talent is lost.

Again, the constant removal, at stated times, of ministers, renders it impossible for them to engage in secular employment. The itinerants are obliged, from the nature of their work, to be men of one work. Thus their work in spiritual things is not destroyed by their attention to temporal things, nor do they suffer that loss of religious influence with men, by coming in business contact with them, so commonly the misfortune with settled ministers.

Again: There is in human nature a love of variety; a fondness for something new, which is gratified by this change. Of this, it is lawful to take advantage in presenting the gospel. A new preacher, of even inferior talents, will often draw out large crowds to hear, where abler, but settled men, preach to vacuity. Many of these are often pleased and led to conversion.

This change also relieves the minister from sundry embarrassments, and keeps his zeal and activity continually revived. He has, perhaps, committed errors, in genial intercourse or in the administration of discipline; there would be drawbacks to his usefulness, if he remained where they transpired. He has failed, perhaps, to perform some ministerial duty. If he remained he would continue to neglect it, but coming in contact with a work where this duty has been performed, he, too, is stimulated to perform it. In fact, he carries with him to his new field of labor, all the skill, experience, and knowledge, that he has acquired in the previous years of his ministry, without the embarrassments in the midst of which they were obtained.

He goes amongst them too, happily ignorant of those personal collisions, which often render it difficult for him who has full knowledge of them, to preach without being considered a partizan.

Besides all this, there is an [illegible] an excitement awakened in the mind itself by the new scenes and associations that surround him. If a man will do his duty at all, he will do it upon entering upon a new business in a new place. And he does it then, not to deceive his new employers, but from the impulse naturally excited in man by such surroundings. ANNOTATOR.

Smithville, Miss., Dec., 1858.

SOUTH WESTERN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

To the Editor of the Christian Advocate.

Sir: In our last communication, in which we freed our Agent from imputations cast upon him, we intimated that, at a subsequent time, we should be desirous of replying to some charges which attached peculiarly to ourselves, as a Board of Directors. We thank you for inserting our last; we trust we shall equally owe it to your courtesy to insert the present.

Our society is an auxiliary to the American Sunday-School Union, and has for its single purpose the promotion of the Sunday-school cause in our South-west. In furthering this, we hold the Parent Society's publications for sale or distribution. These publications, we may add, have, with brief intervals, under one agency or another, been for sale in this city for over twenty-two years.

As an auxiliary, we neither employ authors, purchase manuscripts, or publish books. All the publications emanate from the Parent Society. In defining, therefore, the position of the Parent Society, we define our own. As Southern men, we exercise a conservative control over the publications coming into our field.

The American Sunday-school Union is no new thing. It is supported by the great and good in our land. Clergymen of all Evangelical denominations have advocated its claims, and hundreds of them are life-members of the Society. We mention such men as Bishops Meade, Eastburn, Henshaw, Drs. Tyng, Milnor, Plumer, Bedell, Breckenridge, Fuller, Williams, and many others whose names are esteemed in all the Churches. Our president, the Hon. John McLean, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has held that office since 1843. In his letter of acceptance, otherwise worthy of perusal, he expresses his high appreciation of the society and its objects.

Our annual reports show, at anniversary meetings, ministers of various denominations uniting in resolutions commending the Society and its usefulness. Amongst these, Divines and learned Doctors of the Methodist Church are not wanting. At the last anniversary, the annual sermon was preached in Trinity Church, New York, by the Rev. Dr. Crane of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Drs. Spear, Plumer and others, participating in the subsequent exercises.

Our publications have won esteem from the religious community, North and South. Few Sunday-schools exist in towns where some of them may not be found; and, although all Evangelical denominations have their publishing houses, yet, as a general thing, they have found it useful to employ our books, as well as their own. May we not remind you, that the last catalogue of your publishing-house at Nashville, shows that some of our elementary books, libraries, dictionaries etc., are not only held for sale by them, but are advertised as also to be found at the New Orleans and other Methodist branch Depositories. This eminence these books enjoy through the wise course pursued by the Society. The committee of publication consists of fourteen members from the following denominations, viz. Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, Lutheran, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Reformed Dutch. Not more than three of the members can be of the same denomination; and no book can be published to which any member shall object. Hence their Catholic and Evangelical character. They avoid denominational teachings, leaving the churches to prepare and publish works, explanatory of their own denominational views. We challenge any one to point out, in our publications, any doctrines in conflict with any peculiarity of your or any other Evangelical church, or to show that they give any but faithful and saving views of Gospel truth. We court the inquiry, and shall be pleased to have you examine them. Our agent is instructed to hold copies ready for your examination.

We now turn to charges of trickery, as applicable to our Society in its election of officers. A denial should suffice, but we will briefly reply thereto. Our S. W. Society is in its infancy. It held its first annual election, the one referred to, when it had scarcely any members. The majority of ourselves, as a board, were not members when elected. The nominations for each denomination were offered by a member of that denomination Of our board, so elected, one member of the Methodist Church declined serving; another member of the same Church, friendly to our Society, was elected in his stead. The change, however, was too late for the printing, so that the name of the first elected gentleman appears in our printed report, and not that of his successor. Two of the directors from the Methodist Church have sat at our meetings; the third, whom we have not yet had the pleasure of seeing there, expressed his intention of being present if his business permitted.

Among the signers of our charter, we hold the names of good and true men from the Methodist Church, who would, we think, feel little flattered at the imputation of childish vanity or other kindred feeling, as the motive for affixing their names to that instrument. Men of high standing in the same Church have given as assurance of the interest they feel in our success.

Although a plain exposition has ever been given of our organization, we again repeat it. We do not desire to accept of any subscribed sums obtained by misrepresentation, if such were possible, or through misconception. We hold ourselves responsible for the published information conveyed by our documents. Should any agent transcend our instructions, he will not be sustained therein. We herewith return you our agent's personal letter to yourself, (which you quoted from memory) to show that his expressions, in reference to our books and to denominational books, accord substantially with what we have written in this letter.

It is an absurdity to suppose that we are trying to supplant the Methodist publishing-house. It is in the sphere of its duty, we are in ours. The broad wastes of spiritual ignorance give ample scope to every Christian who wishes to labor in his Master's vineyard. So far from being too numerous, the laborers are confessedly too few.

We close with an apology for the unavoidable length of the present article, which is simply confined to a respectful defence of our conduct as Christian men; and will we hope, be final. In behalf of the Board of Directors of South-western Sunday-school Union. E. C. PAYNE.

CRITICISMS.

Mr. Editor—I feel the force of the invitation extended to me to occupy again a part of your columns. Hope I shall escape being made vain and proud by the notice you took of my former critique—I believe they call it.

Pardon this little preface, and if what follows is worthy, you are respectfully requested to give it a place in the useful—yes, I will say useful, as I love to read it—journal, over which you preside.

You are not responsible, Mr. Editor, for all the matter that appears in your paper. If you were, I should pity you from my heart. But, admitting that you were, I incline to the opinion that large portions of your "Special" and "General Correspondence" would never see the light, except under the head of "Advertisements."

I shall not trouble you or your readers with narratives of travel, although I have engaged to some good extent in that business during the year. Men will travel, and men will write about these travels, whether they think that they can tell a story or describe a scene better than their predecessors or not. Why, sir, the fact is, that men have become so fond of travel, and, withal, so fond of telling about it to the world, that one can hardly go to mill and back, without sitting down at once to inform the world of some very remarkable occurrence turning up—as, for instance, an encounter with a snake, opossum, or alligator. It may be, he has noticed some new crook in a tree, or some knot-hole in the boards on a house by the way-side, not before seen.

You must not think that, with a sharp stick, I am after any of your "Correspondents." Truly, some of them deserve a slight punishment for, if nothing else, their exaggeration. Let us take a peep into your issue of 17th November.

On the first page we have a "Letter from Paris," in which, after many things of minor importance, we have a 30,000 acre forest, with beautiful drives of interminable length. Well, all I have got to say is, that those drives are not very short, if Walker and Webster are authorities in connection with friend Thomas.

Tell "East Alabama Items and Items," to let our Baptist friends alone, in the enjoyment of the only apparent comfort they have, viz.: the belief that they are the only true Church, made so by immersion.

My eye runs over to "The Tongue—The Pen—The Press," without stopping to meddle with Presbyterian difficulties. I suppose, Mr. Editor, that this chapter is some of your getting up and I greatly admire the plan adopted to bring your readers to the study of the Bible.

That "Bible Agency Report" is done up about right. Laconic, throughout. I would hold up Mr. Massey as a model writer. All his facts in regular and systematic order. He should have been better paid for his labor of love.

Oh! that I could drive into the minds of all the young people—and many old ones, too—the principles contained in that article on "Debt."

Can that person be a thorough-going Christian, who fails to be on his knees before God in prayer, at morning and evening twilight? Doubtful! Then let all your readers notice closely, "A Suggestion."

Now, really, Mr. Editor, do you believe everything that may be written and published about revivals? I have already hinted that I have traveled a little; and, will add, that I have visited a few places where, according to the newspapers, there had been revivals. Truly there was very little sign left in view. During the present year, I read in a newspaper the statement of a man who had been at a revival for several weeks, and did not know when it would end. It did end though: but I must leave to those who removed the dead carcasses from the preaching-place, to tell how it ended. Great allowances should be made for these revival notices; therefore, let Mr. Texas Christian Observer pass this time. He may have stated facts.

"Father Smith's Two Ideas" should sink deep enough into every person's heart to influence the conduct through life. "See how these Christians love," when shall we say?

Friend Drake is sensible to the last, as is seen in his address to the Mississippi Conference Preachers. Never undertake too much. Begging is a poor employment for those who are sent to preach the gospel of Christ. While such gigantic schemes are so numerously gotten up, all over the country, requiring new and enlarged collections of money, it behoves the Church and particularly the preachers to pause ere they plunge blindly into an abyss without a bottom. "Look before you leap." Already there is an inquiry abroad, as to the reasons for such sums of money being required. Read again the words of Christ, (Luke xiv. 28, 29, 30), and compare Mr. Drake's chapter therewith. Then act.

To "Spectator," on "Female Education," I would most respectfully recommend a perusal of William Cowper's "Tirocinium." That is all I have to say to him.

How often the poor Stewards catch it! Mr. "Jefferson" says, "Pay your Preacher," and makes a hearty thrust at the poor good souls—the Stewards. Was Mr. "Jefferson" ever a Steward? Certainly not, or he would write very differently. Having been one of those poor fellows, I speak knowingly. How often have Stewards been prevented from getting large amounts privately, on account of the preacher pertinaciously and without good reason repairing a public collection. The stewards know but too well how often they are met with a repulsive answer, "I put my mite into the hat." It always requires two parties to a contract, and often, after the articles are signed and sealed, one of said parties may commit a breach and thereby release the other. Now, will Jefferson pretend to say that preachers cannot act so as to commit a breach in the contract he supposes to have been made with the stewards? Let infallibility attach to the priesthood at Rome, but, in no sense, to Methodist preachers.

Revivals have already been alluded to, but as the third page is largely filled with accounts of them, I will refer to them again.

A preacher, Lt. B. McDonald, now I trust in heaven, once had a revival, in which the writer participated. Some hundred or more were added to the Church. He did not exalt in this, nor did he write flaming sketches of the incidents, but, looking into the next year, began to pity his successor. Well he deserved that sympathy, for, out of that quantity of raw material, that successor manufactured less than a score of faithful disciples.

In conclusion. Let all come down from from their baseless, aerial positions, and deal with the realities of life and religion; and we shall then be more on an

TO THE MEMBERS OF MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Dear Brethren: I have written to each of you to ascertain if you want your Woodville "minutes" published. Lest I did not get your proper address, I resort to this means of addressing you. If you want your "minutes" published send me authority to put your name down for five dollars each, or more if you wish. Our Woodville minutes are of peculiar interest to the preachers and people, as we there inaugerated the lay-co-operation, which materially modified our entire plan of Conference operations. Every intelligent layman wants the minutes, I have not talked with an exception; for every one is liable to be called on to go to Conference, to bear a part in the business of the Church; he therefore wants to know the nature and state of our business. Ask them for the money, they will give it. Write me at once to consider you responsible for a stated sum; and when that sum justifies it; the minutes will be speedily forthcoming. Laymen are at liberty to subscribe and draw "minutes." Hoping to hear from you without delay, I am dear brethren, yours in the Gospel, W. P. BARTON.

THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

The Book and Tract Society of this Conference, having been put in operation before the last General Conference, did not of course, contain the feature of co-operation with the Publishing House at Nashville, and an interest in the business of the same, provided for at that time by the general law of the Church. The Society has been in pretty successful operation during a large portion of two years, but it was merely a Conference Depository, with no interest in the Publishing-house.

The Mississippi Conference, at its last session at Woodville, took such action, by the passing of suitable resolutions, as would place the Society in this desirable relation to the Publishing-house, so far as its action was requisite for such a purpose. Similar action on the part of the shareholders of the Society, looking to the same end, may probably be necessary. This action will of course be readily had at any time.

So that the Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference may now be regarded as occupying the same ground, precisely, as the Societies of the other Conferences, with a common interest in the Publishing house at Nashville.

It is expected that hereafter shares will be received in this Society on the same terms as those of other Societies, and that therefore it will receive books at cost from the Publishing-house.

It is hoped that the capital of this Society will be increased by further subscribers; and that those subscribers whose notes are due will see them paid at an early day; and that the business will be thus increased, so that by a suug system and careful colportage, and otherwise, the territory of this Conference will be supplied, in some reasonable degree, with a wholesome moral and religious reading.

It is to be hoped that the ensuing year may be one of great usefulness to this Society, and that its traveling agents, Revs. H. H. Montgomery and J. H. Merrill, may find their labors this year connected with greater usefulness to the Church than any previous year of their lives.

THE GENEALOGICAL FAMILY BIBLE.

To the Shareholders of the Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference.

The Genealogical Family Bible, to which the shareholders in this and other Book and Tract Societies are entitled, in virtue of their subscriptions for Shares, has not made its appearance so soon as was expected.

This delay is attributable to many things, incident to the getting up of any new thing of the sort. Everything of a mechanical nature about the book is entirely new. None of the binding material in it was ever used in this country before; nor was the parchment paper, of which the Genealogical Register is made, ever subjected to lithographic printing before. To get everything as near right as practicable, these things required considerable delays.

The book could have been furnished long ago—as good a book as was promised—but it would not have been as good a book as this will be. It has not been hurried. A few months delay is considered of no material importance.

A few sample copies are expected to be received in Vicksburg in the course of the present month, but a supply for subscribers will be delayed some time further.

Since I was in New York, eight or ten other Conferences have established Depositaries similar to this in Mississippi, which have increased the demand for the Bible greatly beyond my calculations, and it will require quite a number of copies to furnish samples to Conference agents, and others in these various Conferences.

It must be remembered that a book of this sort cannot be hurried through a bindery as an ordinary book could be; but so soon as suitable arrangements can be made, any quantity can be supplied. This will require some little time. There need be no special hurry. The book will be in hand in reasonable time, and it is hoped it will please the subscribers. Yours truly, etc., R. AUBEY.

SHOOTING REV. MR. GREEN—TRIAL OF FISHER.

Mr. Editor: You, in common with every lover of righteousness, have felt no little interest in the result of the trial of Fisher for shooting Rev. Peter E. Green.

It will be remembered that in the fall of 1858, Fisher went an Green's premises in this County, and without provocation (or with so little that it was not worthy of the name) shot Green with a revolver. The first ball took effect near the right nipple, the second passed through Green's sleeve.

All right-minded men regarded it as one of the greatest outrages that could be perpetrated.

Last Saturday the case was concluded in our Circuit Court. I heard a part of the pleading. Hon. C. L. Buck assisted District Attorney Buck, in the prosecution. It was a fine field for Hon. Wm. Buck's eloquence, and right well did he improve it. His appeals to the jury, as the upholders of the dignity of law and the guardians of unprotected innocency, were masterly.

The criminal was defended by Hon. W. Brooke and Governor Foote. Their speeches evinced several things to attentive hearers. They showed much skill in sophistry, some familiarity with the poets—Goldsmith, Montgomery and Shakespeare. They read the Scriptures, and preached some. Showed little respect for preachers, and a supreme contempt for "a class of Parsons;" and, Mr. Green of course is in that class.

In the absence of even a mitigating circumstance to relieve their client, they endeavored by innuendo or direct assertion, sometimes confirmed by an oath, to blacken Green's character.

It has occurred to some, that these gentlemen presumed on their professional position to do what public sentiment will not sustain them in doing in this Christian land.

Their defence of Fisher degenerated into a masterly persecution of an innocent, injured man, whose reputation has been hitherto unsullied. Deen fidelity to a client, or the ends of law or justice, require it?

But all availed nothing; the jury were out but a few minutes and returned with a verdict of "Guilty." The penalty is the Penitentiary.

CENTENARY INSTITUTE.

Mr. Editor: Through the Advocate, we desire to direct the attention of the public to an erroneous impression which has obtained to a considerable extent, and very much to the detriment of the Centenary Institute. The impression alluded to is, that the different departments of the Institution are full and that no more can be received.

The Boarding department of the Female College had received its complete number of boarders before Christmas. Since which, however, arrangements have been made for the accommodation of an additional number of young ladies.

Besides, there are excellent private boarding houses for both sexes in the village, contiguous to all of the departments. So that none need stay away for want of boarding accommodations. Already the Centenary Institute contains 360 pupils, and we are receiving additions every day. But we still feel that we shall be able to redeem a pledge made last fall, viz: "that we would find accommodations for all who might come."

Thus far, with the exception of bad colds, the students in all the departments have enjoyed uninterrupted health. Besides, we had during the last year, from Christmas to Christmas, two seasons of revival, in which our students of both sexes shared largely.

Then, with good health, good facilities (and no institution can boast of better) and good religious advantages and influences, who will limit the prosperity of the Centenary Institute?

Who would not say, God speed her on her high and holy mission, the establishment of a high standard of sanctified learning and the general diffusion of a sacred literature?

May the Great Head of the Church foster and bless all of our institutions and enterprises, that, have in view the melioration of man and the glory of God.

YOUR EYE, A MINUTE.

Mr. Editor: I want the eye of those who look a-head, for our minute. In nothing do we commit greater blunders than in building our Churches. A book ought to be written on the subject, and it should contain plans and drawings with estimates, etc., to guide our people in making contracts, and so save them from the gross blunders in style, form, size, cost and finish into which they are daily thrown. I say daily, for hundreds of Churches are being built all the time, and millions of dollars have been needlessly flung away for the poorest and most miserable caricatures imaginable. But that is not the point of this note; the present point is a suggestion. I saw, recently, one of the neatest houses of worship I have seen in many years, in the suburbs of a certain city, which was designed for a beginning of a congregation that may not attain its growth in ten years. But when the congregation doubles the Church will be full, and yet too small. Had the Church been built wider, and the pulpit end left temporarily filled up, then, when the growth of the audience should require enlargement, the end could have been removed and the house so extended as to bring the building into symmetrical proportion, and so finished.

Conclusion.

I beg brethren, in building in the suburbs of cities, or in growing towns, to consider the advantage of so constructing their houses as to admit of a future extension endwise, so as to meet the growing wants of an increasing population. I have a few other hints for another time.

LETTER FROM A PREACHER'S WIFE.

[The young lady who writes the following has just been "received on trial" in "the traveling connection."—EDITOR.]

Mr. Editor: Although I have not the pleasure of your acquaintance personally, yet from the time of my conversion and connection with the Church and people of God, I have been a constant reader of your interesting editorials, which makes me feel as though I knew you. You will therefore excuse me for trespassing on your patience and generosity. I have lately made an interesting trip from my home in Covington, Louisiana, to Spring-Ridge Mississippi. I was like Abraham of old, not knowing whither I was going; but I went, trusting in God, as did that venerable patriarch, knowing that he would be a father to the faithful. We arrived at the City-hotel, New Orleans, about noon of the 23d December; were introduced into a magnificent parlor where comfort and elegance were both combined. After a short stay there, we ascended to our room, which was also nice and comfortable. Although I was so comfortably situated, I shall never forget the feelings of that evening, as I was leaving, for an indefinite time, the home of my childhood, together with my dear father and affectionate brothers and sisters. It being the first time that I ever was entirely among strangers, I do not know what I should have done, had I not had with me one of the best and most affectionate travelling companions in the world; a few kind words from him soon dispelled all my sad and lonely feelings. Oh! how grateful I shall always feel towards him for his kind words and interesting conversation that evening. We dined about four o'clock—a splendid dinner. There were two very large tables, well filled with guests. I don't think I ever saw so many finely dressed, ordinary-looking ladies before.—How much I admire systematic regulations in everything, it makes one feel as though they were living for more than to-day. Soon after retiring to rest, I heard the sweetest music I ever listened to, performed by a lady in the parlor below; the music was accompanied by her sweet voice, which soon lulled me to the sweet land of dreams. Next morning we started in the coach for the Jackson Railroad depot. By-the-by, in starting from the City-hotel, my traveling companion after procuring me a seat in the coach was crowded out himself, and had to take a seat in another coach. The separation, although so short, seemed to me to have been an age. When we entered the cars, I found some of my old and intimate friends, whom I was very glad to meet, their company added some to the pleasure of our trip. The cars started, and on we flew, over swamp, hill, and valley, occasionally passing a log cabin with ever so many dirty-faced and uncombed children; I thought as the cars had been running for so many months, that the sight of them was not new, but to my utmost astonishment they seemed to retain all their novelty; every one seemed to rush to get a peep at them—men, women, children. Here and there might be seen a negro gaping. It was all so amusing to me; I hope some day that I shall take another trip on the cars to the Crescent city. We passed quite a number of depots—some thriving and beautiful little towns. I was really surprized to see what nice houses were built at some of them, and it looked more strange and surprising to see them in a forest of pine trees.

I think there must be some good people at Amite and Brookhaven; as I saw a very pretty and commodious church at Amite and I remember seeing two other very neat and beautiful ones at Brookhaven. I think the churches speak well for the people, for if they were not a noble, generous-hearted, God-serving people, they would not have such churches.

I hope, next time I pass that way, to see a temple of the Lord at every depot. I think Brookhaven must be the pride of the road, as it was the prettiest town I saw. It is more regularly laid out than the others, and has several pretty buildings. They have very good accommodations there for hungry passengers arriving about the middle afternoon from the city. They have several fine hotels; the cars only stop twenty minutes for dining. After leaving my favorite Brookhaven and passing other depots, but none so interesting, we soon reached Terry's depot; a small, but pretty place, where our delightful car-riding ended; we then took the stage and went into the country six or eight miles which only took us a short time although the road was very wet and heavy. Once in a while the wheels of the huge stage would go down deep into the mud, and though it was night I did not feel the least alarmed, for we had one of the best and most careful drivers. How comfortable the houses looked, with their brilliant Christmas lights peeping out of the doors and windows. I presumed they were the residences of the farmers. On we went through mud and water until we came to the residence of a noble-hearted, Christian gentleman, where we were kindly received and hospitably entertained until next morning, which was Christmas.

The moruleg's devotion ended, we partook of a Christmas breakfast, but could not remain long. BETTIE.

THE UNBLESSED MEAL.

Thirty years ago a little boy, the son of pious parents, was invited to spend a few days at the house of a friendly family. When dinner came on the table Phillip, though very hungry after his journey, could not be persuaded to touch a morsel of food. Again and again did they urge him to eat, and as often did he look wistfully at the contents of the table, but resolutely declined. At length the lady kindly inquired if there was any reason why he did not eat dinner. Bursting into tears, and sobbing so that he scarcely speak, he exclaimed—"You haven't blessed it!" That family ever afterwards asked the blessing of God on their food, and that little boy is now a missionary in Jamaica.

TEN THOUSAND.

But one More Number.

The next issue of the Advocate closes the present volume. We trust all our old friends—our present subscribers—will stay with us, and assist and encourage us in our efforts to do good. We hope, also, to have a host of new subscribers for the new volume. Begin with the volume; it is quite pleasant to have an unbroken volume on file. We shall print a much larger edition than usual with the beginning of the new volume, so that those who subscribe for some weeks to come may receive the back numbers from the first. Our agents and friends will please be sure to send enough new subscribers to exhaust the extra papers, so that nothing be lost.

Encouragement.

We have much to encourage us. From all parts, the officers in our great army—the preachers—send up most cheering reports. New subscribers increase in number every week, and the accompanying cash also. They tell us that the New Orleans Christian Advocate is growing in public favor. Alabama takes the lead so far—Mississippi next, and gaining on Alabama—Louisiana will report as soon as the preachers get fairly to work. Elsewhere, also, we are circulating.

Ten Thousand this Year.

Let us all keep that figure before our minds, and before the people. If every agent votes for it, it is certain to be reached. Let each one do his full part in reaching it. See how many more subscribers you can get in your field. Show the Advocate—talk about it—recommend it—in the pulpit—in pastoral and social visiting. Ask everywhere, "Do you take the Advocate?" Ten thousand! Ten thousand! Ten Thousand!

TO THE PREACHER.

Brother! Your position is responsible, and therefore worthy and inspiring. You are the clergyman of your Church in the station to which you are appointed. You are the representative of the character and honor of both your ministry and Church. Always be conscious of this representative character, and you will never do, or say, or be, any thing of which your Church and brother clergymen will be ashamed. Think of Paul, of Mr. Wesley, of Bishops Asbury, McKendree, Soule, of the wisest and holiest men in our Church, and ask yourself, "How would they act or speak in my circumstances?"

You are the representative, also, of the Lord Jesus Christ, of his cause, of his gospel, of his salvation, of his name, his honor and his glory. Read and study his life and teachings, and you will know how to represent him. How would he have you act and speak were he now to visit and converse with you? Should the Holy Ghost—which inspired the Prophets and Apostles, and which enlightens, sanctifies, and comforts you—should He put his influences upon your mind and heart into words, what directions would He give you, as to the ordering of that part of your life which you are now living? O solemn questions! Let them sink down into your years. You are to be the instrument in the hands of God of building up, in faith and holiness, His flock, over which you are made an overseer—if your pastorate has His blessing. You are His ambassador, bringing glad tidings to the rebellious, and are to be the instrument of their salvation—if your preaching has His blessing. All the interests of the cause of Christ and of His Church are in your hands, for improvement or loss, so far as your charge is concerned. Your brethren, the Church, and Christ wait to hear from you.

THE FAR WEST.

Our friend and brother, Rev. R. F. Bunting, Presbyterian minister at San Antonio, Texas, publishes in the True Witness of this city, a very urgent appeal for Presbyterian ministers to supply the destitute places in the Presbytery of Western Texas, to which he belongs. Mr. Bunting is a faithful, zealous, and catholic-spirited preacher of the gospel, and fully appreciates the value of the opening missionary field of which he writes. The "wisdom" of the formation of our Rio Grande Mission Conference is "justified" by his statements. We earnestly hope that our brethren already in that field will, as Rev. O. Fisher would say, "push the battle to the gate."

Of the Germans in the West, Mr. Bunting says: "New Braunfels, in Comal county, has a population of near two thousand; and Castroville, in Medina county, has six hundred; and Fredricksburg, in Gillespie county, has several hundreds; and other smaller towns and large neighborhoods, should all have Presbyterian preaching. They have the peculiar notions of the fatherland in religious matters, and greatly need sound gospel truth. They must either be converted or they must perish. They are willing to hear, and would help to sustain an educated minister. Who will come and enter upon this work? Certainly a more inviting missionary (German) field cannot be found. They are an industrious and thriving people, and their lands are superior in location and richness. They number by thousands, have their printing presses, schools, infidel-clubs, etc.; and are still coming. The harvest is ripe. The beautiful Cibolo Valley—which is noted for its rich lands, fine location, intelligent and highly refined citizens—is but partly occupied. Here is a noble field."

Of the Rio Grande region, he says: "On the lower Rio Grande, at Rio Grande city, and Roma and Laredo, we should have a minister. These places are rapidly increasing in population and business, and should be occupied by our church at once. The new "Rio Grande Conference" expects to supply them this year if possible: we should be there also."

"I would direct attention to El Paso, which lies 650 miles north-west from this city. It is on the upper Rio Grande, and bounded by New Mexico and Chihuahua. It lies on the mail-route from New Orleans and San Antonio to San Diego, Cal., which now runs weekly with six-mule coaches, and on the great Memphis and St. Louis over-land mail route. The country has over 3,000 inhabitants, and without a Protestant preacher. The soil is dry upon the uplands, but red and rich in the valleys, where wheat and corn grow well. Coal is found in abundance. The hills are covered with several species of most delicious grapes, which will doubtless at no distant day be what Languedoc is to France. No country in the world can compete with them in the style, size, and flavor of their onions; whilst their pears, quinces, and grapes grow very large and are of extra superior quality. The valley is fast filling up, and we should most certainly have a man performing missionary labor among them."

"There are a number of little towns around El Paso, whilst Fort Bliss is near by, and Fort Fillmore (which lies on the direct mail route) is about forty-four miles north. In both forts a large number of troops and officers, with their families, are continually stationed. Here is a glorious field for any energetic man who is willing to occupy the frontier. A knowledge of the Spanish language would be very important here, and also on the lower Rio Grande. Our countrymen are there—some of them I know who have been trained in our churches—and a corrupt Catholicism is their only worship. They are willing to do their part in sustaining the gospel. They look to us for help—shall we entirely neglect them?"

A PRACTICAL "CRISIS."

The editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal is as famous for discovering new "crises" in Methodism as certain astronomers are for discovering new planets. He is now writing a series of very interesting and edifying articles, headed "An Actual Crisis in Methodism," The articles are good—Dr. Stevens' articles always are—but we object to the title. We regard it as an inappropriate text for a good sermon. There is an uneasy, feverish character attaching to such things, which we regard as unhealthy in tendency.

But while the editor is laboring to manufacture a crisis out of the current facts and tendencies of Methodism—such a crisis could have been discovered any time since Mr. Asbury became Bishop—a real, practical crisis, unexpected, too, forces itself upon his attention. The filibusters and slave-traders and their doings—reported to him by telegraph—astound him out of propriety, and "rascalities," "infamies," "enormous events," are words that fall from his pen-point in a stream; and he calls for a "summary demonstration" (hanging?) and threatens that "an anti-slavery agitation will be roused such as has not been dreamed of." Feverish again.

Upon the merits of the questions involved in the facts of which he speaks, we have no desire to express an opinion. But we assure our brother editor that such "nervous excitement" and wrathful volubility will do no good. The "holy horror" argument has ceased to have weight in the South. Better logic must be resorted to. And the threat of increased agitation has still less weight. The South has learned enough of the conscientious sensibilities of the abolitionists, and has experienced enough of their "agitations," to care not a particle for either the one or the other. The truth is, this affected superior sanctity (under the circumstances,) and these threats, are very strong influences in increasing the pro-slaveryism of the South. They are increasing the number of those who favor the slave-trade, and actually raising up apologists for it in the North itself. Within a week, we have read extracts from both Northern and Western papers, both Democratic and Republican, coolly questioning the soundness of the popular opinion on this subject.

The South has not originated this tendency. The abolitionists have done it. And no form of this fanaticism has had a stronger influence in this direction than that which is called religious. Preaching, and praying, and declaiming about slavery—denouncing the Christian masters of happy servants, and neglecting the wretched free negroes and white poor of the North—enticing, and forcing away, servants from their masters, and sending out incendiary documents and emissaries to do mischief in the South; all these things together tend but little to increase the regard of the South for the sensibilities of abolitionists on this subject. Northern men and ships, also, have been carrying on the slave-trade for years, until at last they have obtained a little Southern co-operation. And if this everlasting abuse and threatening continue, we predict that public opinion in reference to the slave-trade will become what it is in reference to slavery itself. This is the present tendency, and these are the causes of it; and the sooner wise and candid men find it out the better.

What good will it do for abolitionists to lecture the South about "respect for the laws" in reference to these subjects, when it is notorious that this "higher-law" doctrine, in disregard of the Constitution and of enactments of Congress, commenced in the North? When it is well known to the whole country that Northern people, Churches, and ministers, glory in violating the laws, and even solemn covenants, when those laws and covenants require the return of the servants which abolitionists had enticed away. The same Christian Advocate und Journal, which is now so horrified at Southern violations of the law, has been as dumb as death in reference to the rampant tramplings upon the Fugitive Slave Law so common in the North.

BURIAL OF "THE LOST PREACHER."

It is no doubt remembered by our readers that Rev. J. A. Brooks, of the Northern Methodist Church in California, perished in the snow many months since, having lost his way in the mountains. A hunter found and buried his remains. Recently, as we learn from the California Christian Advocate, they were removed and buried at a more suitable place. It was done by his brethren, at the time of a quarterly meeting, in a solemn and appropriate manner. The writer says: "The whole congregation joined in procession and followed the coffin which contained the remains of our departed brother to their resting place, the preachers present, travelling and local, taking the place of chief mourners. The verses known as "The White Pilgrim," were slightly altered to suit the occasion, and sung with good effect at the grave. The friends at Scott Valley intended to enclose the grave with a neat fence, and the friends at Yreka, at the suggestion of brother Hazen, who was present at the burial, have offered to furnish a suitable monument to the memory of "The Lost Preacher." Rev. D. H. Lowry and brother Shatzel of Scott Valley, volunteered to go and get these remains; and to accomplish their object required a mountain journey of five days. The friends of the deceased owe these brethren a heavy debt of gratitude for their efforts in this matter. The things which were found with his bones are, a twenty dollar gold piece, a copy of "Select Melodies" with a book-mark, on which were wrought, in dark hair, the thrilling words, "Think of me;" two small Testaments bound in black morocco, with tucks and gilt edges; a gold ring, a silver watch, and a white silk pocket-handkerchief, in a state of perfect preservation.

"A reward of $25 is offered for the breast-pin he is known to have carried with him, and $50 for saddle-bags and breast-pin. His bones and relics above mentioned were found near the summit of the divide between the Trinity and the Salmon rivers. Could he have gone a few rods farther he would have reached what is said to be the highest point of the coast-range of mountains, and would have been in sight of a house, which is however three miles down from the summit, and on the side of the ridge opposite where he fell. A short distance below where he perished, was found his overcoat hanging on bushes, and an empty match-box, showing he had spent the last match. The overcoat was so decayed that on taking it up it fell to pieces."

"CHARGES."

Can an Annual Conference recognize the existence of a "charge" against one of its members, unless presented in writing? No. Can an Annual Conference recognize the existence of such charge unless a copy has been presented to the accused member in ample time for him to prepare for trial? No. Are not "specifications" the constituent elements of a charge—necessary to its existence—and, therefore, when a man is charged, must not the specifications accuse him definitely of the things he has done, or said, or written, etc? Yes. Can an Annual Conference recognize the existence of a charge against one of its members unless accompanied with definite specifications? No. When it is alleged that there are charges against a member of an Annual Conference, but that they are not in form for presentation, either from inability to define the specifications or to procure evidence, should he be rendered unavailable for an appointment, or suspended as to the passage of his character, or have his case referred to a presiding elder? No. What is the Disciplinary course open to those who have charges against a member of an Annual Conference, but which, from any cause, are not in form or condition for presentation or trial? The usual course of "trial by a committee" afterwards. Is it not necessary for proper administration, and to safety of ministerial reputation, that the Bishops see that the law be administered according to these principles? Yes.

BISHOP ASBURY.

The Knickerbocker Magazine has purchased the subscription list of the National Magazine—the monthly of the Northern Methodist Church—and enters its fifty-third year in high spirits. Those who wish to see a specimen copy can have one for nine cents (postage stamps) sent to John A. Gray, Publisher, N. Y. As a sample of the January number, we copy from Dr. A. Stevens' article on Bishop Asbury. "The new Bishop, whether legitimate or illegitimate, went to work more energetically than ever, and for the remainder of his life traveled, mostly on horseback, at the rate of the circumference of the globe every four years." His salary was still sixty-four dollars per annum and his expenses. He ordained his preachers from Maine to Georgia. His presiding mind swayed his Conferences, and gave organic symmetry and prominence to the rising denomination. He preached nearly every day, and usually several times a day. He planned his "appointments" a half year beforehand, from the Gulf to the St. Lawrence, usually passing twice a year over the whole length of the country, and he was expected without fear of disappointment, (for he was as precise as Wellington,) in the towns and villages on his route. He rode on horseback, till he was too infirm to travel so any more, and then took to his "wagon," a vehicle which, beyond question, has traveled more extensively than any other ever seen in the New World; its fragments are still kept by Methodists, as sacred relics, and possibly, may in some coming age, be worshipped as heartily as St. Veronica's pocket-handkerchief in St. Peter's. He sent his preachers across the Alleghanies, and kept them in the very van of the westward march of emigration. The first "ordination" in the Valley of the Mississippi, was performed by his hands. Armed hunters, twenty-five or fifty in number, used to escort him from point to point, to protect him from the Indians, and great were the gatherings and grand the jubilees wherever he appeared. His marked characteristics were few, but remarkably strong. They are not painted, in our conception of his character, but sculptured. He was altogether a wonderful man. Born in lowly circumstances, enlied early to the ministry, and when in it burdened with labors truly amazing, he had but little opportunity for mental cultivation. Yet he possessed all the personal dignity of the episcopal office, while declining its usual honors and exemptions. While he directed, with inflexible authority, the ministerial hosts of his great diocese, he transcended the meanest of them in sufferings, labors, and journeyings. Fifty-five years he was a preacher; forty-five of them he spent on our Continent. It is estimated that he sat in two hundred and twenty-four 'Annual Conferences,' and ordained about four thousand ministers.

DEFINING THEIR POSITIONS.

The papers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, are beginning to define their positions and marshal their forces, in view of their next General Conference, in May, 1860, when another great battle is to be fought on the slavery question. They are far from being harmonious. Dr. Stevens, of the Christian Advocate and Journal, rather provokingly self-complacent, says:

"On even the most exasperated questions among us, all our official papers—without, we believe, an exception—have come practically on to the ground of this paper; holding still to their theoretical differences, they all now recognize as practically best the course we have all along advocated. We expected this, and have contentedly waited for time, that is, for Providence, to bring us to such."

To this the Western Christian Advocate, replies: "We have often asked the question ourself, and often been asked the same by others. We have endeavored, candidly we think, to learn the real position of Dr. Stevens; but we have been able to ascertain only his negative position. We can find where he is not, better than where he is, except so far as the foregoing declaration defines his whereabouts. To be more specific, what is the position of the Advocate on the subject of slave-holding in the membership? Is the Christian Advocate and Journal in favor of so changing the General Rule as to make its language condemn slaveholding as clearly as it condemns slave-buying and selling? This is the doctrine of Zion's Herald, the North-Western Christian Advocate, and of the Western Christian Advocate, and we think also of the Northen Christian Advocate, although we can not speak so confidently of this as of the other three. But we have failed to find any thing in the Christian Advocate and Journal that enables us to know what is the precise position of that paper on the point in question. We are equally in the dark as to the position of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, and the Central. We claim that the Western Christian Advocate has clearly defined its position on the subject of slavery; but we are willing here to repeat what our position is:"

"1. That the General Rule should be so amended as to condemn, in language, slaveholding, as explicitly as it condemns slave-buying and selling."

"2. That the chapter should be amended in conformity with the amended General Rule, so as to condemn slaveholding in the membership, without regard to the distinction of official and unofficial members."

"Will the Christian Advocate and Journal be as explicit as we have been in defining its position?"

We think Dr. Stevens is under obligation to define, at least, as to the positive part of his position. We all understand that he is not in favor of making the General Rule more anti-slavery than it is, except by the constitutional mode—a three-fourths vote in the Annual Conferences, and a two-thirds vote in the General Conference. But is he in favor of the change at all? But then, also, the Western, North-Western, and Northern Advocates, and Zion's Herald, are under equal obligations to define their positions as to whether or not they are willing to abide by the results of the constitutional method of change above mentioned. We should be glad to see positions defined all round, on both these questions.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

This will be a standing head—a distinct department of the Advocate—not only as a record of revivals, but also of every item of interest bearing on the progress and prosperity of the Church. Our brethren in California are reporting not only the results of their camp-meetings and protracted meetings, but also those of their protracted meetings. We hope all our brethren, from all parts of the work, will report fully. Let the Church know what is being accomplished, in conversions, accessions, collections, Sunday-schools, circulation of periodicals, sales of books, building of churches and parsonages. Give us facts—not much description—no high-falutin—no unnecessary words; of the latter we have on hand now a full supply.

ONE MAN GIVES $700,000.

The Hartford Times of the 3d inst., says: The will of the Hon. Henry L. Ellsworth was proved to-day. It is said that Mr. E. was worth $800,000 at the time of his death. His immense land speculations at the West, now in cultivated farms, proved immensely profitable to him. The remarkable part of his will is, that he gives to Yale College seven-eighths of his great estate. The provisions of his will are—1. $25,000 in trust to his son, Henry W. Ellsworth; 2. $25,000 to his daughter, wife of Roswell Smith, Esq.; 3. $25,000 to the heirs of his son Edward; 4. $1,500 annually to his wife. The remainder of his property, amounting to about seven hundred thousand dollars, he gives to Yale College; and this sum amounts to more, probably, than the present entire worth of that corporation.

This looks somewhat as if men were beginning to understand the doctrine of glorifying God with "all they have and are." We hope to hear that some Methodist or friend, has set apart a sum sufficient to endow Centenary College—that another one has set apart enough to finish the endowment of the "Southern University"—that another has finished the endowment of East Alabama Male College—and that others have given sufficient to send a large missionary force to Japan, China, and Central America.

PACIFIC METHODISM.

The Pacific Methodist has recently received a donation of $25 from a friend, a preacher, who has given $50 previously. His name is not published. The editor makes an appeal in behalf of the Depository. They hope that Bishop Pierce may bring pecuniary assistance in building their new church in San Francisco, and we sympathize in the hope. But the people must furnish the Bishop with the money, or he cannot take it. Rev. B. W. Taylor from Texas, has gone into the work, as a supply, in the Los Angeles region.

We trust a strong corps of the best kind of local preachers, single and with small families, will go out for the work in California and Oregon. If they could not all go with Bishop Pierce, they could get ready, correspond with him, and fill any openings he might report. What a field opens in that direction!

We are anxious to hear of some local preacher, who has the means, going out and making his own work in that country, supporting himself; or, if not able, making arrangements with friends at home to be supported. Is there no private enterprise among us? Is it all swallowed up by men who go out risking every thing to make a fortune? We fear it is true.

MINUTES OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Preachers in charge of Districts, Circuits and Missions—appointments that do not indicate any particular post-office, will please forward to me their address as soon as possible, if they wish to be supplied with the Minutes of the Conference. As I expect to send them out by mail, and of course must pre-pay the postage, I cannot venture to send to any one of whose post-office I am not informed.

The Minutes are now in the hands of the printer, and will be out and ready for delivery by the time this notice reaches you. T. W. Dorman, Sec'y. Ala. Con.

Marion, Ala., Dec. 30, 1858.

Singers Sewing Machines.—These justly celebrated Machines have been thoroughly tried in this region and proved to be all that is claimed for them, and the agent is doubtless correct in stating that the only reliable evidence of success of Sewing Machines, is the certificates of those who use them.

LITERARY.

St. Louis Christian Advocate.

The first issue of 1859 is the first number of the ninth volume. According to previous announcement, it is enlarged—now about the size of the Nashville Advocate—and rejoices in a new dress of type—making it altogether one of the largest and most comely-looking of our Church papers. It is also ably and industriously edited. Its financial condition is sound and prosperous. It has the confidence and sympathy of the preachers and people of the patronizing Conferences. Its subscription list is steadily increasing, about one hundred subscribers having been added in two weeks.

Dr. McAnally deserves such appreciation; for, to his untiring industry, self-sacrifice, powers of endurance, financial skill and caution, and editorial ability, the Church is indebted for the present position and prospects of her St. Louis Journal. We rejoice in his success. We rejoice that in that great commercial centre of the North-west—what New Orleans is to the South-west—we have a large, able, and prosperous weekly paper. It is undeniable that until our Western papers began to flourish, the attention and culture necessary to our successful development in the West, were not bestowed by our Church and its authorities. The Great West demands all the strength we can bring to bear upon it, and every interest we have in it should be assiduously cultivated.

Harper for January.

"Harper" is the greatest magazine-success known to the history of periodical literature. That success is the more remarkable from the fact that magazine publishing is among the most dangerous of enterprises. The whole past of American literary history is full of the wrecks of similar enterprises which failed to take the tide and breeze of popular demand and support. Harper's success in these very things, where others have failed, is wonderful. Nothing but the most thorough acquaintance with the grade of culture, and tendencies of thought, taste and feeling, of the popular American mind,—nothing but the very best judgment as to what is "readable"—the foundation of all successful editorship—could have attained such a success.

Harper has been blamed for this very thing, but for this very thing we commend him. Without pandering to vicious tastes or tendencies, he has simply adapted himself to the great mass of the American people, instead of to a class, religious, political, or literary. And yet while popular, those of the most cultivated literary tastes, and of the most profound thought and acquirements, have had their "portion in due season." Its arrangements and provisions have been catholic instead of exclusive, as all things intended for the general good should be. The neglect of this—the determinate devotion of "class" and caste men to a foregone conclusion, a fixed fact—has been the rock on which quarterlies, monthlies, and weeklies, without number, have been destroyed. The only road to ideal success, in periodicals at least, is that of popular success. With financial excellency as the rock to stand upon, and with the wings of large circulation, it is easy to rise into the highest literary permanency. The present number of Harper contains original contributions from William Cullen Bryant, John Esten Cooke, George William Curtis, A. H. Guernsey, Lieut A. W. Habersham, Rev. Dr. A. A. Lipscomb, B. J. Lossing, F. H. Ludlow, Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, Donald G. Mitchell, Rev. S. J. Prime, Dr. F. N. Otis, Mrs. E. D. B. Stoddard, and other American writers.

To us, the feature of Harper that most commands our approbation and admiration is, the truthful and happy combination, in its character, of the genius and taste of all classes of literary men, in the Church and out of it. The basis of the character of Harper, however, is a consistent recognition of the Christian religion. It is therefore sound, but not one-sided or exclusive.

Methodist Pulpit, South.

This is the title of the long-expected volume of Sermons, by Mr. William T. Smithson, of Washington city. It is ornamented by his own likeness, and by the likenesses of all the distinguished men whose sermons it contains, with the exception of that of Rev. Josephus Anderson, of the Florida Conference. There are nineteen sermons, by preachers chosen from among the ablest and most eloquent of the Southern Church. In this book the reader has a tolerably fair exhibition of the pulpit power of Southern Methodist preachers. It is worthy of a place in the library of every Methodist in the land; and there are thousands of others doubtless who, if its merits were presented to them, would be glad to possess it.

The likenesses, in the main, are excellent; and this doubles the value of the book. We know of nothing that we would value more than a book of likenesses of the distinguished men who have occupied, and now occupy, the stage of our ecclesiastical history. How would such a book be prized by our children, and by the children of the present generation generally, after we are all dead and gone!

The best likenesses are those of Dr. Wightman, Dr. Cross, Bishop Pierce, Dr. Wadsworth, Dr. Means, Dr. Whitefoord Smith, Dr. Summers, Dr. Hinton, Rev. S. G. Starks, Dr. Lee, and Dr. Doggett. Some of the others we are not able to decide upon, and one or two we do not think good.

Besides the value of the book—and it is not small—it has claims upon the patronage of the Church that we hope will be responded to throughout our bounds. Mr. Smithson does not derive a dollar's advantage from its sale—the entire proceeds being intended to assist in the noble enterprise of building such a Church as we ought to have in our National Metropolis. Let the orders for it pour into this Depository from all parts of the country. A full supply is ordered, and will be here shortly.

Autocrat of the Breakfast Table.

In our notices of the Atlantic Monthly, in which these papers first appeared, we have so frequently expressed our admiration of the genius of their author, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, that it is almost a work of supererogation to speak of the handsome book in which Phillips, Sampson and Company have sent them to us. But we must confess that we have read them over again since we received it. The truth is, they are among the most interesting and valuable productions of American literary taste and genius. By the way, what has become of the Atlantic Monthly? It has ceased its visits to our table, we know not why. Will it not return?

Every Woman her own Lawyer:

A private guide in all matters of law, of essential interest to woman, and by the aid of which every female may, in whatever situation, understand her legal course and redress, and be her own legal adviser. By Geo. Bishop. Large 12mo, nearly four hundred pages, bound in half leather, price $1 00, sent free of postage. Published by Dick and Fitzgerald, New York; containing the laws of the different States relative to marriage and divorce, property in marriage, guardians and wards, rights in property of a wife, rights of widows, arrest of females for debt, discarded wives, suits by and against married women, dower, a wife's support, and a great deal more.

The New American Cyclopedia:

A popular Dictionary of General Knowledge. Edited by Geo. Ripley and Chas. H. Dana, and published by D. Appleton and Company, New York. Mr. Samuel Colman, the General Agent for Louisiana, Arkansas, and the city of Mobile, whose address is New Orleans, care of H. D. McGinnis, 56 Camp Street, has presented us with the first volume of this work, an octavo of seven hundred and fifty-two pages exclusive of the copious index, clearly printed in double columns, though with large clear type. In the whole work there are to be fifteen volumes of similar size. It is, of course, arranged in alphabetical order. The present volume reaches to Araguay, in the letter A, or nearly through that letter. The design is to furnish the great body of intelligent readers in his country with a popular Dictionary of general knowledge—a book of reference on all subjects—to which you may turn to settle any question—which settled information will settle—in science, literature, religion politics, philosophy, art, agriculture, mathematics, travels, chemistry, mechanics, inventions, trades, geography, biography, history, astronomy, medicine, law, manufactures, commerce, and whatever else is embraced, in what is called The Known.

The history of the world, in brief, not mere dates, is here. Besides its value to the more cultivated, as a work of general reference, it is of incalculable worth to those who have not had the advantages of a thorough education; and to those who have not the time for enlarged reading, it is a sort of general library in itself. It is to avoid any partiality in reference to conflicting views in religion and politics. The history of different religious denominations is to be written, as far as possible, by distinguished men from among themselves. It is stated that in the preparation of the present volume alone, nearly a hundred collaborators have assisted, including persons in almost every part of the United States, in Great Britain, and on the continent of Europe. Of course, we have had but little time to examine, adequately, a work of such size; but from the character of the publishers and editors, and from the approbation of the press throughout the United States—and also from the fact that an inferior work of the kind would entail loss and dishonor—we are inclined to believe that the Cyclopedia will be equal, as near as may be, to the published design. The sphere of what we term "general information" is becoming so large, the subjects so multitudinous, and the books treating of them so numerous, that an ordinary life-time will not suffice for the reading of a tithe of them. We hail the preparation of such works as the above, as the supply of an absolute and growing necessity.

Southern Presbyterian Review.

Conducted by an association of Ministers, in Columbia, South Carolina. The January number, 1859, is before us. It is large, having seven standard articles, each of considerable length, besides critical notices, and a periodical literature list. Most of its papers have a happy combination, both in subject and treatment, of intrinsic importance, learning, and popular interest. They are, The Astronomical Argument against Christianity—The Statesman—The Fullness of Time—Morality of the Legal Profession—The support of Superannuated Ministers, and the Indigent Families of deceased Ministers—The Prophetic Period of 1260 Years—The Early Presbyterian Immigration into South Carolina.

New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal.

Published every alternate month; Edited by B. Dowler, M. D. assisted by Drs. Warren Stone, James Jones, and S. E. Chaille. As New Orleans is only second to Paris in the facilities it affords for a Medical Education, we take it for granted that its Medical Journal is of a value correspondent with that of its Medical Schools, conducted, as it is, by some of the most eminent Physicians and Medical Professors in the country. The number before us is that for January 1859.

British Reviews and Blackwood.

We have received from Leonard Scott and Company, 79 Fulton street, New York, the London Quarterly Review for October 1858, the Westminster Review for October, the Edinburgh Review for October, the North British Review for November, and Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine for November. They constitute a sort of current cyclopedia of English Literature that cannot be dispensed with by any who wish to keep themselves well read in that department of human knowledge. Price of the whole $10; price of any one $3.

The Land and the Book.

The Harpers have sent us, through H. D. McGinnis, two elegantly bound volumes bearing the above title. The "Land" is the land of the Bible, and the "Book" is the Bible itself. To the description of the manners, customs, scenes and scenery of the first, and to the elucidation of the second thereby, the two volumes are devoted. They are by W. M. Thomson, D. D., twenty-five years a missionary of the American Board in Syria and Palestine. The maps and engravings, of which there are between two and three hundred, are mostly from the pencil of his son, W. H. Thomson. The subject is one, undeniably, of deep and universal interest—the Bible being of more interest to man than anything else in the world, and the land being, not only interesting in itself, not only interesting as being the theatre of the ever-wonderful Bible history, but a knowledge of it being really necessary to the understanding of the Bible itself. We are not well enough versed in this kind of literature to determine the value of this work as compared with those most generally known; but, from the style of the author, from the evidently pious aim, and from the fact that what he here gives us is the garnered wealth of twenty-five years of study, and actual experience and observation, we doubt if a better work of the kind can be found. The knowledge of the "Land" is given, partly, in many books of travel, but it is here given by a resident—by a student of it—not a mere looker on. And his long study and observation of the "Land," not only prepare him for its most accurate description, but that study and observation have been earnestly directed to the illustration and elucidation of the "Book."

Arabian Days' Entertainment.

We suppose that most of our readers have illumined many an otherwise gloomy hour, and helped to enrich the domain of fancy, by the perusal, earlier or later in life, of the "Arabian Nights' Entertainment." If they have not, we pity them. The volume before us is called the "Arabian Days' Entertainment." It is from that excellent Boston House, Phillips, Sampson & Co., and for sale in this city by Thos. L. White. The stories are of the same order as those of the "Nights," drawn from Eastern scenery, life, experience and fancy. They come to us through the German, translated from that language by Herbert Pelham Curtis. It is an elegantly bound volume of over four hundred pages, illustrated with engravings of Arabian horsemen, caliphs, spectre ships, Turkish princesses, Egyptian obelks, and any amount of other pictures of Eastern life. The stories are full of interest, harmless, and well adapted for mental relaxation, travel-reading, and for cultivating a love of reading in the young.

The Tenant House,

Or, Embers from Poverty's Hearth-stone, is the title of a book published by Robert M. De Witt, New York, and sent us by Thos. L. White, of this city. It is intended to illustrate the miseries of the poor in New York, and is founded upon facts drawn from official records of the condition of the thousands of "tenant houses" in that great city. It is a thrilling story, and at the same time, a sadly veritable history. It is recommended by the most eminent clergymen in the United States. It is sent us, also, by J. C. Morgan, of this city.

The Century.

This is the name of a new New York weekly, about the size of the New York Observer, and in the same form—a double sheet, eight imperial pages—published by Thos. McElrath, formerly of the Tribune. Its editorship is impersonal, writers being employed for all its departments. It is to be devoted to politics, commerce, finance, economy, literature, science, and art. The second number, which is before us, is in the best newspaper style—well printed, with large, clear type, ably edited, and filled with various and interesting reading. It evidently has a corps of able writers. Of course its politics cannot be depended upon.

Harper's Weekly, Bound.

Through H. D. McGinnis of this city, we have received the volume for 1858, handsomely bound. We are so pleased with it that we very much wish we had the volume for 1857, that being the first, and this the second volume. Harper's Weekly is the best secular newspaper in the country, taken all in all. Besides the excellencies usually pertaining to a first class metropolitan weekly filled with the best reading and all the news, and illustrated by beautiful pictures, it has the unusual excellence (in a secular journal) of not being in the slightest degree immoral or anti-religious in its tendencies. It is not a all a religious paper, but it recognizes Christianity as true—as the hope of man, and the religion of the country. It has engravings illustrative of every event or scene of importance that occurs in the known world, from the crossing on the Mississippi river, to the war in India and the customs in China and Japan. Its circulation is about seventy-five thousand.

The Printer.

This is a monthly, devoted to the "art preservative of all arts." Every printer in the country should have it, and it is interesting even to those who are not printers. It is, of course, beautifully printed. It is published by Henry & Huntington, No. 1 Spruce street, New York, at $1 00 a year.

PUBLISHING BOARD FOR THE BLIND.

We have been visited by Mr. D. Sherrod, himself blind, who is general Agent for the establishment of a publishing house for the blind, in Louisville Kentucky, which is intended to have auxiliary boards in other states. The central board has already been organized; and also Nashville, Tennessee, and Jackson Mississippi. A similar one is desired in Louisiana.

The Legislature of the state of Mississippi, at its last session, appropriated $2000 to this noble object; and also passed a general law, giving $10 yearly in behalf of the census for each blind white person in that State. Individual subscriptions already amount to nearly $20,0 for this good work. Mr. Sherrod will visit Baton Rouge during the session of the Legislature, to obtain its help in the same way. He comes with the highest recommendations, both from individuals and the press.

Since, by the aid of raised letters, the blind can satisfactorily enjoy the inestimable blessing of reading, they should be furnished with the literature they need, by all means; deprived as they are of the other inalienable blessings dependent upon sight.

VICKSBURG BOOK AND TRACT DEPOSITORY.

Since April last, I have scarcely seen or had any particular knowledge of the business of the Book and Tract Depository at Vicksburg, until the last few days. And I am much gratified to find that they appear to be doing much better without me, than when I was in the establishment.

They have a good book store in the best part of town, and present quite a business like appearance. The Depository is now the leading book establishment in Vicksburg.

The good countenance and patronage of the friends of religious and moral reading, and the confidence and reasonable support of the Church and of good people, will soon place the Vicksburg Depository in a position of great usefulness to the community and the Church. Its prospects now are decidedly good and its friends may take courage. Hereafter it will receive books from the Publishing-house at cost, in pursuance of the action of the General Conference, and the corresponding action of the last Mississippi Conference.

Vicksburg, Jan. 6th, 1858.

THE JANSENISTS AND THE POPE.

The town of Utrecht has been indulged in the last novelty of the season in the shape of a regular "Bull of Excommunication" launched from Tiber's banks against Monsigneur Henry Loos, the newly consecrated Bishop of the small Jansenist Church in the Flemish Netherlands. This hierarchy has always strictly carried out the canonical ordinances for "apostolical succession," and regulate untiles his necession to the bench by a quiet letter or circular to the Western Patriarch, invariably getting an epistle of excommunication by return of post. The interchange of civilities has gone on for nearly two hundred years. This news is in the Tyd, the Flemish Times.

Dr. Bodenhamer has his card in this paper. We are informed that he is very skilfull in his specialty.

John C. Bull, Commission Merchant, St. Louis, is Agent for Blane's power-loom bagging and bale rope. See his card.

B. D. & A. W. Roberts have their law card in this paper, to which we call attention.

If you want Groceries go to Arthur & Co., corner Canal and New Levee streets.

If you want a Boarding House go to Brooks, Orleans street, next to Odd Fellows' Hall.

If you want Hardware and Machinery go to Lanneau's, 73 Camp street.

PERSONAL.

Bishop Early.

We have just returned home, says the Richmond Advocate, from a visit to the hospitable mansion of this venerable Bishop in Lynchburg. We spent several pleasant hours in his company. He is recovering from a severe attack of bilious fever, caused by the malaria of the vast Cisterra swampa through which he passed in his recent Episcopal tour. Though trembling and feeble under the attack, he struggled through his work, finished it all, and reached home in safety, where in congenial air, under the blessing of God, he will soon be restored to his usual physical strength. His intellectual vigor continues unabated, and it is pleasant to hear the clear ring of his voice in animated conversation.

Hon. and Rev. Wm. F. Samford.

We were somewhat surprised, a few days since, to receive the Auburn (Alabama,) Gazette, without the name (that having been substituted by the Signal) and with the name of our friend and brother, Mr. Samford, as political editor. Of him as a statesman it is not our province to speak. His principles are well known. His character as a patriot, writer, and public speaker, in the pulpit and elsewhere, is well established, and without reproach. A brave and honest man, blessed with genius and culture, we wish the blessing of God upon all his rightly-directed labors for the good of his country and his fellow-men. The Signal will not be uncertain in his hands.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Rev. B. T. Crouch Jr.

We met this son of the old Kentucky veteran, now gone to his reward, at the Alabama Conference. He is stationed for this year at Aberdeen, the home of Bishop Paine. We were more interested in meeting him from the fact that he had published views in reference to our Pacific interests, for which we have always felt much concern, diametrically opposite to our own. We did not differ so widely, however, when face to face. Success in California will settle the question. Having lived and labored in that country, Mr. Crouch was able to give us much interesting information in regard to it.

Rev. J. Caughey.

This great revivalist has just closed a year's labors in Sheffield, England. At a farewell meeting held on his leaving the town, it was stated in a forewell address to Mr. Caughey, that no less than 5161 had been enabled to rejoice in the pardoning love of God, 2392 in His sanctifying grace,—and all this had been experienced in twelve months! Mr. Caughey, we learn, will soon return to this country and commence again his revival labors among us. He is certainly one of the most remarkable men of this age.

Rev. T. C. Granberry.

The faculty of the University of Virginia have elected Rev. John C. Granberry, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, chaplain for two years from October, 1858, when the term of the present chaplain, Rev. Dabney Carr Harrison will expire. Mr. Granberry is at present stationed in the city of Washington.

RELIGIOUS AND ECCLESIASTICAL.

A High Compliment.

The New York Observer is interdicted at Rome as an "incendiary" sheet. A subscriber who passed some months in Rome, was never allowed to receive a copy of the Observer while there. They are all stopped at the frontier Post-office, where he was able to secure them on his return.

Protestant Schools in Paris.

There are several Romnn Catholic children in these schools whose Bibles are taken homo and read with interest and impunity by their parents.

Dr. Krummacher:

The Court preacher of Prussin spoke eloquently in defence of Americnn revivnls, at the last meeting of the Conference of Ministers nt Berlin. He expressed nn earnest wish thst Germnny might speedily see simlinr displays of divine grnce.

The Widow of Bishop Roberts.

The Western Advocate snys: Elizabeth Roberts, the relict of the late Bishop Roberts, died on the 17th, in the 83d year of her age. No other particulars have yet been given.

Spanish Protestant Church.

An interesting event has taken place at Gibroltnr in the ordinntion of a pastor, the first, over a Spanish Protestant congregation, which has grown up on the rock, in part at least as a consequence of the Wesleyan Spanish schools so long maintained there. The new pastor, Senor Rect, himself a Protestant convert, was ordained with Presbyterian forms, under the advice and support of the Free Church minister stationed nt Gibraltnr.

Tasmania Missionary.

A few years ago the primitive Methodists of Great Ilritain raised funds to send n missionary to the Australian Colonies. As the results of his efforts they have now thirteen stations; and they report with satisfaction, that a few emigrants who went to Tusmania have saved from their earnings sixty pounds and send it to provide the outfit of a minister, with the promise of future support.

Free Church of England.

A circular dated "Edinburg, November 2d," puts us in possession of information at which our readers will be somewhnt surprised: "The extraordinary and conflicting opinions and actions of the bench of Bishops, and the absurd and opposite doctrines and rites held and taught most extensively by the clergy of the establishment, make the present time peculinrly opportune for the formation of a Free Church of Englnnd. Clergymen agreeing with the thirty-nine articles and liturgy, willing to join in such a movement, are invited to a Conference proposed to be held in Londen next spring. To secure a well-organized plnn of operation, a provisional committee should soon be formed; communications nre requested from all who are disposed to aid in the project. Address, Clericus, care of Mr. Thomas, 26 Brydges-street, Covent-garden, London. The most entire confidence may be relied on.

A Jewish Synagogue of Christ.

It is stated that there nre twenty-eight Jewish converts to the Christian religion in N. York, who meet every Sabbath. A periodical is published in New York, entitled, "The Israelite Indeed," which takes the ground that Jesus of Nazareth is the "true Messiah." A converted Jew lately stated in a Boston prayer-meeting, that he was led to investigate the Christinn Scriptures by hearing Christians pray for the descendants of Abrshem. He stated that 600 converted jews nre now preaching Christ.

Union Love Feasts.

We learn from the Pittsburgh Advocate that the fifth gathering of the members of the Methodist charges in the two cities and the immediate neighborhood, at South Common M. E. Church, took place on Thursday evening, the 16th ultimo, and was largely attended, and equal in interest to nny former meeting of the series. On the succeeding Thursday evening, another of these gatherings was held in the Methodist Protestant Church, Fifth-street, at which the members of the different Churches belonging to the great Methodist family cordially united. We like this reunion of the great Methodist family, and commend the course persued by our brethren in Pittsburgh to Methodists everywhere.

Zion's Herald snys: "We understand that the five Methodist Churches of New Hedford have determined, by a unanimous vote of their ministers and official members, to hold union love-feasts every month, to which all the members and probntioners will be admitted by tickets. The first was held in the Elm-street Church."

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

NEW CARDINALS.—The late Londan papers contnin the following from Rome: At the consistory to be holden on the 20th, it is probable that two new Cardinals will be made—one for Rome and another for America. Should this news be true, America will possess a cardinal for the first time. The Archbishop of Baltimore is spoken of as likely to be the first wearer of a red hat in the United States.

THE INQUISITION.—The Spanish Inquisition, in the hands of the Jesuits, according to Motley, the historian, burned alive 10,220 persons for heresy, punished with infamy and confiscation of property 97,321, or consigned them to perpetual imprisonment—so that the whole number of families destroyed by the Dominican, Torquemada, amounted to 114,401.—The late forcible abduction of Mortara's six years old child, great as is the offence, is overshadowed even by the recollection of the horrors of the Inquisition, and the infamy of the wholesale assassination of St. Bartholomew's day.

THE MEXICAN GOVERNMENT.—The Delta says: The Picayune is perplexed as to the condition of affairs in Mexico, doubting whether the triumph of Robles will produce a restoration of the Puros or Liberal party, inasmuch as Miramon has received the vote for President. We suspect that the result will show that Robles is the agent and representative of constitutionalism, and that that party will have the victory. Miramon is not exactly in a condition to accept the Presidency, and it he does, he will be in the hands of the Constitutionalists.

LONDON TIMES.—The Times sketches the President's views in regard to Mexico and Central America, and concludes as follows: "It is evident that the utter decrepitude of the Spanish race both north and south of the Isthmus is about to lead to the virtual supremacy of the Anglo-Americans in the whole of the tropical regions."

"There is no need of affecting moderation and philanthropy on their part which few will credit. The fact is plain enough that the Mexico and Central America and the great Spanish Island will soon be under their sway, direct or indirect. For our own part, we see little to

DOMESTIC.

SENATOR DOUGLAS has published a letter emphatically denying Senator Slidell's published charge, that he (Douglas) through his private Secretary, has authorized and countenanced anonymous attacks on Senator Slidell.

HON. J. GLANCY JONES, U. S. Minister to Austria, and Hon. Wm. C. Preston, U. S. Minister to Spain, with their Secretaries, are passengers on bonrd the steamer Fulton, which sailed from New York on the 8th instant for Southampton and Hnvre.

TOWNSEND HARRIS, Esq., now Consul General for Japan, has been nominated to the Senate, by the President, to be Minister Resident near the Government of the Japanese Empire.

PORTLAND, MAINE, January 11.—The Legislature of this State have to-day re-elected William Fessenden to the United States Senate.

BOSTON, January 12.—Both Brnnches of the Legislature have re-elected the Hon. Henry Wilson, U. S. Senntor for six years from the 4th of March next, when his present term expires.

PHILADELPHIA, January, 13.—The Superintendent of the Mint states that a careful nssay of specimens of the Pike's Peak gold dust shows it to be worth nearly twenty dollars an ounce.

WASHINGTON, January, 13.—General Jerez has been recognized by our Government as the representative of Nicaragua.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10.—House.—Mr. Barksdale, of Mississippi, offered the following preamble and resolution, which were adopted: Whereas, It has been announced to foreign journals that the courts of France and England have given notice that the session of Cuba to the United States will not be tolerated, even with the consent of Spain; therefore, Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to this House the correspondence between the Government of France and England with our own, relative to the cession of Cuba to the United States.

Mr. Harris, of Indiana, asked but failed to obtain leave to offer a joint resolution requesting to interfere in the Mortara case.

The Committee then proceeded to the consideration of the President's Annual Message.

Mr. Nichols, of Ohio, wished to place on the record his protest against the passage of the bill for pensioning the soldiers of the war of 1812. Should it become a law it would entail a curse on the country. It was for the benefit of mere dependents on the gratuity of the Government, at the expense of the industrial classes. The revolutionary pension system furnished no precedent for that now proposed. A provision already exists for the public service. The idea of pensioning men for patriotism was not in accordance with our institutions.

Mr. Anderson, of Missouri, said that the result of our policy had been to submit to outrages and insults until not only great, but the smallest nations trample on our flag and infringe on our public and private rights. It is high time for us to assert our proper position and strongly maintain it. The treatment received from Spain has been of the most aggravated character. How can our Government expect to be respected, unless it extends protection to our citizens? He did not know what instructions our minister at Madrid had received, but he knew that it would be the desire of the American people that demand be made for all wrongs. If Spain refuses this, our Minister should demand his passports and return home, and the Government should send a squadron and take possession of Cuba as an indemnity for the past and security for the future. Our self-respect demands such a course. He flattered himself that this would be the policy of the Executive. It was known that France and England opposed the extension of our territory. We want more action and less debate. There was an imperious and unalterable necessity for our acquisition of Cuba. Why longer delay? Let us offer Spain a fair, nay, an exorbitant price, for the island. If she refuses, then we will be justified in the eyes of all nations for taking forcible possession of it.

Mr. Anderson then alluded to affairs in Central America, advocating the recommendation in the President's Message, and was in favor of arming the Executive with ample power to obtain redress for grievances. There being a failure to obtain indemnity from Mexico, we should take possession of her territory, all along our southern border, we should annul the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and irrespective of foreign nations, freely assert and maintain the Monroe doctrine.

SENATE.—Mr. Douglas took his seat, and there was a slight attempt at applause in the gallery.

The French Spoliation bill was taken up, and Mr. Davis resumed his speech against it.

Mr. Crittenden replied. The arguments of both were historical and legal, and of great length.

Finally, the bill passed by a vote of 26 to 20.

After a protracted discussion, it was resolved to admit to the floor of the Senate only Representatives and Clerk of the House, Foreign Ministers, Heads of Departments, Supreme Judges, Ex-Presidents, Ex-Vice Presidents and Ex-Senators.

The Appropriation Bill for the Military Academy was passed, and the Senate adjourned.

WASHINGTON, January 11.—The Mexican and Central American Colonization Association have added Arizona to their pieces of settlement.....It is understood, that the enterprise is supported by prominent Southern and New York men.....The Association has already purchased some grants of land and are negotiating for others.....Gen. Henningsen, the chief engineer of the enterprise, will probably take out a large body of men during the ensuing spring and summer.....The Mexican and Central American Colonization Association have reorganized under the title of the Arizona, Mexican and Central American Association.....It is reported that they have purchased valuable grants in Arizona, and intend to colonize them in the spring.....In the House yesterday, the resolution of last session, which approves the course pursued by Commodore Paulding in regard to General Walker, and speaks in laudatory terms of his conduct, was laid upon the table.

JANUARY, 11.—Senator Slidell yesterday introduced a bill in the Senate, making an appropriation of $30,000,000 to facilitate the acquisition of Cuba by negotiation and purchase.

Mr. Johnson of Tennessee, gave notice that he would call up the Homestead bill at the earliest day.

Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate the correspondence relative to the outrages committed on our citizens on the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. Mason, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the President to use the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases.

The Pacific Railroad bill was also up for considerallan.

JANUARY, 11.—House.—The resolution disapproving the action of Commodore Paulding, in reference to the Walker expedition, was called up from last session and discussed.

A substitute was offered for the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, tendering thanks to Com. Paulding for his interference with General Walker.

The Substitute expressing disapproval of his conduct, was adopted by a vote of 99 yens against 85 nays. The report of the Committee was then laid on the table.

WASHINGTON, January 12.—The bill reported yesterday by Mr. Mason, authorizing the President in certain cases to use the land and naval forces against Mexico and Central America, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.....The Washington Union of this morning with an air of authority denies the truth of the dispatches sent to all parts of the Union, stating that the Treasury was depleted, and that the Treasurer had refused to cash a draft for one hundred dollars.....The authority upon which said dispatches were based is however, equally good with that of the Union. It has further been ascertained that this is not an isolated case. Treasury drafts have been refused for ten days past, on the ground that the Treasury had nothing to draw against. The Ten Million Loan, will shortly recuperate the Treasury.

JANUARY, 12.—House.—In the House, Mr. Stephens asked to report forthwith a bill for the admission of Oregon as a State. Objections being made, the bill was not presented.

The Consideration of the motion to refer the naval appropriation bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, was resumed.

JANUARY, 13.—Senate—In the Senate yesterday General Houston replied to Iverson's taunts in regard to Houston's retiring to private life, and the statement made by Iverson that Texas permitted him to do so because of his (Houston's) devotion to the Union.

Gen. Houston said, in replying, that if his devotion to the Union caused his political immolation, it would be the proudest record of his life. He further said he would not accept even the nomination for the Presidency of the United States, even if all the political parties together tendered it to him.

Mr. Seward introduced a bill to amend an act on the subject of the slave trade. The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Simmons introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare a plan for specific duties for the purpose of increasing the revenue. The bill was laid over.

JANUARY, 13.—House.—The Senate bill, repealing the law of 1150, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels, passed the House by a vote of 88 against 78.

The Committee on Commerce reported a bill for the construction of two ocean revenue cutters, one to be stationed at Philadelphia and the other at New Orleans.

In Committee of the Whole, the bill to codify the revenue laws, etc., was up for consideration.

Underwood asked leave to introduce a bill for the construction of a railway from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific.

Stevens objected to its introduction, because, it was not in regular order.

The Naval Appropriation bill was sent to the Committee of the Whole.

A bill was passed to pay salaries to the Ministers of the Argentine Republic, Costa Rica and Honduras.

Jan. 14.—The House Territorial Committee has agreed to report a bill to create the Territory of Arizona, establishing the parallel of 33. 40. as the northern boundary, and extending the Territory from Texas to California.

The House Committee on Foreign Affairs have agreed to report a bill placing thirty millions of dollars at the disposal of the President for the purpose of prosecuting negociations for the acquisition of Cuba.

The difficulty between English, of Indiana, and Montgomery, of Pennsylvania, has been amicably settled by their mutual friends. English apologises, and thus ends the affair.

Seward's bill to prevent slave trading, which was offered in the Senate yesterday, provides for the appropriation of one million dollars, and authorizes the government to employ vessels of war to cruise wherever an attempt to carry on the slave trade is suspected.

The bill also provides that any State may make laws prohibiting the African slave trade within its own limits.

It also provides that no ship shall sail from any port within the jurisdictioo of the United States for the African coast without a clearance from the United States District Attorney.

It also makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to designate the only African ports where American Consuls shall reside, and makes it unlawful to carry on business at any other than the ports designated by him.

It repeals all acts that are incompatible with it.

Iverson made a generous apology to the Senate and Gen. Houston for any supposed personal reflections upon the latter in his speech of Wednesday.

The Pacific railway bill occupied the remainder of the session of the Senate until it went into executive session.

Bigler offered an amendment to the Pacific Railway bill, restricting the route within the limits of the thirty-seventh and forty-third parallels.

The amendment was lost by a vote of 19 yeas to 25 nays.

Wilson offered a substitute for Bigler's amendment to the Pacific Railway bill, providing for the appointment of five engineers to locate the road. The substitute was lost by a vote of 31 nays to 23 yeas.

Jan. 15.—The Postmaster General, in response to a resolution of Congress, asking his views on the subject, says that if Congress desires the Postoffice Department to be self-sustaining, it must adopt measures to restore the law of 1845, and make the rate of postage for any distance under 3000 miles, five cents; and for any distance over 3000 miles, to any part of the United States ten cents per half ounce, and also abolish the franking privilege.

The amount in the United States Treasury, subject to draft, is $3,115,000. The receipts into the Treasury during the week were $726,000. Increase in receipts over last week, $82,000. The amount of drafts issued is $58,000. Amount of drafts paid, $644,000. The net balance in the Treasury is $1,017,000.

The House Committee on Foreign Affairs have agreed to report a bill similar to the one reported by Mr. Slidell, giving the President $30,000,000 for the purpose of prosecuting the negotiations with Spain for the purchase of Cuba.

JAN. 17.—Senate.—A joint resolution appointing Commodore Stewart the senior flag officer of the navy, passed the Senate.

In the Senate and House, the death of Mr. Harris, of Illinois, was announced, and after the delivery of appropriate eulogies, the usual resolutions of respect were adopted, and both Houses adjourned.

Sherrard Clemens, of Virginia, who was wounded in a duel with Mr. Wise last summer, has arrived in Washington, but is unable to walk or leave his room. He is so much reduced that it is thought probable he will not be able to resume his seat in Congress during the present session. He came to Washington to recruit his failing health.

The Democratic members of the Senate held a caucus on Saturday, upon the subject of the acquisition of the Island of Cuba.

Messrs. Mason and Shields favored the acquisition, but were of opinion that immediate action in the matter was impolitic.

Mr. Douglas remarked that the present appearances were gloomy as to the success of the proposed negotiations, but notwithstanding, he would support Mr. Slidell's bill. Mr. Douglas expressed his confidence that the President would not act without sufficient data, but thought it best to wait until another Black Warrior case occurred, then seize the island and afterwards negotiate.

Mr. Jeff. Davis disagreed with Mr. Douglas on this point only, but favored an increase of the fund proposed by Mr. Slidell's bill. Mr. Slidell advocated his own bill.

Messrs. Toombs, Gwin, Bigler and Clay favored increasing the fund as proposed by Mr. Davis, and leaving the matter to the discretion of the President.

Mr. Iverson thought Spain could be wearied (or worried?) with the question, by repealing the laws restraining our citizens from emigrating to foreign countries.

The caucus determined in favor of supporting the President's views, but did not indicate the precise mode of carrying them out.

It is generally believed that the Senate will pass Mr. Slidell's bill.

LOCAL.

THE TOURO ALMS-HOUSE.—The late Judah Touro left to the city of New Orleans, the sum of eighty thousand dollars for building an alms house—a place of refuge and shelter for the destitute of this city.

The execution of the plan and the will of the testator was confided to his old friend and executor, R. B. Shepherd. Mr. Shepherd regarding the sum as not fully adequate to the full realisation of the scheme contemplated, and appreciating the limited resources of the city, to increase the amount, set himself to work in augment the bequest, by judicious investments.

In this way, in a few years, the sum of eighty thousand dollars has been swelled to the handsome amount of one hundred and fifteen thousand, which Mr. Shepherd now holds, subject to the use for which the bequest was originally devised. Mr. Shepherd has also added to the resources of the fund, by donating a fine square in the Third District, five hundred and eighty feet deep by three hundred and fifty front—on the Levee, between Piety and Desire streets—as the site for the proposed erection. He will also give $50,000 to complete the edifice in a proper manner. Such liberality deserves the warm gratitude of our people, and demonstrates no less the fidelity of this gentleman to the memory and wishes of his old friend, than his generous munificence and grateful appreciation of the claims of the city, to which he has accumulated his princely fortune.

The Touro Almshouse will be shortly commenced and vigorously prosecuted. The committee charged with the matter have received no less than thirteen plans for the building. Among them is one which exhibits extraordinary evidences of talent, judgment and architectural art, in the young author—a native of New Orleans—only twenty-two years old. It is the plan of Wm. A. Freret, the son of our fellow citizen, once Mayor of this city, William Freret, Esq.

This plan embraces an elegant building of three hundred feet front, in a very graceful Gothic style, which we are not sufficiently versed in the technology of architecture to describe, but it appears to embody all that is requisite in such an edifice. From the main building there is a covered communication to the kitchens and out buildings, which are detached. The front is hand-somely laid off in parterres, with fountains, lodges, etc., and the whole surrounded by a handsome fence. We think it not improbable that this plan may be preferred.

The correct plan for the building will be $121,000. The further maintenance and support of the institution will devolve upon the city; and though it may add apparently to the burdens of our Treasury, the result will be in the end afford relief to our oppressed and tax ridden condition, by providing for a class of people who in various ways, directly and indirectly, are the cause of great expense and trouble to our corporation and citizens. [Delta.

HEBREW RITES.—The rite of circumcision was yesterday performed at the house of worship of the Hebrew Association in the University buildings, corner of Baronne and Common streets, by Doctors C. Goldenberg, Adler and Mayer, in the presence of a large number of their brotherhood. The parties upon whom the rite was administered were, three infants, aged respectively seven, five and three years. It is seldom that cases of this kind are heard of, from the fact that the rite is usually administered during infancy; but in this case the mother of the children was a Christian, and would never consent to it during her lifetime. The mother dying recently in St. Louis, the father brought the children to this city, and there being nothing in the way, proceeded to carry out his original intention. [Delta.

A GOOD CITIZEN GONE.—We are pained to announce the death of Capt. James Stockton, an old and sterling citizen, known to nearly everybody. He was a native of Baltimore, and a resident of this city for the last twenty-nine years. His career was one of honor and probity, securing him the high and lasting esteem of the hosts of people who made his acquaintance and acquired his friendship. [Crescent.

CITY MORTALITY.—There were 107 deaths in the City of New Orleans for the week ending Sunday morning, 16th inst., of which 29 were of consumption.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, January 26, 1859.

THE following table exhibits the ruling prices in our Cotton market this evening.

New Orleans Classification:

Middling	11⅛@12⅛	Good Fine	—@—

The following summary, copied from the New Orleans Price Current, of 15th inst., furnishes the annexed statement of the week's business. The operations of the week have been to a good amount, notwithstanding unfavorable weather, etc., in our leading staples—Cotton, Molasses and Sugar—and prices have been generally maintained. In the Tobacco market, there is no movement of consequence, and operations in the various articles of Western Produce have been but to a limited extent.....The Niagara's advices report a better demand in the Liverpool Cotton market, with firmer prices, since quoting 1-16d. advance upon quotations by previous steamer.....The river is now about 3 feet six inches below high water mark .....The sales of Cotton for the three first days of the week amounted to 20,000 bales; the sales of the latter three days reaching 44,000 bales, 20,500 being taken on Friday; total sales of the week 73,000 bales, and total receipts 54,411 bales.

SUGAR—The sales of the week amount to about 12,000 hhds.; we quote for inferior and refining, 3½@4¼; common to good common, 4¾@5½; fair to fully fair, 5¼@6; prime to choice, 6½@7¼; centrifugal and clarified, 7@8¾; Refined, 9@—@— ₱ lb.

MOLASSES—The sales of the week are about 15,500 hhds; the quotations being for inferior and fermenting, 20@28; prime to choice, 28½@30; bf bbls. 32@33c ₱ gallon.

TOBACCO—Is quoted for Lugs, planters, 5@5½; Leaf, inferior to common, 6@6½; fair, 7@7½; fine, 8@8½; choice heavy and light, 9@10c ₱ lb.

FLOUR—The sales of the week have reached about 9,000 bbls. at $4 75@5 for superfine Indiana and St Louis; $5 25 for fancy, etc.; $5 50@6 00 for extra; and $6 00@7 00 for choice extra.

BRAN—The supply of Corn falls considerably short of the demand—prices ranging from $1 20@$1 25 ₱ bushel for yellow and white. Oats sell at 70@80 and 58c ₱ bushel, for good to prime old St Louis and black Canada.

PORK—The transactions in Mess have been at $16@18 25, and rumps at $13 ₱ bbl.

BEEF—The market is very dull at $11 for Mess, and $8 ₱ bbl for Prime.

BACON—Sales at for shoulders 7@7½; ribbed sides 9@9¾; clear sides 9¾@10c, and hams from 9¾@14c ₱ lb according to quality.

LARD—we quote at 10@10¾ for inferior to good No. 1; 11¼@11½ for prime.

BUTTER—Western, 9@13; Iodi, 20@22c ₱ lb.

COFFEE—We quote 10½@10¾c for fair to good fair, 11@11¼ for prime.

LIVE STOCK—The supply is ample, and the market easy. We quote: Beef—Western, 7@9½; Texas, $13@36, according to quality; calves and yearlings, $5@11; Hogs 6½@7c ₱ lb; Sheep $3@6; Cows $30 @95 ₱ head.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

CERTIFICATES OF THE UNIVERSAL SUCCESS OF THESE MACHINES in this State have been published, and of

OVER 500 SOLD IN THIS REGION.

The undersigned is not aware that any is out of repair.

SINGER'S FAMILY AND PLANTATION MACHINE combined, cannot be excelled for fine work, and sews with equal facility a leather trace, and is WARRANTED THREE YEARS, even in the charge of negroes.

SEWING MACHINE PREMIUMS.

The fact that the American Institute, and many leading State Fairs have at different times awarded the FIRST PREMIUM to the Avery Sewing Machine, and to other worthless Sewing Machines, when in competition with all the best Sewing Machines, proves that the decision of a Committee of Examiners is no evidence of the superiority of a Sewing Machine. For this reason, I M. Singer & Co. have not recently contended for the Premium at a Fair, nor have they authorized their agents to do so, but in a very few instances the agents have exhibited the Machines and have been successful.

The First Premium of the State of New York

WAS

AWARDED TO SINGER'S SEWING MACHINE,

At the State Fair in Syracuse,

IN OCTOBER, 1858.

There has not been a State Fair in Albany for five years. The FIRST PREMIUM was also awarded to Singer's Machine at the late Fair at Memphis, Tennessee.

The FIRST PREMIUMS awarded to Singer's Machine at the American Institute, at the Exposition Universal in Paris, and the leading Mechanical Associations in the United States, are on exhibition at 33 Camp street.

Mention is not made of these Premiums as evidence of the superiority of the Singer Machine, but to prevent the public from being deceived by the false statements of the agents of other machines.

The ONLY RELIABLE EVIDENCE OF THE SUCCESS of Sewing Machines is the CERTIFICATES OF THOSE WHO USE THEM.

CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

Our Little Readers will find here a few Verses of poetry about Christ Savior, when he was a little child. It is like a pleasant and beautiful thought, that Jesus was once a little child like ourselves.

LORD OF JESUS.

In the green fields of Palestine,
By its mountains and its rills,
Among the sacred Jordan's stream,
And o'er the vine-clad hills,
Once lived and roamed the fairest child
That ever blessed the earth:
The angels, the holiest,
That e'er had human birth.
How beautiful his childhood was,
Harmless and undefiled;
O, dear to his young mother's heart
Was this pure sinless child.
Kindly in all his deeds and words,
And gentle as the dove;
Obedient, affectionate—
He very soul was love.
O, is it not a blessed thought,
Children of human birth,
That once the Savior was a child,
And lived upon the earth?

A FABLE.

A young man once picked up a sovereign lying in the road. Ever afterwards as he walked along, he kept his eye constantly fixed on the ground, in hopes of finding another. And in the course of a long life he did pick up at different times a good amount of gold and silver. But all those days as he was looking for them he saw not that heaven was bright above him, and nature beautiful around. He never once allowed his eyes to look up from the mud and filth in which he sought the treasure; and when he died, a rich old man, he only knew this fair earth of ours as a dirty road to pick up money as you walk along.

LORD LYONS.

Admiral of the British fleet which bombarded Constantinople, recently. It is well known that the successful landing in the Crimea was mainly to be attributed to his exertions; and that he was foremost in the attack on the seaward defences of Sebastopol. But it deserves to be recalled here, what is less dwelt upon—that when a calumnious anecdote was set afloat about his having used bad words during the bombardment, the old sailor, as soon as the story reached his ears, wrote home indignantly enough that he was in the habit of using language equally abhorrent to good sense and Christianity.

DILEMMA.

Said the distinguished Chatham, to his son: "I would have you get up upon the curtain of your bed, and the tester, and there hang yourself. If you do not like early you will have the less trouble in waking. If you do not set about it presently, if you suffer yourself or any one else to break in upon them, your days will slip through your hands unprofitable and frivolous, and really I shall hang myself by yourself."

IT IS THAT ALSO THINK.

A beautiful reply is recorded of a Dalecarlian peasant, who, when displaying to him the grandeur of his country, Persia, Russia and Sweden, were pointed out in succession, on every hand as the property of the rich proprietor, summed up finally by saying, "In short, all that you can see, in every direction, belongs to me." The poor man looked thoughtful for a moment, then pointing to heaven, solemnly replied, "And is that mine also?"

TOO LATE.

It is related that Lord Byron was at one time conversing with a friend on his daughter with a distinguished lady of rank, whose influence over him checked his continuing the reading indecorous of one of his worst poems, when she said that if he so loved his child, he should never write a line that would bring a blush of shame to her cheek or a sorrowing tear to her eye. He replied that [illegible] writing to beguile hours of wretchedness, and he knew his fault on her affection, but added, "I will write no more of it. Would that I had not written a line!"

Returning to conversation with the same lady, to his unhappy temperament, he said, "Depend upon it, [illegible] are children while they are children. [illegible] all the good resolutions in the world can [illegible] to conquer habits of ill-humor or rage, [illegible] to many regret having given way to them."

THE VALUE OF A SCRAP OF PAPER.

"I don't know what that paper," said a boy to his sister; "it [illegible] think of poor Judge Edwards in India."

"What of him?" asked his sister. "Judge Edwards was the gentleman, who for many days lived only by hair-breadth escapes, dressing the rebels at one place and another, until he made his way to Calcutta. He wished one time to send a note to his wife, who was in some place of safety. A native took pity on him, and promised at the risk of his life to carry it.

"I wished to write two," said Mr. Edwards, "but had only small scrap of paper, half the fly-leaf of Bridges on the one hundred and seventeenth Psalm. Pen or ink I had none, and only the stump of a lead pencil, of which the stem of the lead was left. I began to write, when the lead fell out. I was in despair. But after a good deal of scrabbling in the dust of a mud-floor, I found it, put it back, and wrote two notes about an inch square, which was all the man could hide about his person, for the rebels had already killed several men for having [illegible] found on them. When the notes were ready, I got a little milk and steeped them in it, to make the writing indelible, and then put them out to dry on a wall in the sun. In an instant a crow pounced on one [illegible] it off; it was that for my wife. I of course [illegible] for ever, and felt almost broken-hearted. [illegible] I had no more paper, and no hope or means of getting more. Sleek, a faithful native, had, unknown to me, watched the crow, followed it, and after a long chase of several miles, saw the bird drop it, and picking it up, brought it to me unhurt."

"I wonder if she ever received the letter," said the boy's sister, who always liked to know how things came to an end.

"Yes," answered the boy, "and the man fetched [illegible]. When the messenger saw Mrs. Edwards dressed in black, for I suppose she thought [illegible] murdered by the horrid Sepoys; but when she got the letter she went away and put on a [illegible]

The little [illegible] was fully robed for the grave, was laid in its [illegible] previous to its burial. The weeping friends [illegible] had placed a small bouquet of flowers, among [illegible] flowers, consisted of the "Rose of Sharon." The lid was then placed upon the coffin, and the funeral services performed. When after the lapse of not more than three hours, the coffin was opened again, and friends gathered round to look upon it for the last time, that bud had become a full blown rose, while grasped in the hand of death. It seemed as though a voice came up from [illegible] lips, saying, "Weep not for me; such buds from the parent stem I am blooming in the [illegible] of God. THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

Love of Lamartine's Mother.

It was the fate of the father of Lamartine, the living French poet and orator, to be mixed up with the first French revolution. During that stormy period he, with a great number of his compatriots, were immured in prison at Macon. He was not long there before his wife and her child took lodgings opposite the window of the cell which enclosed the republican. She soon drew his attention to herself and his child, which, though he could not speak to her, for fear of the sentinel, reconciled him in some measure to his captivity, and lessened the burden of his woes. "My mother," says Lamartine, "carried me every day in her arms to a garret window, showed me to my father, gave me nourishment before him, made me stretch out my little hands towards the bars of his prison, then pressing my forehead to her breast, she almost devoured me with kisses in the sight of the prisoner, and seemed thus to waft him mentally all the caresses which she lavished on me."

At last she hit on the happy expedient of conveying him letters in the following manner: She procured a bow and some arrows, and tying a letter to a thread, she shot the arrow to which was attached the other end of the thread, into the window of the prisoner's cell. In this way she sent him pens, ink and paper. He then, by the same ingenious expedient, sent love letters to her. Thus the separated husband and wife were enabled to correspond, to cheer each other's hopes, and sustain each other in their misfortunes. This was all done at night time, when the scrutinizing eyes of the sentinels remained in happy ignorance of the medium of communication. Success having inspired courage, the lady with the assistance of the arrow and thread, afterwards conveyed a file to the captive, with which he silently filed through one of the bars of his prison, and then restored it to its place. On the next evening when there was no moonlight, a stout cord was firmly fastened, the one end to a beam in the garret of the lady, and the other end to the bars of the cell; then, summoning up all his courage, the prisoner glided along the rope, above the heads of the sentinels; he crossed the street, and found himself in the arms of his wife, and beside the cradle of his child. Such an adventure required the hero's courage and philosopher's caution, and none but those who were personally interested in it, can ever imagine the feelings that must have agitated their hearts! From time to time, when the night was dark, the knotted cord would glide from window to window, and the prisoner would pass from knot to knot, and enjoy delightful hours of converse with her whom he loved best on earth.

Pleasing Ears Polite.

The world is progressive, and the Church is in the world, and the clergy are in the church. We suppose they must keep together, in some sort. It was our hap, a little since, to be present in one of our up-town churches, at the performance of a marriage ceremony. It was not Grace Church. It was not Dr. Bellow's church. It was an old fashioned, orthodox, substantial concern, for which we, and every one, has the utmost respect. Nat that we have less respect for those above mentioned. When the officiating clergyman came to the place of joining hands, where we have been accustomed to hear something like this: "You, Angelina take this man, whom you hold by the hand, etc.," what was our surprise to hear, in dulcet utterances: "You, Miss Brown, do receive this gentleman whom you hold by the hand, etc!" We rubbed our eyes, but there we were; the altar, and the robes, the bride and her train, the groom, the wedding favors, the audience—all regular. "You, Mr. Jones do you receive this lady whom you hold by the hand, etc!"

We cannot help affirming this to be about the politest officiating we ever witnessed! The force of urbanity could no farther go.

We read in the Bible considerable about "men" and "woman," both in their separate and mutual relations. It occurs to us that a revision of the Scriptures, adapted to the present "distress," would be somewhat indicrous. "And he said, It is not good that the gentleman should be alone, I will prepare a lady for him. And of the osseous substance which the Lord had taken away from man, made he a lady and brought her unto the gentleman. And Mr. Adam said: "This lady is now legally united to me in the bonds of matrimony. She shall be called Mrs. Adam, etc." [New York Chronicle.

A Paragraph for Mothers.

A WRITER IN Blackwood's Magazine considers the prevailing idea of toughening infants to enable them to withstand cold a disastrous and destructive treatment. Although it may be true that young animals have a higher temperature than old ones, yet it is believed to be a fact that the younger the animal the feebler its power of resisting cold. The process of "toughening" may be carried so far by cold water bathe and exposures to cold air as suddenly and seriously to chill the vital current. "Exposure to the open air and the vicissitudes of the weather in the process of 'toughening' ought not to commence until the child has obtained the free use of his limbs, so that his own activity may counteract the exposure and assist in the toughening process. Parents should not commence this system of 'toughening' when the child is merely passive in their hands. The principle is that the child must assist by its own activity in the process of its hardening. This is the true line."

Burke's Idea of a Wife.

Sue is handsome, but it is not a beauty arising from the features, from complexion, or from shape. She has all three in high degree, but it is not by these that she touches the heart—it is all that sweetness of temper, benevolence, innocence, it is all that sensibility which a face can express, that forms her beauty. She has a face that just arouses your attention at first sight; it grows upon you every moment, and you wonder it did not more than raise attention at first. Her eyes have a mild light, but they awa when she pleases; they command like a good man out of office, not by authority, but by virtue. Her stature is not tall, she is not made to the admiration of every one. She has the firmness that does not exclude delicacy—all the softness that does not imply weakness. Her voice is soft, low music, not formed to rule in public assemblies, but to charm those who distinguish a company from a crowd; it has its advantage, you must come close to hear it. To describe her body, describe her mind—one is the transcript of the other. Her understanding is not shown in the variety of matters it exerts itself upon, but the goodness of the choice she makes. Her politeness flows rather from a natural disposition to oblige, than any rules on that subject, and therefore never fails to strike those who understand good breeding, and those who do not.

Never too Old to Learn.

SOCRATES, at an extremely old age, learned to play on musical instruments. Cato, at eighty years of age, thought proper to learn the Greek language. Plutarch, when between seventy and eighty, commenced the study of Latin. Sir Henry Spelman neglected the sciences in his youth, but commenced the study of them after he had turned fifty. After this time he became the most learned antiquarian and lawyer. Dr. Johnson applied himself to the Dutch language but a few years before his death. Franklin did not fully commence his philosophical pursuits till he had reached his fiftieth year. Dryden, in his sixty-eighth year commenced the translation of the "Iliad," and his most pleasing productions were written in his old age.

Early Rising.

THE FOLLOWING passage occurs in Doddridge's "Family Expositor:" "I will here record an observation which I have found of great use to myself, and to which I may say that the production of this work, and most of my other writings, is owing, namely: that the difference between rising at five and at seven o'clock in the morning, for the space of forty years, supposing a man to go to bed at the same hour at night, is nearly equivalent to the addition of seven years to a man's life."

The Tractarian Party.

ARE DIRECTING their attention to the perversion of the minds of children, and suggest a new prayer-book, to be sold at a shilling, and which is to be called "The Boys' Own Prayer-Book." It is, of course, to be thoroughly Romanistic in its tendencies. Errorists know how to take advantage of youthful culture; let Christians profit by their example.

HUMOROUS.

A Smart Woman.

The Chattanooga Advertiser relates the following: A nice, respectable lady, not a thousand miles away, had long noticed, to her dismay, that her "warser half" was growing foolishly suspicious and jealous of her. She resolved to teach him a lesson. Some evenings since, as he was leaving, she told him he need not hurry back—she wished her ducky to enjoy himself, etc. etc. Benedict smelt a veritable "mice" under that hypocrisy, and resolved to be avenged. About eight o'clock, "an individual" about his size might have been seen cautiously creeping along to the door, and noiselessly Benedict peeped in. Just as he suspected. There they were—a pair of boots, a coat on the back of a chair, and a hat on the table. Benedict shivered like an aspen leaf as he stopped, pulled off his boots, and drew a pistol from his coat pocket. Miserable villain—his time had come. "Say your prayers, villain! your time is short!" and a flash and the report, told that the bullet had sped on its fatal mission. "Help! murder! watch!—oh, is that you?" and Madame popped her little head up from the foot of the bed. Benedict seized the body, and it was—a miscellaneous collection of old coats, vests, pillows, handkerchiefs, and the like, made up for the occasion. "I say, dear, what does all this mean?" exclaimed the husband, with a blank, sheepish look. "Well, dear," replied the wife, "I did get lonely after all, and just amused myself by dressing up that puppet, and making believe you were at home. I'm sure, I didn't think you'd suspect"—"There, there," said the chagrined husband, "say no more about it; I thought it had been a robber; dear creature, I'm so glad it didn't bit you." Benedict repented, "Now I lay me," etc., and went to bed, resolved not to watch any more at present.

Better 'Quainted.

The editor of the Piqua (O.) Register, in noticing a work of revival in progress at the African Church in that city, gives this anecdote: A brother was supplicating the throne eloquently, when another brother called out in a stentorian voice, "Who 'dat, prayin' ober 'dar?" The response was, "'Dat's brudder Mose." Hold on 'dar, brudder Mose!" were the words of the farmer, "you let brudder Ryan pray—he's better 'quainted wid de Lord 'dan you am." Brudder Mose stopped, and brudder Ryan prayed. It would be well for persons "better acquainted with the Lord," to lead in prayer at some other revival meetings.

The Yorkshire Dialect.

[In 1846, a paper was issued in Yorkshire, England, using the genuine Yorkshire dialect. The following is an extract from the editor's historical account of the origin of the enterprise:]

'Wun neet, as oor Bet nu' me wur be't fireside, shoo turned hersea suddenly raend an' said: "Thoo'n fooll, Dicky!" "What! Bet, does thao really meean ta soy ahze a fooll?" "Ah dew," shoo said: "thoo'e a real fooll." "Hoo does ta mak that out, Bet?" said he, for ah wur naana hauf suited nhoot it. "Ah'll suy it agean an' ageenn," says shoo; "thoo'e a real fooll; an', if ta'e anny partikelar ta knaw, ah'll tell tha hoo ah maks it ott. Ia't first plaace, Inko, what brnane thoo hez; as starlin as onny 'at ivvar thease gurt men hed, an' yet, like a fooll, thoo take it as ceasy as a pig in t' muck." "Wsel, weel," ah cantinld, "what wod ta ha' ma ta dew, lass? Tell us, an' ah'll dew't." "Then," says shoo, "start a paaper I' thee awn native tongue, an' call it t' Yorshar Comet!"

Too Appropriate A Text.

A good story was told us lately, of a popular preacher in the town of H——, in Pennsylvania, which we take the liberty of reproducing. It appears the minister had been wedded to a most worthy lady, whose first gift was a dowry of ten thousand dollars, with the promise of as much more on the decease of her invalid parent. Shortly after marriage, while occupying the pulpit, he chanced to give out a hymn, the fifth verse of which commenced—

"Forever let my grateful heart,"

His words paused—he coughed, slightly—then adding: "The choir will omit the fifth verse," sat down with something like a nervous haste. With curiosity excited at this conduct of their minister, the congregation smiled some as they read:

"Forever let my grateful heart
His boundless grace adore,
Who gives TEN THOUSAND blessings now,
And bids me HOPE FOR MORE."

A Funny Scene.

We happened to be at our depot a few days ago, when our mail-train arrived from Bristol. As it moved off in a hurry, we observed a young gentleman standing upon the track in rear of the train, bare-headed, and with evident disappointment depicted on his countenance. Remarking that a passenger had been left, a by-stander, with a knowing wink, replied, that the bare-headed man upon the track and a young lady on the train had intended to stop at Abingdon, with the design of committing matrimony. The young lady was in charge of her mother, who was taking her eastward from Bristol to prevent the marriage. The young couple had arranged the matter thus: The expectant groom, without the knowledge of the mother, was to come as far as Abingdon in the baggage-car, and then, about the time the train was to start, he was to run to the back platform of the rear car, where his lady love was to be standing, and as the train moved off he was to lift her down, and let the incorrigible mammy go on, with ample time for reflecting upon the uncertainty of human calculations. The arrangements were understood by the engineer, who was to move off as rapidly as possible as soon as the hatless gentleman disappeared behind the train. The mother, however, having seen him making his way to the rear of the car, looked around for her daughter, and seeing her about to pass on to the platform, rushed towards her and grasped her tightly by her clothing, just at which moment, the lover having reached the signal post, toot! toot! sounded the whistle, and away went the train, with the mother holding on to the daughter, and the young gentleman, as before remarked, standing bare-headed upon the track, looking very much as if he had lot a bird go. A New Voucher.

A country dealer in Cincinnati, a few days since, found himself in possession of a check on a banking-house, and hastened to "realize" the proceeds. The check was all right as to name and accounts, but the bearer needed testimony as to his identity with the legal holder. After searching the streets and hotels in vain, for some acquaintance who would render this service, the check-holder returned to the banking-house, reporting, "It's no use; I can't find anybody that knows me, but I've got my name on my shirt." The check was paid.

A Very Bad Cough.

A friend of ours was travelling while afflicted with a very bad cough. He annoyed his fellow travelers greatly; one of them remarked, in a tone of displeasure, "Sir, that is a very bad cough of yours." "True, sir," replied our friend, "but you must excuse me, it's the best I have got."

Stray Preachers.

The New York correspondent of the Baltimore Christian Advocate says that a Dutch Reformed minister of that city recently advertised in the papers that he would preach at a certain time and place on "The Eagle's nest;" that a Methodist pastor announced that he would preach on "The battle cry of the Church—forward, march;" and that another minister of the great city conceived the idea of getting up a little scenic effect which he executed in this wise: "He selected for his subject the crucifixion, and instructed his sexton, when he got to that part of his discourse where he described the darkness overspreading the heavens, that he should draw down the gas, giving just light enough to make the 'darkness visible.' True to his instructions the sexton posted himself accordingly, and waited patiently for the sublime and awful passage. At length, with impassioned tones, he heard the preacher exclaim, 'And there was great darkness over the heavens,' whereupon he drew off the light. But he was not a practical scene manager, or he had become too much excited by the sublime description, and, alas! put out the light entirely. This was more than the preacher bargained for, and he was confounded and unable to proceed. Some of the trustees of the Church, unable to account for such a wonderful occurrence, especially at that particular time, hurried out to the lobby, and finding the sexton inquired what was the matter. Greatly to his chagrin and mortification, as well as that of the preacher, he was obliged to explain."

GARDEN, FARM, AND PLANTATION.

Trusting to a Single Crop.

There is no crop that does not fail sometimes, though there are a few which are never wholly cut off in any season. Grass, for example, always yields a partial crop, and a person may, if need be, depend wholly upon this product as a means of subsistence. The same thing, however, can hardly be said of any other staple crop. Innumerable illustrations might be given of the danger of depending upon a single crop. The result in Ireland of relying upon the potato crop is patent. The failure of the wheat crop, in many parts of this country, has involved thousands of farmers in debt, which it will take years of toil and economy to liquidate. A friend of the West had been so successful in raising peaches, that he turned his whole attention to that crop. Last year he realized a large net profit, and looking for still greater results this year, he laid out his plans accordingly, and incurred considerable debts to be paid from the proceeds of his peaches. The result is, that from five or six thousand trees he gathers scarcely two bushels of marketable fruit.

A mixed cultivation is the safest, in the long run. If the potatoe crop fails, let there be corn, wheat, barley, or other grain to fall back upon. The chances of utter failure are diminished a thousand fold where there are three or four different crops under culture. A season destructive to one is likely to be just the thing for another.

Preparation of Spiced Vinegar.

The Scientific American gives the following directions for preparing spiced vinegar: "For every pint of spiced vinegar it is intended to make, take one ounce of black pepper, half an ounce of salt, half an ounce of ginger, a quarter of an ounce of allspice, and if desired to be hot, add also a quarter drachm of Cayenne, or a few capsicums. Bruise the whole of these materials in a mortar, and put them into a jar, or wide-mouthed green glass bottle, tied over with a bladder. Place this in a saucepan of water, and keep it hot for three days, shaking it now and then. If the maker has an enamel saucepan, this operation can be facilitated by simmering the ingredients together. Spiced vinegar is used hot for walnuts and cold for cabbage.

Economical Hints.

Have a workbench and a few tools in your wood-shed, or in a little room at one end of your barn. There are many small jobs in the course of a year, which any man of common ingenuity can do as well as a professed carpenter. And there are many rainy days and "odd spells" when these jobs can be done. And how much running to the village, and how much waiting and patience this would save! Do. Have a place for everything, and everything in its place. Those tools—why should they be lying around—the auger here, the jack-plane there, the saw yonder, and the adz and screw-driver nowhere? Don't put away a shovel, hoe, spade, or any implement, without cleaning it. This may seem needless care, but in the long run it is a saving of time and money. Rust corrodes and weakens the best made tools. There are men who leave their plows standing in the furrow, or lying by the side of the fence from one year to another. And the "bran new" scythe is often dangling from the crotch of an appletree, month after month. Hear what a sensible farmer says: "Drive in stout wooden pins to hang your yokes upon; nail strips of board from joist to joist to hang chains upon; make a rack overhead for pitchforks, rakes, turning sticks," etc. To all of which we respond, so let it be!

OBITUARIES.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

JESSE FRAZER was born in South Carolina, in 1782; and died at his residence in Perry county, Alabama, October 12, 1858. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in December, 1811; and, as I am informed, continued a consistent member to the day of his death. In the latter part of his life he was much afflicted, and confined to his bed six months. I found him ready—he murmured not at his suffering, but thought it was right, feeling it was for the glory of God and his ultimate salvation. Thus passed away a Christian man and a good citizen—beloved by all. He leaves a widow of seventy years, and several children. T. P. R.

SISTER SULIVAN, was born in Darlington District, South Carolina, April 22d, 1797; died 3d December, 1858. Raised in Putnaki county, Georgia, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in her 15th year, (in 1820,) married brother John Sulivan, in 1822, and emigrated to Jackson county, Florida. Thence, in 1837, to Wilcox county, Alabama, and in 1838 to this Parish; soon after which, the writer became acquainted with her. She was all that a Christian sister ought to be, faithful her duties, in all the varied relations of life. She suffered long, but patiently. She requested that the writer should preach her funeral from Phil. iv, 8-9 and 10, and that the hymn sung should be "On Jordan's Stormy Banks I Stand." She lived right, and died triumphantly. She leaves a bereaved husband, two daughters, and one son, to sorrow in hope.

W. E. DOTY.

ROBERT ARMENIUS MARKHAM, in the 28th year of his age, died on the 19th of December, 1858, near Summerfield, Ala. He was born in Amherst county, Virginia, November 3d, 1831, and removed to Alabama some eight or ten years ago. He professed religion in 1852 at a camp-meeting held at Oak Grove, in Perry county, Ala., under the preaching of Rev. A. H. Mitchell, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church; a member of which he remained until he died. Bro. Markham received license to practice law sometime during the year 1855, but feeling that it was his duty to associate himself to the work of the ministry, he abandoned his profession, and was received into the Alabama Conference as a traveling preacher, at its session in Eutaw, held in the latter part of the year 1855. He was engaged in the work only a few months, for his health failing, he was compelled to cease his pulpit efforts, and from that time, to his death, he was in constantly declining health. This is one of those facts of Providence which startle us, and which are so contrary to our notion of the propriety of things. Possessed as he was of a mind of great sprightliness, educated at the best institutions of the South, endowed with great energy of character, and having a strong desire to be useful, his friends entertained great hopes of his success in the performance of his duties as a minister. But God knows better than we do, and though dark and mysterious are some of the developments of his Providence, yet we believe that when these mysteries shall be explained, we shall have reason to bless and praise His goodness in every thing that He does. Bro. Markham has left an affectionate and devoted wife, and a little son, to mourn his loss, besides a large circle of intimate friends. But they have the consolation of feeling that his spirit is in a world of blessedness. The writer had frequent conversations with him during his illness, respecting his preparation to meet God, and he always expressed his willingness to trust in the merits of Jesus alone. But a short time before his death, when he was almost too weak to articulate, he was asked if he was willing to die. He replied, "I do not feel as happy as I would like to do, but I feel that I shall be soon in a better world." May God teach us a lesson of humility and of self-abasement from his death, and lead us to the Savior, who is "able to save to the uttermost, all that come to God by him. DETTA.

Summerfield, Ala., Jan. 4, 1859.

DR. JAMES BERNARD MARKHAM, was born in Chesterfield county, Virginia, Oct. 16, 1810, and died in Summerfield, Alabama, December 13th, 1858. He has left a widow and three children to mourn his loss, but they "sorrow not even as others who have no hope." He has left the most satisfactory evidence that he has gone to a better world. Dr. Markham embraced the religion of Jesus Christ in his fifteenth year, under the ministry of Rev. Wm. A. Smith, D. D., of the Virginia Conference, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, a member of which he continued until his master called him away. For twenty-four years past, he has served the Church in the capacities of Class-leader, Steward, and licensed exhorter; and he has always met his duties punctually and faithfully, sometimes to the neglect of his own private interests. Three years ago, his health began to fail, and for the last eighteen months of his life he was a confirmed invalid, confined most of the time to his bed, suffering most intensely. Sometimes, it is true, when his mind and body were racked with pain, he would ask why God permitted him to live under such circumstances; but immediately he would say; "The Lord's will be done. I am ready to die or to live, even thus, as it may please Him." Although, immediately before his death, owing to the circumstances of his situation, nothing of peculiar interest was said by him, yet, no one ever approached him, during his illness, and conversed with him about his hopes beyond the grave, that did not carry away with him the conviction that there was living example of the power of the gospel to cheer and to strengthen—amidst the sufferings of life, in the prospect of death, and of a coming judgment. The writer became acquainted with the deceased more than two years ago; and, he most be permitted to mention two or three facts connected with his life and character as a Christian gentleman, not only as a just tribute to his memory, but also that his virtues may be held up as objects for imitation in the selfish world of ours. He was the most generous-hearted, liberal man I ever saw. Not only was he ever punctual to meet all the demands social as well as pecuniary that were made upon him by his Church, but he spent his life and all his resources in helping the unfortunate about him. If any of his relatives were ever pressed in their circumstances, he was always ready to divide cheerfully his last dollar. He had a peculiar fondness in looking after neglected merit, and in exteeding to the needy the hospitalities of his home and the sympathies of his heart. He lived for others entirely, and seemed to be happy in proportion to his success in making others so. The consequence of this was, that no man ever had more personal friends, wherever he lived. But now remembrance is all that is left us of his virtues. May the God of Truth and of Mercy lead us to the place where his spirit now dwells, and where the friendships of this life may be renewed, never again to be disturbed by sin, infirmity or death. DELTA.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI.—No. VI.

Natchez Baptist Church.

Mr. Editor: Several circumstances had transpired to stir up the wrath of the Catholics against this little band of primitive Baptists. Not only had William Hamberlin and other prominent citizens joined their Church, but Stephen de Alvo, a Spaniard, and a Catholic by birth and education, had renounced the faith of his ancestors and gone over to these heretics, as they called the Baptists. This could not be endured! The Spanish Commandant at Natchez, Don Manuel Gayoso de Lemos, wrote an expostulary letter to Mr. Curtis, urging him to desist from what was considered violative of the laws of the Province, and against the peace and safety of the country. Mr. Curtis replied with characteristic quaintness and severity, giving him to understand that in God's name and strength he was determined to persevere.

His immediate arrest was now ordered; and on the 4th of April, 1795, he stood a prisoner before Governor Gayoso. At the close of the investigation he was assured if he did not unequivocally promise to desist from all public preaching, he would be sent, with several of his adherents, especially Hamberlin and De Alvo, to work in the silver-mines of Mexico.

Whether the hitherto indomitable spirit of Curtis quailed under the menaces of Gayoso, or whether, upon review of the whole matter, he thought it would be more Christian-like to submit "to the powers that be," I am not prepared to say. Be this as it may, he did promise to refrain thereafter from what was offensive to the government. An ediet was also issued by Gayoso, that if five persons were found worshipping together they should suffer imprisonment." Mr. Curtis being discharged returned to his home, on the south fork of Coles-creek.

Things went on quietly for a while, but the American population had increased, and they were becoming more and more clamorous for religious, as well as civil liberty. The church held a consultation, and the conclusion was, that it would not do to give up their meetings. It was true Mr. Curtis had promised to abstain from public preaching, but still he might hold meetings with such as would not betray him. Accordingly they agreed to hold their meetings as secretly as possible, and conduct all their religious exercises in a low tone of voice; and in order to make things doubly sure, they appointed reliable men as sentinels on the road leading to their places of worship, whose duty it was to come in at any stage of the meeting, and report the appearance of any suspicious persons in the distance; which should be considered the signal for an informal and immediate dismissal and dispersion. Thus things were successfully managed for a few months; but an additional circumstance had transpired, characteristic of the times, which, when known, greatly enraged the priesthood and Spanish officers. David Greenleaf, an accomplished young gentleman from the North, had gained the heart and hand of Miss Phebe Jones, daughter of John Jones; but such was their sense of the wrongs inflicted on the connection by the Catholics, that they resolved not to be married by either Priest or Spanish officer. They moreover believed that the uncle of Miss Jones, being a preacher of the gospel, was as duly authorized in the sight of God, to solemnize the rites of matrimony as any one else, and made application to him accordingly. But no one, not even the parents of Miss Jones, were willing to risk the consequences of having the marriage performed in their house. Arrangements were made for Mr. Greenleaf to go on the 24th of May, 1793, with a few select young gentlemen, to the village of Gayoso, which was situated on the bluff about eighteen miles above Natchez, and procure the license from the proper officer. Then, considerably after night fall, he was to be found on the road, two or three miles south of Greeaville, going in the direction of Natchez. In the mean-time, the bridal-party, including Mr. Curtis, were to be taking an evening ride in the opposite direction, and lest some traitorous person might accidentally fall in with either party, they agreed upon a sign and counter-sign, the bridal-party giving the sign when they met in the darkness of night, and the other party returning the counter-sign in case all was well, but if any suspicious person had fallen into either party, they were to pass in silence. At the appointed time and place the parties met. Young people, however, must have their fun—something to laugh about afterwards. On meeting, the bridal-party announced the mysterious word, but there was no response, and they passed without recognition. "Who on earth can they be?" inquired one in a suppressed tone. "It's they," said another, "and something has happened!". A settled gloom was coming down on that lovely bride and her party, when the young men suddenly wheeled about and gave the counter-sign. The parties alighted near the residence of William Stampley, at what is still known as "Stampley's Hill," and by torchligh, under the wide spread bows of an ancient oak, the marriage ceremony was duly performed, and Mr. Curtis concluded by a most impressive prayer, long talked of by those who were present. The parties remounted, the light was extinguished, and each sought concealment in the privacy of home. A numerous intelligent and pious posterity is the result of that remarkable wedding.

Whether Mr. Curtis's participation in this affair, or the floating rumors that he had violated his pledge to quit preaching, and was actually holding secret meetings with his people, re-aroused the fury of the Catholics, I am not prepared to say. Be this as it may, orders were secretly issued, about the 23d of August, 1795, for the arrest of Messrs. Curtis, Hamberlin, and De Alvo. Another quiet Sabbath had come with all its holy associations, and the little persecuted fraternity of Baptists were, in subdued tones, conducting their worship in a private house, in what was then, and is still known as "Stampley's Settlement," on the south fork of Coles-creek, when the sentinel on the Natchez-road came hastily in and announced the appearance of five men, which he took to be a Spanish officer and his posse. The exercises closed, and Curtis, Hamberlin, and De Alvo, hastened to a neighboring thicket to conceal themselves, knowing that they were peculiarly obnoxious to the hierarchy at Natchez. The others adjusted themselves with apparent carelessness about the house and yard. The unwelcome visitors rode up, and with characteristic self-importance, inquired "what they were doing there?" They replied, "that they were doing no harm to any-body, that they did not work on the Sabbath, and preferred spending the day to their own liking.

"Where then is Dick Curtis, Bill Hamberlin, and Steve De Alvo?" authoritatively inquired this embodiment of Roman Catholic intolerance; to which an evasive answer was given; such as, "we don't exactly know, somewhere in the neighborhood we suppose." The officer then announced the fact, that he had come with authority, and a determination to take these three rebels that they might be sent to the silver-mines in Mexico for the remainder of their lives; and if any man should be found aiding and abetting either their concealment or escape, he should suffer the like penalty. The officer and his posse immediately set out on a diligent search for the fugitives, and, in the language of my venerable friend, Mrs. Elizabeth Armstrong, who well recollects the search for Curtis and his two companions, "for a number of days they were like children playing hide-and-seek," such was the activity and minuteness of the search. It now became the settled conviction of the most reliable men in the community, that it was worse than useless for Mr. Curtis and his two faithful adherents, Hamberlin and De Alvo, to think of breasting this storm any further; that their only safety was in a precipitate flight from the country, and, consequently from all that was dear to them on earth. Accordingly, amidst the tears of wives and children, and weeping relatives, as soon as suitable horses could be procured, they clandestinely left the settlement, with the understanding that they were to conceal themselves in the house of a friend on Little Bayou Pierre, near where Port Gibson now stands, until they could be supplied with suitable provisions, in food and money, for their journey through the wilderness to South Carolina, the former home of Mr. Curtis.

In my next I shall relate the principal incidents in their flight and return. Yours affectionately,

J. G. Jones.

"THE GOOD TIME COMING!"

Who does not believe in it? and who is not jubilant in expectation of some improvement in his condition when that time shall have fully come? Among the rest, the Preachers may well promise themselves that this "good time," which is to bring so many blessings to others, shall not be without its advantages to them. Indeed, their condition has been greatly improved; the day has begun to dawn, and though some of the clouds and darkness of the past night still linger in the sky, the clouds are legible and the darkness less obscure. The people are beginning to recognize the claims of their preachers, and are awaking to a sense of their duty towards them; and, we may well hope that the day is not far distant when every congregation, in Louisiana at least, will do justice to their Pastor. Even now, we think there are but few who do not come up to what they regard as a liberal standard.

But much of this is given in what we can but regard as a very objectionable way. It seems to be very hard for some excellent people to divest themselves of the idea that the preacher is an object of charity, and that whatever he receives is a gratuity given by them, and not paid in discharge of an honest debt. Instead therefore of making him a sufficient allowance, which is to be regarded as his due, and to be punctually paid, he is too often treated as a mendicant, and made to depend, to a very considerable extent, upon the precarious presents which his people are expected to make him.

We have often heard it urged as an excuse for the small sum allowed a preacher, that "he receives a great many presents."

And has it never occurred to those good people, that these boasted presents may be precisely the things that are not needed; or, have they never bethought themselves, that every man has his peculiar tastes and habits, so that what may seem to them very appropriate, another may regard as wholly unfit for a particular occasion?

We do not wish to be understood as objecting to a preacher's receiving tokens of affection and evidences of kind remembrance from his friends, provided these are given as they would be to any other friend—to the lawyer, the doctor or the merchant, for instance; but what we do object to is, the estimating these as a part of his living, and counting upon them when his allowance is fixed for the year; for, we repeat, that they are often wholly useless, and, sometimes, really burdensome.

The time has passed, we hope forever, when a preacher will sum up his year's receipts, as—thirty pairs woollen socks, twelve do. do. gloves, four do. brass spurs, eight do. embroidered slippers, one linen coat, five walking-canes, seven riding-whips, and two dollars and fifty cents in cash.

And yet we fear that in some places there still exists an unreasonable disproportion between the socks, slippers and spurs, and the money; and it often happens that the presents, though well meant, are as ill-judged as in this case.

Brother Goodman has a wife and six children, but the stewards have only allowed him six hundred dollars, because "it will not cost him much to live, for the people will send him a great many things." Brother Goodman's daughter, Mary, comes to church with a shocking bad bonnet. Several of the sisters notice it, and during the next week she receives six new bonnets, as various in patterns as the tastes of the givers, and perhaps none of them suited to her complexion or the rest of her apparel. The next Sunday they all eagerly press to church, each one expecting to see Mary wearing the bonnet she had sent her; but Mary is not there; at home, in her own room, she is weeping in the bitterness of disappointment. Alas! the good Samaritans did not see the hole in Mary's shoe, nor could they see that her stockings had been darned and darned, until there was no place left for another stitch. Mary has bonnets, and to spare; but Brother Goodman has no money to buy stockings for her.

When the subscription for the present year went round, Brother Mooney put down ten dollars, and Brother Tompkins, Brother Smith, Brother Brown, and Sister Jones, five dollars each. An outsider, present, expressed some surprise that these comparatively rich people should give so little. "O," said one of the members, "they do'nt give much money, but they give the preacher and his family a great many useful and necessary things during the year."

And so, these "Pillars of the Church" who ought to give two hundred and fifty dollars, give thirty. And how do they compensate their ministers and their congregations for this deficit? Oh, they send him meat and meal and vegetables. But it frequently happens that three or four of them kill hogs or beeves upon the same day; of course, each sends the preacher a share, and poor Sister Goodman finds herself overstocked with provisions—one-half of which, from her want of experience and not knowing how to cure meat as well as Sister Jones, is spoiled before it can be used, leaving her without any at all.

Brother Lovelace is very popular among the people; nevertheless his coat has worn brown, then slick and threadbare, and is now out at elbows. He comes to Church, and though keenly feeling the shabbiness of his dress, and heartily ashamed of it, preaches a glorious sermon, full of the life and power of the truth: in his earnest gesticulations he forgets his coat, but every movement displays its dilapidated condition.

It suddenly occurs to some good sister, that he ought to have a new coat. It is a basket meeting, and at dinner the subject is discussed, and a committee of two or three brethren appointed to go with Brother Lovelace to town the next day and provide him with one.

Accordingly, the next day they take him to town, and the poor man, deeply mortified and oppressed with a sense of dependence, is carried from store to store, discussing, debating, and trying on until all the tradesmen in "Vanity Fair" are made to understand that the munificent people of Brushy-creek Church, are presenting their poor beggar of a preacher with a new coat. Finally wearied and disgusted with being paraded as a pauper, he takes one which does not suit him, in which he does not feel at ease, and which he would never have selected if left to himself, merely because the committee think it "just the coat for a Methodist Preacher."

Now all this is wrong—the ministry is a profession—an arduous and responsible one too, to which the man engaged in it is expected to give his entire time and undivided attention. Is it unreasonable that he should expect to live by it? When the Conference sends a congregation a pastor, there is an implied mutual contract: he is to minister to them in spiritual things, and they are to supply his temporal wants; nor is it too much to ask that he should live as well, and in as good style, as the average of middle-classes among his parishioners. Above all he should be independent, and to make him so, his allowance should be fixed, and certain. The Doctor and the Lawyer are paid for their services in money, and the preacher should be paid in the same way. No other man has a right to select for him his coat or hat, or to determine on what days he shall have beefsteak or vegetables on his table. As already said, these are things in reference to which every man has his own peculiar tastes—tastes, the gratification of which in his own way, makes up a considerable portion of every man's earthly happiness.

We repeat, that there can be no objection to presenting a highly esteemed pastor, as we would any other friend, with some little token of remembrance, a walking cane, a dressing gown, a book, or some other trifle of no great value—but grateful, as the evidence of kindly feeling; but wherever present-making forms a part of the system of ministerial support it is injurious to the people, leading them into false ideas of the relation between themselves and their pastor. Nor is it less injurious to the minister, for it is alike galling to his self-respect, and destructive of all manliness and independence of character. He should be made to feel that he is a pensioner upon no man's bounty, that he is to eat the crumbs that fall from no man's table; but that, like every other honest, industrious man, he earns his bread: and his allowance should be collected and paid over to him by the stewards, simply as a business transaction, just as they would pay any one else to whom they were indebted, and without any pretence of conferring a favor by one party, or receiving one by the other. At least so think.

A NEW BOOK! "PRAIRIE MUD CIRCUIT."

Mr. Editor: Have you seen it? Have you read it? It claims to be an answer to the far famed "Post Oak Circuit." How far the author succeeds, I leave each reader to judge for himself. It occurs to me, however, that each reader of the books above named, can but see a great difference in the spirit of the authors, be they who they may. For he of the "Post Oak" is evidently in good humor, and in the main keeps his readers so. But he of the "Prairie Mud" is evidently full of spleen and ill will towards itinerant preachers. Whoever reads this production, and takes it to be a true portraiture of Methodism in middle Alabama, will of course conclude that the laymen and local preachers have all the sense, prudence and piety; and, that with few exceptions, the traveling preachers are fops, fools, graceless, and bankrupts! Now I am free to admit that our Conference sometimes enclose in its act both good and bad; but the good are largely, very largely, in the ascendant; to scandalize therefore the whole body for the faults of a few, is a great sin. If Methodist traveling preachers, in their humiliations and afflictions, are ever disposed to cry out, with afflicted Job, "Oh that mine enemy would write a book!" they will certainly be more than gratified with this vindictive production. And in this view, I commend its perusal to all and every member of the itinerant fraternity. It will do them good. First, in seeing the things, which if true, make even a preacher odious and contemptible. And secondly, in showing how careful they ought to be in admitting men into, and continuing men in the Conferences, whose antecedents may follow them as their shadows; or whose manifest blunders and improprieties may be a cause of perpetual suspicion and scandal, to themselves and their indulgent brethren. My observation of men and knowledge of men's opinions, warrant me in saying that almost any sin in a Christian man and especially in a Christian minister is sooner forgotten and forgiven than the non-payment of debts. There is meaning in the question propounded to every candidate for admission into Conference: "Are you in debt?" For the pay, prospective, of a traveling preacher is a slim reliance on which to meet pecuniary liabilities. And if it is not safe to enter in debt, it is not prudent to incur them afterwards; hence, economy and self denial should be the watch-word of all who feel that they ought to be like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion. Most of us have heard of Rev. John Hersey, of Virginia. A broken merchant felt he was called to preach. Entered the work as a "supply;" would own no horse; would hear not even an extra button on his plain home-spun coat; and devoted every dollar paid him for his services to the payment of his old debts. Here was honor, honesty, christianity, which men could see, approve and commend. I think I have known the reverse of this, but I will not be an accuser of the brethren. But to return, if the support afforded by those for whom a faithful preacher labors will not keep his head above the wave, he had better retire. So says every worldly-wise man. And then what becomes of the Church? Who is to feed the flock? Here opens upon us the battle-field, and the occasion of the battle. Men who feel they are called and sent, are loath to retire lest they incur guilt. They see that the people they serve have enough and to spare, and that they, the people, ought to be more liberal. Some of the preachers, such as the author of the "Post Oak," have spoken out, and shown where the friction was. This outspeaking is not pleasant to those who would fain "muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." In conclusion, 1. I dare affirm, no man ought ever to preach for money. 2. That no man can long preach as a Methodist itinerant, without at least enough of it, to support himself and family comfortably. And, 3. That, as our people consent to receive as their pastors whoever the Conference sends, none but good men ought to be sent. And lastly, I dare affirm, that if any other sort has ever been sent, it has been an error of the head and not of the heart.

I wonder if this, "Ex-steward," is not also an ex-member of the Church? I guess he is a radical; as such, we will try to profit by his abuse, but return him no thanks for his advice touching the polity of the Church.

THE ESSENTIALS OF AN ITINERANT PASTORATE.

While nearly all have united in approving the itinerant system, yet there seems to be some variety of opinion as to what its life-principle is. Almost every change suggested with regard to Methodist polity meets with one standing opposition. That is, "it will cripple the itinerancy." Thus, if it is urged that the work should be supplied with Sabbath preaching; it is considered a blow at this system. So of other suggestions of change. Our people justly manifest a great deal of jealousy with regard to the security and perpetuity of this peculiarity; and examine every innovation with regard to its bearing upon this part of our economy. In order to ascertain what changes may effect it, it is necessary to examine what is its essential principle? Where is the seat of its vitality? I consider the great principle involved in the system to be, a regular, systematic, and periodical change of the pastoral relation. Whatever interferes with this change is antagonistic to the itinerant system. It is an idea sometimes entertained, that in order for a man to be an itinerant preacher he must be mounted horseback every day, with whip and spur, dashing over hill and dale, mountain and flood; stopping in some wild grove or rough edifice only long enough to deliver a gospel message to whosever may be assembled to hear. Time has been, and there are yet places where something like this sketch is the life of the itinerant preacher. But that such constant traveling is necessary to constitute a man an itinerant preacher, in the technical sense of that word, no intelligent Methodist will assert. In every period of our history men have been stationed over single congregations. And the brother who has had charge of but one church, so long as he held himself ready to be transferred at the proper time, by the proper authority, to another field of labor, has ever been regarded as truly an itinerant preacher, in the Methodist sense of that word, as the brother who has had charge of twenty or thirty churches scattered over a thousand or two square miles. So long as the preacher holds himself ready to go by the direction of the appointing power to whatever field of labor is assigned him, he is a true itinerant—it matters not how large nor how limited that field of labor is. And so long as any church or association of churches holds itself ready to receive as its pastor whoever may be appointed by the proper authority; that church or circuit is faithful and liege to the itinerancy, whether it is a single church or an association of many churches. But whenever these appointments or preachers begin to demand certain preachers or appointments, or to bargain with one another to that effect, then they begin to stab the itinerancy about the heart. The right of pastors to choose their fields of labor, and of churches to choose their pastors, must be surrendered to some third party in order to carry out this system. Whenever either party, pastor or church, assumes that right, it ceases to be faithful to this part of our economy. The appointing power should be left untrammeled by both parties. Here is the point to which I conceive the jealous guardians of the itinerancy should direct their attention. And if, as has sometimes been asserted, the introduction of the laity into our higher church councils would render them less willing to receive their appointed pastors, or less able and willing to support them, less familiar with the operations of this great principle and less interested in its success, then all movements in that direction should meet with prompt opposition. Whether such would be the tendency or not I leave for the intelligent reader to determine.

BOOKS—QUARTERLY REVIEW—HOME CIRCLE—SUNDAY-SCHOOL VISITOR.

Mr. Editor: I trust a brighter day dawns on the prospective literature of the Southern Methodism. Our book-trade I think is increasing. Let all our preachers aid in the circulation of Methodist books. Until the Conference Depositories shall be established, our brethren would do well to order books from the Publishing House. Our terms are liberal. Those desiring catalogues will be furnished by dropping the Agent a line. The discount for cash is so large that all traders would do well to avail themselves of the advantages of advance payment.

The prospects of the Quarterly Review are somewhat encouraging. New subscribers are coming in, and we hope to have a full subscription to this admirable work. Some have subscribed and paid, who have not given their offices. Please to urge upon the brethren the necessity of giving us their post-office address without delay. Brother reader, have you subscribed for the Quarterly for 1859? If not, send the Agent your name and $2 without delay, and you will receive the full value of your money. We want five thousand subscribers for this work.

The Home Circle.—This admirable monthly is not fully sustained. It merits a large patronage. Give us 20,000 subscribers, and we will make this periodical what its friends desire it to be in its mechanical execution as well as in its literary complexion. The editor is alive to its interests, but he must have aid. Send subscribers, and let the good writers of both sexes contribute to its columns. "Many hands make light work." If every travelling preacher in the Connection would send five new subscribers, the Home Circle would soon stand foremost in the rank of the elegant mouthlies of our country. Will our good sisters aid in the support of the excellent magazine? Local preachers and laymen, lend a helping hand.

Sunday-school Visitor.—Let every Sabbath-school in the whole Church be supplied with this beautiful child's paper. The terms are very moderate. A few dimes from each child in every school would supply all with the Visitor.

Hymn-books.—A good chance. Let all stug. Let every Church in the land be supplied. We are now offering, for cash, books at reduced rates. They are going off rapidly. Send soon, or you will loose the opportunity. Read and consider, and then forthwith send an order and the cash, and let no Church be without a supply. Here is what I propose: Having on hand a large supply of Hymn-books, slightly defective in the printing, I wish to close out, and therefore offer them at extremely reduced rates. The hymns are perfect in every respect—the only defect in the books being, that the print is not as clear as is desirable. The binding, etc., is excellent. I put them at such rates as will not only enable congregations to supply themselves, but indeed many to purchase for gratuitous distribution to destitute Churches and individuals. I offer the books, for cash, at the following merely nominal prices:

Hymns, 72mo.—Sheep, net, 15 cents per copy; Morocco, Extra, 40 cents; Roan, 20 cents per copy; Roan, Gilt, net, 30 cents per copy.

Hymns, 24mo.—Roan, net, 25 cents per copy; Roan, Gilt, net, 35 cents per copy; Morocco, Extra, 60 cents per copy; Turkey, 75 cents per copy; Turkey, Rims and Clasp, $1 75; Turkey, Clasp, $1 10.

Let all the Churches now supply themselves in sufficient quantities to enable the whole congregation to sing. The cost will be but a trifle. J. B. McFerrin, Agent.

The same terms as above to wholesale buyers, preachers, or merchants.

Post-offices.—We have the names of brethren, not only for the Quarterly Review but likewise for the Home Circle and Christian Advocate, who paid at the recent Conferences and did not give their post-offices. Will brethren favor us with their address?

Now, Mr. Editor, wishing you peace and prosperity, I close by asking the hearty co-operation of all of our brethren. Sell books, circulate our Church periodicals, pay notes and accounts, and pray for the peace of Jerusalem!

Yours, J. B. McFerrin, Agent.

P. S.—Mr. Editor, I will thank you to insert the above, and call attention to it—adding a warm exhortation.

EXTRACTS FROM MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE MINUTES, 1816.

Mr. Editor: I send you this to correct some errors respecting the names of the members of the "First Mississippi Conference." Bros. Bird and Lott were not there, nor members at that time. Brother Winans was present; but not a member, he was then Local. The following items I take from my journal, which I believe to be correct:

"Oct. 16th, 1816. Conference met at the house of Bro. Wm. Foster, on Pine ridge. We waited and looked for the Bishop in vain. Conference did not organize until 3 P. M. Bro. Samuel Sellers in the chair. Bro. Mcanefee appointed Secretary. Adjourned at 5, to meet at 8 tomorrow.

"Friday 11th. Conference met according to adjournment. We have no news of the Bishop. Bro. Sellers in the chair. At 10 minutes past 10, to our great joy, Bishop R. R. Roberts arrived; but being much fatigued by his long, lonesome and tedious journey, (he travelled alone,) Conference adjourned till 2 P. M. Conference met, according to adjournment, at 2. Bishop Roberts in the chair. We now feel like we are in order for business.

"Saturday, 12th. Conference met at 8. After the morning session, the Bishop preached from Heb. xii, 4, to a large congregation, a powerful sermon.

"Sunday, 13th. Bro. Sellers preached from Col. i, 28. After which, the Deacons were ordained. The Bishop then preached from Jer. ix, 23, 24. The Elders were then ordained.

"Monday, 14th. Conference met at 8. Bishop Roberts in the chair. After attending to some business, the appointments were read out, as follows:

"Miss. Dist., to be supplied; Natchez and Claiborne, John Mcanefee; Wilkinson, John Lane; Amite, Thomas Owens; Pearl River, Peter James; Tumbigby, to be supplied; Chickesawhay, Elijah Gentry; Louisiana Dist., Ashly Hewitt, P. E.; Rapides, Alexander Fleming; Attakapas, Thos. Nixon; Washita, Ashly Hewitt. Thomas Griffin was transferred from the Tennessee Conference, and appointed P. E. on the Mississippi District."

For the satisfaction of those who may feel an interest in having the names of the preachers who composed the first Mississippi Conference, I will send them to you. They are as follows:

Samuel Sellers, Ashly Hewitt, John Lane, John Mcanelee, Thomas Owens, Peter James, Thomas Nixon, Elijah Gentry and James Dixon.

If you should think proper to publish this, you can contract it to suit your own convenience—but be sure to keep the names and dates as here stated. I could write much of those early times in Mississippi, but I forbear, and leave it for others who are better qualified for the task.

The University of Alabama.—We are pained to observe that there has been a falling off at the present session in the number of students at the University, which now does not exceed seventy-five. Well endowed, fortunately located, with a corps of able and learned professors, it is a reproach to the State, that we have not pride enough to sustain our own University, while the names of hundreds of Alabamians are found in the catalogues of other States. Surely it is time for our people to feel some pride in being citizens of the great cotton State of the South, and we know not what better demonstration they could make of such a sentiment, than to support their own institutions of learning. SUPPLY FROM NASHVILLE.

[illegible] to announce to [illegible] frequency a full supply of all [illegible] which has been built to Nashville, to which [illegible] to us, will send their orders [illegible]

BERNARD AND MOULTRIE.

SOUTH-WESTERN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

In our last issue, we published, at their request, an [illegible] communication from the Board of Directors of [illegible] which [illegible] for want of space, [illegible] our comment until another time.

We notice that attempts have been made to create [illegible] that this controversy with the "Union" is [illegible] by sectarian motives and feelings. We have [illegible] disclosed anything of the kind, and now re- [illegible] Even [illegible] enterprise, under the control of [illegible] the [illegible] freedom of THE CHURCH OF [illegible] literary, educational or literary—has our [illegible] good wishes. We advocate the closest and [illegible] brotherly union of all the Churches, consistent [illegible] their [illegible] and most fully developed individuality. But when we are required, practically, to [illegible] that the Christian Church has all the elements [illegible] when properly developed, for the [illegible] of the cause of God, we beg to be excused. If "Bookmanship" has so mystified this very plain [illegible] principle as that people do not understand [illegible] when we announce it, it is proof that it is [illegible] for its bold, earnest, and persistent advocacy. [illegible] may be its immediate application to the [illegible] of the Methodist Church, its importance, with [illegible] higher than this; it is a principle vital to the [illegible] of the Spiritual functions of [illegible] General Church, in all its branches; and, not as a [illegible] for or in behalf of the Methodist Church—but as a member of the Church Catholic, and in her behalf—do we announce and advocate it. Of what avail [illegible] them to tell us that the Union has good books—that [illegible] a great work, etc? Suppose the functions of [illegible] friendly called and regularly ordained gospel [illegible] should be assumed, and its Scriptural authority [illegible] by the gospel, by an irresponsible human [illegible] working under a legal charter, and composed of [illegible] of the different evangelical denominations. Of what avail would it be to tell us that they were [illegible], and that they were doing good? Lay preach- [illegible] to the fullest extent, do we advocate, [illegible] within the limits, and in accordance with [illegible], of the development of the energies of the [illegible]

Laying aside, for the moment, this great principle, [illegible] that the American Sunday School Union [illegible] upon a Scriptural philosophy—what interest [illegible] Church in it? We answer, she has [illegible] Look at it in any possible light, and [illegible] it cannot be denied, we think, that the [illegible] that gave rise to it had their origin almost [illegible] in the Calvinistic Churches. We do not say this [illegible] Hence, the Calvi- [illegible] Churches, and ministers, and preachers, and people, [illegible] uniformly supported it. And the undeni- [illegible] interest felt in it throughout the United States [illegible] wholly confined to those in the interest of [illegible] Churches. It cannot be said that Methodist im- [illegible] had any appreciable influence in its origin, [illegible] or support. The great body of its agents, [illegible] supporters—those who make, mould, and con- [illegible] it—are, and have been, and are from those Churches.

[illegible] of Methodist names occasionally—as officers, [illegible], applicants for charters, orators on public oc- [illegible] does not alter its Calvinistic character. Nor [illegible] a special hiding away of the objectionable features [illegible] Church. The Methodist Church, as a [illegible] has no connection with it, but no in- [illegible] of the character of its literature. And it is time [illegible] sovereign leverage possessed by the "Union" in [illegible] first accommodating Methodists, by which it [illegible] a large investment of Methodist money, Methodist [illegible] forms of Methodist character, into its sup- [illegible] basis. Methodist names are sought for [illegible] purpose of gaining Methodist support; but Metho- [illegible] are not sought for any other purpose, the [illegible] to the contrary notwithstanding. [illegible] view. By support of the Union [illegible] and stalling their own Church. [illegible] to be a great Missionary Sunday School [illegible] Church is a great. Has the [illegible] Publishing Concern? So have [illegible] School paper? So have we. Has [illegible] and colporteurs? The Methodist Itinerancy is [illegible] superior as a Sunday School agency. Are its [illegible] and colporteurs traversing and seeking to supply [illegible] regions? Our itinerant preachers are there be- [illegible] can do a hundred per cent more of this [illegible] Are there destitute regions to be [illegible]? That destitution is not a Methodist destitu- [illegible] is a destitution of the Calvinistic Churches, of [illegible], of their Sunday Schools. We always [illegible] in advance of any of these benevo- [illegible] organizations, that they never can [illegible]

[illegible] the "Union" operations [illegible] ourselves drawn into the [illegible] instance, we occupy the whole [illegible] able to supply it with Sunday Schools [illegible] literature; and the greatest hindrance [illegible] School work there is, the persistent effort of [illegible] occupy the ground that we have pioneered [illegible] have no objection to the occupancy of [illegible] other Churches, in the way of minis- [illegible] and Sunday Schools. They are needed, [illegible] and speak. And if they choose to unite [illegible] the "Union," and supply their destitution in that [illegible], we have no objection. But we do not need the help of [illegible] Union, and we are not willing for it to take our work [illegible] and thereby assume that we are deati- [illegible], and that it has a superior set of [illegible] and our agencies are immensely superior.

We have no interest in the Union; we have no control [illegible] it; we are under no obligations to it; and, while [illegible] it all success in the supply of the lack of service [illegible] those Churches that demand it, and choose to work [illegible] an irresponsible society, we have no money to [illegible] upon it.

We notice one point in the communication of the Direct- [illegible] that closes our discussion with them for good. They [illegible] [illegible]. They say that they have "freed [illegible] from the imputations cast upon him." The [illegible] with which they congratulate [illegible] their supposed accomplishment of this, to [illegible] to witness. We, there- [illegible] that the Mississippi and Louisiana [illegible] [illegible] view of the matter; as they ex- [illegible] conditions disquintancing [illegible] pulpits," in his capacity as [illegible] [illegible] attention for this; but [illegible] resistance and in- [illegible] bodies have [illegible] has most effect- [illegible] manifestoes [illegible] seem to walk [illegible] that they, sitting in their offices in New Orleans, without a knowledge of the facts, should take it upon themselves to say, in effect, that the complaints made by dozens and scores of Methodist clergymen, in various parts of the country, of the misconduct of their Agent, are all idle tales, unworthy of belief or respect.

THE SUPPORT OF OUR JOURNALISM:

A TEST OF GROWTH.

One of the most certain tests of the vital growth of our Church, is to be found in the degree of the support and circulation enjoyed by our Church Journals and Periodicals. The size of our congregations is not a better test of the general acceptableness of our ministry, than is the circulation of our papers a test of our general progress.

We may be priveleged to cheer ourselves with many other evidences of prosperity, such as increase in numbers, in financial strength, in monuments of public spirit and benevolence, in large pecuniary collections for various important interests; and yet, with all these, if our literary "institutions" proper—our principal instrumentalities and evidences of mental and spiritual culture—are suffered to languish, we may justly fear that some of the most essential elements of real, permanent, and harmonious development are wanting.

It is a proof that the love of reading, characteristic of vitality of mind and heart, is not generally diffused—that the general intellect of our people is dormant, unawakened, uninspired—that the seeds of thought have not with proper, vigor and generalness, been made to germinate—that the imagination has not generally been kindled by those conceptions which, in this age especially, are absolutely necessary to the furniture of a full character—that the popular heart has not sufficient largeness. It is a proof that there is not a sufficiency of the spirit of connectionalism—of the esprit du corps of Methodism—that there is not an adequate interest felt in reference to the enterprises and results of the Church Catholic—that there is a degree of weakness in the living, active sympathy which should unite the several parts together in a vital unity with the great whole.

The Christian Press is to the church of the present day what the preaching of Peter the Hermit and St. Bernard, to the gathering millions, was to the Roman Catholic Church, in the days of the Crusades. It is only through this means that the whole militant host can be addressed at the same time—that notes of warning, or signals of preparation, or appeals for co-operation, or messages of peace and triumph, can reach the ear of the whole church at once. Nothing like uniformity and harmony of sentiment and purpose—nothing like unanimity of action—nothing like vigor and massiveness and grandeur of movement—can be attained by any other means than that afforded by the general circulation of the issues of our newspaper press.

It is a literary connectionalism, in striking and beautiful analogy with our ecclesiastical connectionalism. Our other instrumentalities exert their forces in detail; our journals are intended to impress the whole church in each utterance. They are the sentinels upon the highest watch-towers of the church—the general advocates, conservators, and guages of soundness in doctrine—the general means of grace for the promotion of connectional growth in spirituality in holiness—the means and evidences of the prosperity of all the interests and enterprises of the church—the bond of union by which all sections are united upon all these common objects of importance. They constitute an indispensable means of the promotion of all that is meant by the intellectual, spiritual, ecclesiastical, and social culture of our people.

REINFORCEMENT OF THE CHINA MISSION.

A BETTER DAY, we trust, begins to dawn upon our foreign missionary work. Central and South America, China and Japan, are now open to us. We are the wealthiest Church in the United States. And yet, in foreign missions, we have almost literally done nothing. Three foreign missionaries, the only representatives of the zeal of the Southern Methodist Church for the conversion of the heathen world! And this reproach we bear, simply because we have not tried to do better. Our Church, in missionary matters, needs nothing so much, we apprehend, as a strong "foreign policy."

But, as we said, a better day is dawning. The Mississippi Conference is raising extra missionary money to send another missionary, from that Conference, to China. The Louisiana Conference has raised five hundred dollars to send a missionary to Central America. She will, we have no doubt, be responsible for that missionary, and also for one to China, and at the same time not fall behind in her support of domestic missions. We said in a recent article that, were the Bishops to call for it, each Conference would provide a missionary for China, and the money to support him. The Alabama Conference were she thus called upon, would provide one each for China and Japan, and Central America too, were it necessary. Georgia and South Carolina would do the same.

We have good news from the North Carolina and Memphis Conferences. Bishop Pierce writes as follows to Dr. Deems: "It is my purpose to reinforce the China mission. I have detailed a man from Georgia, and have another offer from the Memphis Conference. I learn that at your suggestion the North Carolina Conference proposed to furnish a man and an outfit. Is this so? Who is the man? What is the plan of support? Please communicate with me on the subject. Excuse haste. Let me hear from you." Dr. Deems pledges his District (Wilmington) for $200 of the money; and calls upon three other Districts to raise the same amount—Dr. Taylor having said at the session of the Conference that $800 would be sufficient for the support of a missionary in China for one year. We think they should let six Districts share in the honor of sending out a Conference missionary, and thus raise the amount to $1200. It can be as easily raised as $800, and a missionary should not be stinted.

SENTENCE OF FISHER FOR SHOOTING REV. MR. GREENE.

YESTERDAY morning, says the Vicksburg Whig, Judge Yerger rendered his decision on the motion of the counsel of John B. Fisher, asking for a new trial. The Judge over-ruled the motion, and Fisher was then brought up for the sentence. In answer to the question, what he had to say why judgment of the Court should not be pronounced, he delivered a lengthy harangue, abounding in abuse of Parson Greene, appeals to the Judge, and repeated declarations that the Court knew Mr. Greene had sworn falsely. In pronouncing the sentence, Judge Yerger addressed him feelingly; said he was mistaken in asserting that the Court knew Greene had sworn falsely, that it had not the slightest doubt of the truthfulness of every word he said; he (the Judge) had known Greene for more than ten years in every walk of life, and had never heard of a suspicion or stain upon his character. If the Court had ever entertained any doubt of his (Fisher's) guilt, it was upon the question of malice, but his remarks on that occasion, had entirely dissipated them. The assult upon Mr. Greene, as was shown by the evidence, was most wanton and unprovoked, and the jury could have rendered no other decision than it did. It was the judgment of the Court, that he be confined in the Penitentiary of Mississippi, at hard labor, for ten years from this date, and pay the costs of prosecution.

Hon. Walker Brooke thereupon gave notice that the case would be taken to the High Court, on a bill of exceptions.

It will be recollected that Fisher's attack on Mr. Green was in consequence of his having taken Fisher's

LOUISIANA PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

HOW THE Public School system of Louisiana operates in the interior we are not fully advised; but its results and promises in the city are worthy of attention and admiration. The public schools of the city are supported by the State, assisted by the city in the way of buildings and libraries, we believe. The children of rich and poor are educated in the same schools. The Picayune has a synopsis of the report of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, upon which we draw for items below.

The public school fund in the treasury, at the beginning of last year, was $88,034. The appropriation of the last Legislature was $300,000. Total for the year, $388,034, of which $303,324 34 has been distributed; leaving a balance on hand of $77,015 66. The enumeration of 1857 fixed the number of educable children in the State at 76,508. The enumeration is, however, said to be very defective, and an amendment of the law is asked for to secure greater accuracy.

Other changes are also recommended. One is the re-establishment of the office of parish superintendent, to act also as treasurer of the school fund. It is also recommended that children should not be admitted into the public schools under eight years of age.

He is also for repealing the law which allows to the teachers of private schools, in any district where there is no public school, the same compensation for each child taught, as if the school were public. This he considers a great discouragement of the establishment of public schools, and therein appropriate the State fund exclusively to the use of those who are best able to do without it, and depriving the poorer classes of the benefit which was designed chiefly for them. He holds that it was never designed to raise money by taxation for the support of private schools. Another amendment proposed is in restricting the pay of teachers to the number actually taught, instead of paying by a round contract.

The neglect of duty by the parish school directors suggests the propriety of attaching some penalty to the failure to perform the duty.

The legislation of last year in favor of normal schools in the city of New Orleans is highly commended and it is urged that the system should be extended. The Superintendent's plan is, that of the three hundred thousand dollars appropriated for the support of schools, one hundred thousand should be set apart for the support of four normal schools; that in New Orleans is to have additional favor and privileges; one to be established in each of the other Congressional districts.

As an auxiliary to this, he favors the establishment of a journal of education, which, if conducted in the right way, would in a few years become self-sustaining, and all the time give essential aid to the cause of education.

The total number of educable children (children between six years and eighteen years of age) reported for the city of New Orleans is 21,899, and on the right bank 859, making a total for the parish of 22,758.

The following is an abstract of the public school returns for the city of New Orleans.

First District.—There are ten Districts and two High Schools, with an attendance of 6,062 registered pupils. They have received $57,170 in payment of teachers, from the public funds, and $7,000 for purchase, rent and repair of school houses—total, including all other expenses, $73,663, to which the city has added, $10,000 for the erection of a new school house.

Second District.—Ten District Schools, with 3,921 pupils. Amount received for teachers, $40,200; for school houses, $16,921 12—total, including all other expenses, $60,170.

Third District.—There are nine District Schools and two High Schools, with 3,116 pupils. The expenses are here stated monthly. The teacher's salaries are $3,431 a month, or a total of $41,172, and the aggregate payments for all purposes during the year $46,908 60.

Fourth District.—The number of schools is seven, with 43 departments. Two of the schools are High Schools. The number of pupils is 3,300. The amount for teacher's salaries from the public fund was $32,181 90. For school houses $5,133 50, to which the City Council has added $8,000 as a special appropriation. Total for all purposes, $50,732.

In the four districts which constitute the city of New Orleans, there are 41 schools with 16,392 pupils, which receive $231 473 from the public school fund, and $18,000 from the city in appropriations for new buildings.

The number of pupils is not uniformly computed, and subject to error; and the city treasurer says that it is almost impossible, without a careful census, to furnish a correct enumeration of the number of educable children in the city. He is convinced there are many more than were paid for under the census of 1855.

OUR DUTY TO SOUTH AMERICA.

POLITICIANS and adventurers, says the Independent, are looking with wistful eyes toward the Southern portion of this Continent. The proposed military protectorate over a portion of Mexico, the renewed attempts to invade Nicaragua, the naval expedition against Paraguay, are but partial developments of a grand scheme of aggrandizement which would absorb not Central America alone, but finally South America, State after State, in one centralized empire.

But we owe to Central and South America another duty, which as Christians we have strangely neglected. Is it not time that we should care for their souls? Indeed must we not make haste to send the Gospel to every accessible point in South America, before the name of American shall have to become a reproach over all that Continent?

But how far is South America accessible? That Chili is open to judicious measures for the propagation of a pure faith, is abundantly proved by the experience of Rev. David Trumbull at Valparaiso. In Buenos Ayres a few missionaries of the Presbyterian Board (O. S.) are laboring without molestation and with good encouragement. But it is in New Granada more especially that "a great door and effectual is opened" for the Gospel, though there are "many adversaries." The Home and Foreign Record for the present month contains an exciting and hopeful narrative of the labors of Rev. Messrs. Sharpe & Pratt, missionaries of the Old School Board, at Bogota. The constitution of New Granada and its treaties with England and the United States guaranty religious toleration to the fullest extent, and the present Government is disposed to protect the missionaries. But the Roman Catholic hierarchy have stirred up the populace to annoy the missionaries by breaking up their meetings, and assailing their houses with stones and other missiles.

Ought not the churches in the United States to make South America a special field of evangelical effort? Ought not young men to go thither as eagerly as to any portion of the great missionary field?

MISSISSIPPI STATE UNIVERSITY.

THAT THIS useful institution of learning, says the Mississippian, which has received so large a share of public attention, and is deservedly the pride and ornament of our commonwealth, will continue to be administered in the future, as in the past, without reference to the advancement of particular sects or classes of religionists, and without prejudice to any, we feel well assured. Its course is upward and onward; and as it leads forth its troops of alumni to attest its usefulness, it will receive large accessions of public favor and confidence. The attempts which have been made to impede its career, have served to render more manifest its hold upon the public heart and the fixed determination of the people of the State to sustain it.

In steering clear of sectarian influences of every kind, the Trustees have acted wisely. Our common Christianity is interwoven with all our political and secular institutions so closely and intimately that its subversion could only result in a social and political chaos, and any educational system which would ignore it would be worse than ignorance. But it is not a problem to be wrought out to failure or success, whether the Churches and Sunday Schools, and the gigantic machinery connected with these, are competent to the work of religious education. It is already solved. It is a fact which scarcely needs demonstration that it is a wise and good thing for the State to provide a common ground for educational purposes, where the theological tenets of all classes would be equally free from molestation, and all would be mingled in that close and familiar contact which would prevent intolerance and bigotry from embittering the waters of social and political life at their fountain head.

We are happy to note the success which has attended the labors of the Trustees and Faculty of our State University. Through the agency of prudent management within a few years it has taken rank among the foremost institutions in the Republic.

THE ADVOCATE.

Prevent Loss.

STRICT attention to the business of the Advocate, on the part of our worthy Agents, is the only way to prevent the loss of thousands of dollars every year.

After Conference, when you direct your paper sent to a new office, be sure to give us the name of your old office; otherwise, two papers will be going to you. Every lost paper is lost money.

See that no papers are coming to any of the post-offices in your work, that are not taken out, in consequence of removal—refusal—or otherwise.

When you are convinced, in any case, that we are not going to be paid, have the paper discontinued.

Be careful to have all mistakes, in accounts, in the direction of papers, etc., corrected.

Make the lists at all your offices, paying lists.

Prevent loss, also, by preventing discontinuances, and by largely increasing the lists to cover all losses. And then—"ten thousand this year!"

New Subscribers.

THEY are increasing rapidly. Many of the preachers send in a new lot every week. Now is the time to increase the list, at the beginning of the new volume. This is the last number of the old one. Let every preacher send us a list of new subscribers to begin with the new volume. There will be plenty of time after the reception of this paper, as we shall have the back numbers from the first, for several weeks to come. Will not each subscriber—ladies and gentlemen—send us a new subscriber at the commencement of the volume?

Prevent Confusion.

Sometimes a subscriber writes that he has paid a preacher, a year or two since, but our books do not show the credit. The subscriber is not willing to pay over again—the preacher thinks he has sent us the money, and is not willing to pay it again—we have no account of the money, and are not willing to lose it; and there is confusion and harm. Remedy: We are giving all diligence to prevent mistakes: Let the preachers keep a little book, note down all the monies received, at the time of reception, always give receipts, and always remit as soon as possible.

Don't.

Please do not write business matter, and matter for publication on the same half sheet. If they are not separate, so that the clerk can take one, and the editor the other—we cannot be responsible.

DEATH OF A PREACHER'S WIFE.

BY a note from REV. E. R. STRICKLAND, of the Mississippi Conference, we are truly sorry to learn that his beloved wife died on the evening of the 21st. Those who knew her will not be surprised to learn that she died in the faith of the Gospel which her husband preaches—in peace with God, and in blissful hope of heaven. The incidents connected with her death-bed would fill a volume. God comfort our dear brother. May we all, and all our wives, be so blessed with victory over the fear of death in the final hour.

THE BOOK AGENT, Dr. McFerrin, has an article on the first page, of much interest. We particularly call attention to his recommendation that, until the Conference Depositories are established, those wishing books should trade at Nashville. The support of our publishing interests is what we advocate, and not any particular branch of it, as some "do vainly talk." Let all the preachers send for our books, wherever they can get them most conveniently.

REV. E. J. HAMILL'S REPORT, as Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the Alabama Conference, is a model in its way. Such reports, read at each anniversary, have done much toward developing the present missionary power of that Conference. We commend it to all Treasurers of Conference Missionary Societies.

A CLASS-LEADER AND STEWARD—A worthy man, writes of "two evils," as he calls them—which may or may not be evils, according to the circumstances. He does not discriminate sufficiently. The whole subject, in any case, requires great delicacy.

LETTER FROM REV. DR. LYNCH.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper, November 24th, I perceive you have enrolled my name among the happy company of heaven. You will see by this, I have not yet got there, as I date from Coosa county. I think, however, I shall get there when the Master sees fit to remove me hence.

I was sorry to see the criticism of Rev. Mr. Wheat on Benson, some time back; and, afterwards, a lame defence by some other one, I forget the name. And in your last, you mention the thing as if you thought Mr. Wheat was right. (By no means—Editor.)

Benson's character is too pure, and his Commentary too valuable to the Church to let this thing stop at that.

Any man who will read the last paragraph in his preface to the Commentary, will see that there is no ground for the accusation of plagiarism. It is a pity Mr. Wheat did not read that before he published his accusation.

And the lame defence does not seem to me much better. Instead of the main reason or cause of Benson's Commentary being to correct Clarke's doctrine on the Sonship of Christ; it was the task of Watson to correct that error.

Bishop Soule told me and others, after his return from England, that Benson was esteemed among the best, if not the best, Hebrew scholar in England; and that was the reason for the task being put on him. He had a fine education, and confined his attention afterwards mainly to the Hebrew, Greek and Latin versions of the Scriptures.

Now, said Bishop Soule to us, that gave him great advantages over Clarke, who had given his attention to almost all the languages of the earth. Clarke could not possibly, with a mind thus divided, make as great proficiency in one branch of study, as Benson, who spent his time and bent the whole energies of a sound, pious and cultivated mind, to the investigation of the true meaning of the Scriptures.

You can use this as you think proper. My hand trembles so nowadays that I can hardly write, or I would not have left this thing unanswered till now, I thought surely somebody will correct such a mistake. Do set it right.

Quotation from the Preface.

"From the whole, it is hoped that the reader will find this to be at once a cheap and an instructive work; compressing into a small compass the substance of what the piety and learning of ages have advanced to render the Book of God a "lamp to our feet and a light to our paths" etc.

There, we see he proposes to give me what he thinks the best of what has been written. To "condense;" and does not that mean too to compile? THOMAS LYNCH.

Coosa county, Ala., Dec., 1858.

HOW THE NEW PREACHER WAS RECEIVED.

MR. EDITOR: As the influence of a good example should not be lost, I send you some extracts from a letter lately received from an itinerant brother, in which he narrates the circumstances of his reception on his new circuit. I take this liberty with the brothers letter, without his knowledge or consent; but I hope he will pardon me, and find my apology in a desire to widen the influence of an example so good; I do not remember to have read of more than one other reception of the kind here narrated, and that occurred at one of our largest stations. But hear what the brother says:

"The Lord has favored me with a good appointment. I have seven Churches, all filled on Sabbath. We have a comfortable, neatly furnished parsonage. Now, let me make you feel good by narrating, minutely, the circumstances of our reception. After traveling all day in a large wagon with six mules, (wife, children, books and baggage all aboard) we arrived at 6½ P. M.,—raining, and had been all day. It was a "rural ride"—but that was not the pleasant part I set out to tell you. When we drove up to the parsonage, one of the stewards was in attendance to receive us. The fires were burning brightly. The servants were hired. Some meat in the barrel, and oil in the cruise. Supper was all ready for the table, and in about fifteen minutes, we were eating it. Now, that was a reception which every preacher ought to have. I did not tell you all. Lucy has been receiving backbones, ribs, pigs, feet, sausc, chickens, turkeys etc, etc., till—till we have plenty."

What kind of influence does such a reception exert upon the preacher? Let our good brother answer: "I felt like I could afford to do my best for a people who seem to care so much for the comfort of myself and family. I enter upon my new year with a determination, by the help of the Lord, to accomplish more for the salvation of sinners than the last year."

I do not wonder at this brother's good resolutions. Who would not feel like laboring zealously for the good of such a people? Give, and it shall be given to you again. The stewards on that circuit gave the preacher a comfortable home and a warm reception. They receive back again, an increase of zeal, energy and devotion on the part of the preacher, towards themselves.

To the stewards everywhere: go ye and do likewise."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: A remark made by Bro. H. J. Harris, in a recent number of your paper, giving a synopsis of the doings of the Mississippi Conference in relation to its Book and Tract Society, is calculated, though I am very sure by no means intended, to give a wrong impression. He says: "The plan of the Financial Secretary was not adopted by the Mississippi Conference. The resolution adopting this plan was laid on the table."

All the resolutions deemed to be necessary or useful for the Depository, by its friends, were adopted. One of those resolutions adopts the plan, substantially. It declares it expedient, quoting from memory, that this Depository should be placed in the same relation to the Publishing-house as the other Conference Depositories. This resolution adopts the plan, for that establishes the relation of other Depositories to the Publishing-house, and nothing else does.

There was another resolution reported, which spoke of the plan by name, and which was laid on the table, at my motion, by a unanimous vote; because it was deemed a mere repetition in different words of the one then just passed, above spoken of. Bro. Harris will readily admit this explanation. R. AUBEY.

REV. J. W. LAMBUTH.

Madison City, Miss., Jan. 13, 1859.

MR. EDITOR: I am just in receipt of a letter from my son in China, Rev. J. W. Lambuth. He had just returned from a trip of ten days, into the Interior of the Empire. Visited many large walled cities, preached to thousands and distributed the Holy Scriptures in tract form among vast multitudes who received them with eagerness. These tracts he had printed at his own expense, and regrets that his means are so limited that he is compelled to stop. He states that he was kindly received wherever he went. He had for his traveling companion, Liew, the native preacher, who is doing good service among his countrymen. I am in expectation of a letter from from him, that is Liew, in a short time. If it should be in English, I will send you a copy, but if in Chinese, it must be kept for show and not for publication, as I presume, Mr. Editor, you have not the types for that extraordinary language.

My son informed me that he had received his teacher and wife into the Church, and had no doubt of the genuineness of their conversion to Christianity. This, with other intimations of the divine goodness, has greatly encouraged him in that heathen land. May God bless China with the light of his Gospel. JOHN R. LAMBUTH.

CAMP MEETINGS.

SHALL THEY go down or not? Hundreds of ministers and thousands of members of different Churches who were converted at camp-meetings will say, they must—must not go down!

Scores of thousands of people who were blessed on camp-meeting occasions, will say, "let them be kept up in all our Conferences and Circuits where they can be supported. How can this be done? How can we keep up camp-meetings?

I answer, by getting ready early; let every body that can attend. Let all Circuits take the vote at their next Quarterly Meeting on the subject, and all who live within ten miles of the Camp-ground, provide for themselves.

E. R. STRICKLAND.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

EXTRAORDINARY CASE OF DEPRAVITY.—We heard of an instance of moral turpitude, a day or two since, which, we hope, stands alone. In the late terrible disaster on the Muscogee Railroad, in which the cars were precipitated into a swollen torrent with a fearful destruction of human life, one of the passengers had the misfortune to lose his wife and two children. He remarked the next day, in the presence of his fellow passengers, who, with himself, were saved from the wreck as if by miracle—for none of them could tell how—that in addition to the loss of his family, he had lost all his money, it having been tied up in a belt for security and buckled around his wife's waist. During the day the waters subsided and the passengers who remained in the neighborhood of the wreck, commenced a search for the dead bodies. The body of the lady alluded to was found about a mile below the wreck, and upon examination it was ascertained that her dress had been torn open and the money belt robbed of its contents, some seven hundred dollars. Fresh tracks were discovered in the mud, leading off from the body, which the searching party traced up, until they came upon one of their own number, who had met with so miraculous an escape from death, and who was present when his fellow-passenger told the story of his loss. He was immediately taken in hand, searched, and the entire amount found upon his person. Our informant added that the wretch is now in Columbus jail, awaiting his trial for the diabolical act. [Savannah Republican.

THE DUKE OF CALABRIA, son of the King of Naples, and heir to the throne, is, according to a correspondent of the Courrier des Etats Unis, now twenty-two years old, and is something of an oddity. Few persons, even in Naples, know him by sight. He lives in a very retired way, and never travels; the only excursions he has made so far, having been to Gaeta and back to Naples. His character is so grave and reflective that his physiognomy would announce a man of thirty rather than twenty-two years. He talks but little, even with his father, but is less reserved with his mother. He is never presented to the foreign ambassadors, and only the ministers of the kingdom know him. The Neapolitans are curious to know if his approaching marriage will mollify the character of the Duke of Calabria, who may with reason be called the Taciturn.

THE GOVERNMENT OF GREECE has been offered by one of its patriotic citizens, Evangelos Zoppa, nearly $50,000 the interest to be expended in reviving the Olympic festival. It is proposed that the games be celebrated eight days every fourth year. Literature is said to be [illegible] advancing in the nation. About twenty periodicals published at Athens. One of the newspapers, the "East," is edited by M. Kalopothakes, a [illegible] graduated at Union Theological Seminary in N[illegible]. It has a decided American tone.

COOPER AND NEIBERT have Groceries in abundance, will accommodate all who call upon them—27 Common street.

ARTEMUS HILL has celebrated lamps advertised, all who wish cheap light would do well to call on them—28 Camp street.

The Very Latest Intelligence.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.

The French funds are reported to have declined in consequence of rumors of an approaching rupture, between France and Austria. At the Emperor's New Year's [illegible] Napoleon made a decidedly menacing remark to the Austrian Minister, which attracted great attention, and was the subject of general remark. It caused a panic on the Bourse, and a decline of ½ per cent in the English on the London exchange..... Louis Napoleon's words to the Austrian minister at the Emperor's New Year's [illegible] were—"I regret that our relations with your government are not so good as they were, but I request you to tell Emperor that my personal feelings for him have changed." The emphatic tone and animated gesture which the Emperor Napoleon accompanied this speech attracted the attention of the assembled diplomatic corps, and its bearing upon the Italian question has added great importance to it. The menacing tone of the Emperor towards the Austrian minister caused a decline in French Funds. The Bourse continued much depressed and rather lower rates are ruling. The London Exchange sympathized with the depression of the Paris Bourse, a heavy decline in the English funds followed.

The British papers are all busily engaged discussing Louis Napoleon's supposed position and meaning towards Austria. Their opinions are of the most opposite and varied character on the subject and on the intention of the Emperor's brief address to the Austrian ambassador..... At the New Year's diplomatic reception at the Tuileries, the Emperor's manner towards the Nuncio was so cold and severe, that the latter soon disconcerted and left the levee abruptly..... Louis Napoleon continues his preparations to place the army on a war footing.

The Paris Bourse yesterday fell 3, owing to the fact that the Emperor had sent a threatening note to Austria. At one time, since New Year's day it had declined 5 per cent, but is now improving.

It is reported that France has sent a threatening note to Austria, warning that Government against her crossing the Servian frontier.

The effect produced by the menacing remark of Louis Napoleon to the Austrian Minister, at the Emperor's New Year's levee, still exercised a depressing effect upon the London Exchange and the Paris Bourse, notwithstanding the efforts of the Moniteur to smooth over the matter by soothing articles on the subject.

GREAT BRITAIN.

LIVERPOOL JAN. 8.—The London Times of this morning, in an article upon the effect of Louis Napoleon's speech to the Austrian Minister, at the New Year's reception, says the Emperor made that speech for the purpose of ascertaining how the great powers would receive the subject of the proposed interference of France in the affairs of Italy. The result, the Times says, has happily been a great failure.

ITALY.

Italian affairs become more complicated and threatening more and more threatening..... Italian affairs are in a very unsettled state, and much excitement prevails, owing to the warlike aspect of affairs. Lombardy has taken steps which were almost tantamount to a state of siege. The news from all points was considered [illegible] with causes for alarm..... The London Times in a leading article says, that the excitement on the Continent in relation to Italian affairs has reached a crisis, and that unless means to prevent it are speedily adopted, collision will occur between Sardinia and Austria. France has allowed Italy to invoke her assistance; but Austria does not recognize France as an Italian power, hence the breach existing between Austria and France..... Europe is arming against the Austrian rule continue to increase in Lombardy..... The London Daily News expresses the belief that England will have nothing to do with the plots and counterplots now going on in Italy.

The advices from Italy continue to be of a warlike nature, and indicate a rapidly approaching crisis.

SPAIN.

The Spanish Ministry on Cuba.—The Spanish Ministry declare that Spain will never sell Cuba, and protest against the insulting hypothesis to the contrary, which was implied in President Buchanan's message to Congress. Senor Olozuna had introduced a motion in the Cortes supporting the ministerial declaration. The motion was unanimously approved by the Cortes. It is understood that the Spanish Government have addressed England and France on this subject..... Spain has obtained satisfaction from Mexico for her grievances in the Tacon affair.

In a debate in the Spanish Chambers on the [illegible] proposition of President Buchanna, Gen. O'Donnel declared that the Spanish Government were disposed to demand satisfaction (!) of President Buchanan for his insulting proposal in relation to Cuba. He further declared that Spain would never cede any of her territory.

HAYTI.

BOSTON, JAN. 17.—A Revolution by Four men.—A passenger arrived at this port in the schooner North Wind, from the West Indies, relates a story to the effect that on the 22d ultimo, a party of four armed individuals headed by a man named Jeffard, landed on the beach near Gonaives, Hayti, proceeded to the town and demanded entrance of the sentinel, and also that the cry of Vive La Republique should be raised. The sentinel refused compliance, and meanwhile Jeffard's companions had frightened the sentinel into liberating some forty political prisoners, who joined Jeffard, and the whole party demanded of the Governor the surrender of the town. The Governor acceded to the demand, and surrendered on the 22d. A Republic was proclaimed and Jeffard named President. A new constitution was signed by the authorities and Jeffard's forces augmented by the citizens of Gonaives. The town of St. Marie was taken by Jeffard without resistance, and the insurrection was spreading. Jeffard had issued a decree reviving the constitution of 1846. Also another decree depriving the Emperor Soulouque of all power.

NEW YORK JAN. 21.—An arrival from Port-au-Prince brings intelligence from Gonaives to the 8th inst. Soulouque commanded the Haytien army in person. The movement of Geffrard, at Gonaives, was considered merely a local affair, and was treated as an ordinary affair. It does not appear to have extended beyond the immediate vicinity of that town. There was perfect order in the army of Soulouque, and little apprehension that the revolt would spread far.

INDIA.

THE AMNESTY.—Later advices from India had been received in England, but the news was not of an important character. The amnesty offered to political offenders and prisoners by the Queen was working slowly, but having a good effect..... Dates from Bombay to the 5th of December had been received at London.

A large army of rebels had been defeated by the British forces under Sir Colin Campbell, the commander-in-chief, and an early peace was considered probable. The effect of the amnesty has been to gradually reduce the ranks of the rebels..... The British forces have had a victory at Boundeea Kiaru, causing an enormous panic among the hostile forces.

RUSSIA.

CONSPIRACY AT CRACOW.—It is rumored that a formidable conspiracy has broken out at Crocow, and numerous arrests had been made.

The object of the Cracow conspiracy is to restore

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Independence and declare a republic.....It is reported that Russia is negotiating a loan with the Rothschilds for several millions sterling. The report is not credited.

AUSTRIA.

At Vienna a panic prevailed in consequence of a rumor that Austria would immediately send a body of troops to Belgrade.

Austria was sending a strong re-inforcement to Lombardy, notwithstanding her garrison there was already on a war footing.....An outbreak was anticipated at Milan. It was rumored that Milan was in a state of siege, but the rumor is not confirmed.....It is also reported that great agitation prevailed at Cremona, Modena and elsewhere A scuffle is reported to have taken place between the Austrian and Hungarian soldiers at Cremona. Austria it is reported, has abandoned her intention of concentrating troops on the frontier of Servia.....There was great depression at Vienna.

TURKEY.

THE INSURRECTION IN SERVIA.—The insurrection in Servia has assumed formidable proportions. One hundred thousand men are reported to be in arms resolved to throw off the Turkish rule. Re-inforcements have been ordered to be sent from Constantinople to the Turkish troops in Servia.

DOMESTIC.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16.—The Senate was not in session to-day.

House.—On motion of Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, the French Spoliation bill, reported from the committee on Foreign Affairs at the last session of Congress, and postponed until this day, was further postponed for two weeks.....The Senate bill to authorize the President to make advances of money to Hiram Powers was taken up and passed.....Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, gave notice that, at an early day, he should move to go into committee of the whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the steamboat bill reported at the last session of Congress, and asked to have a substitute, which he should offer to the bill at the proper time, printed; to which no objection was made.....The revenue bill was further considered in Committee of the Whole, and then, without transacting any further business of public interest the House adjourned.

ACQUISITION OF CUBA.

Jan. 18.—Senate.—In the Senate Mr. Seward's resolution was adopted, asking for the correspondence between this government and Spain in relation to the purchase of Cuba.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the President's message.

Mr. Cox strongly advocated the acquisition of Cuba, and said he would vote for Mr. Branch's proposition to give the President money for the purpose of purchasing the island, and if Spain refused to negotiate for the sale, he would, in the event of war following, be in favor of seizing the island.

Mr. Cox deplored the course of our government in not retaining possession of Mexico after we had conquered it. He advocated the recognition of the Juarez Government thus giving it the assurances of our sympathy. In consequence of France, England and Spain having fleets in the Gulf of Mexico, he proposed that the United States send a fleet there with a commissioner, for the purpose of making a treaty with President Juarez at Vera Cruz.

Mr. Cox thought if this was done it would quadruple our trade with Mexico, and make it equal to the commerce of Great Britain with that port. Mr. Cox observed that if his Southern friends objected to the seizure of only Chihuahua and Sonora, as being too small a slice, let them take also Tamaulipas and New Leon, and try the experiment of raising coffee and sugar there, and finally admit these provinces as a cluster of Southern States. Mr. Cox regarded Louis Napoleon as the chief instigator of the threatened intervention on this continent, and fervently prayed that there would be barricades erected in every boulevard in Paris, and that many more citizens than soldiers would fraternize to the music of the Marseillaise hymn. The prayer answered, he continued, and the world would be rid of an usurper. Mr. Cox closed his eloquent speech by counselling firm action on the part of our own government. He believed that the alliance between England and France would not long continue, and if it did, he thought we had no danger to apprehend from it.

Mr. Keitt made an eloquent speech in favor of the acquisition of Cuba, even at the cost of a war with Spain. He considered that the United States would be justified in adopting extreme measures with Spain in consequence of the aggressions, wrongs and outrages suffered by our citizens.

The Secretary of State, in response to the House resolution asking for the correspondence between the governments of France and England with our government in relation to the acquisition of Cuba, states that no correspondence exists on the subject, except what was communicated to the Senate on the 4th instant.

The President, in reply to a resolution of the Senate, says he wishes Congress to sanction the plan proposed by him for the acquisition of Cuba, before he renews negotiations with Spain on the subject.

Jan. 25.....The report of the committee on Foreign Affairs, to which Mr. Slidell's bill was referred, was presented by Mr. Slidell yesterday.

It urges the acquisition as a national necessity, and favors the proposition to place meane at the disposal of the President for the purpose of prosecuting negotiations with Spain for the purchase of the island. The report quotes the opinions of Jefferson, Adams, Clay and Van Buren. It quotes Mr. Buchanan's sentiments as expressed in his dispatches to Santiges, the French Minister, and Secretary Marcy's, in his dispatches to Soute, while Minister to the Court of Madrid.....In reference to the dangers of clothing the President with powers to negotiate for the purchase of Cuba, the report says: "As to the dangers of such powers being granted, the case of Louisiana, Florida and Mexico are illustrations of the faithfulness and advantages derived from such a course."....As to Spanish pride—the world has known for years our desire to possess Cuba, and the steps we have taken to secure that end. We now say to Spain: Your possession is held by a precarious tenure. It is indispensable to us for the protection of our commerce, and the island, from its position, population and government, may at any time lead to a rupture, to the regret of both nations. It yields you a net revenue not equal to one-hundredth part of the price we offer you. Should a European war occur, you would become involved, and the Cubans would declare their independence.....The report further says, that our Minister at Madrid will not broach the subject of the purchase of Cuba until he believes it will be favorably entertained.....The report apprehends the emergency when Spain may need money and will then accept our proposals.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Jan. 19.—Senate.—The Postoffice committee have agreed to report a bill making the postage five cents for all distances under 3000 miles and restraining the franking privilege.

It is thought, however, that Congress will not pass this or any bill increasing the rates of postage or restricting their "dead head" privileges.

Mr. Brown moved to lay the Pacific Railway bill on the table. The motion was lost by a vote of 20 against 38.

Mr. Pugh offered a resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury for returns of all articles exported and imported from the island of Cuba during the past five years. The resolution was adopted.

Mr. Pugh's amendment to stop the road at the eastern boundary of California, called forth elaborate arguments and a lengthy discussion, which was not concluded when the Senate adjourned.

House.—In the House Mr. Cobb reported a bill confirming to the Mobile and Ohio Railroad company the transfer of public lands which had previously been granted by Congress to Mississippi and Alabama for railroad purposes. The bill also extends the time for the completion of the road to 1866. The bill is intended to legalize the transfer made by the aforesaid States. The bill passed.

PRE-EMPTION LANDS.—House.—In the House yesterday Mr. Cobb reported a bill requiring pre-emption settlers to occupy land three months only before acquiring their titles to the lands so occupied.

Senate.—In the Senate yesterday Mr. Hunter called up the invalid pension bill. It provides for the appropriation of $836,000, re-enacts the provisions of the act of 1819 for the prevention of fraud, and proposes to abolish on the 1st of July next all pension agencies, the duties of which are to be performed under the sub-treasury regulations. The consideration of this bill was postponed until to-day. The Pacific Railway was up for consideration. Mr. Brown's motion to lay it on the table was lost, 19 to 36.

The Postmaster General estimates that the service of the Postoffice Department for the next fiscal year will require the expenditure of sixteen millions dollars.

The Secretary of the Treasury has submitted a plan for diminishing the expenses of collecting the revenue, to the amount of some $3,000,000 per annum.

He proposes the re-organization of the collection districts, the reduction of the number of negro ports of entry, and the discontinuance of 22 out of the 80 ports of delivery.

He also recommends that the revenue cutters be attached to the Navy Department.

CALIFORNIA.

St. Louis, Jan. 18.—The overland California mail of the 24th ult. has arrived, bringing four days later date from San Francisco than we had by the Quaker City at New Orleans.....It is feared that great suffering will be experienced by the Fraser river miners, in consequence of their supplies being cut off. The river is frozen and navigation entirely suspended.....The whaling ship Rajah, from New Bedford, was wrecked in the Ochostosk sea on the 13th of October, and thirteen lives were lost.....Business in San Francisco, and throughout the State, was almost at a stand still.....Business at Honolulu was very dull.....The mail passengers report the road in excellent order until they reached Missouri.....The miners were leaving the Gila river gold mines for want of success in gathering gold dust.....The Apache Indians attacked the mail train about ten miles above El Paso and killed two men.....Great excitement was produced at Sacramento in consequence of a decision of the Supreme Court of the State, ordering the removal of certain buildings erected on lots, the title of which was in dispute. It was feared that another Vigilance Committee rising would take place; but the authorities finally succeeded in restoring order.

A reign of terror in Kansas—Citizens fleeing for safety. The Kansas City Journal of the 13th inst. says, that Judge Williams had just arrived from Fort Scott, and reports that the neighborhood of the Fort is under a reign of terror. Business had been entirely suspended. The women and children were being removed to a place of safety, and the citizens had organized for the defence of the city and were on guard day and night to prevent an attack from the lawless bands under Montgomery, and other banditti who were ravaging the country.

Louisiana Legislature.—BATON ROUGE, Jan. 19.—House. Notice was given of an intention to introduce a bill for the introduction of African apprentices into the State.

The Governor has vetoed the bill closing the Plequemine bayou. The consideration of the subject in the House was postponed for two weeks.

Jan. 20.—Senate—Mr. St. Paul moved the appointment of a committee of investigation in relation to the reported mismanagement of the Jackson Railroad, and the motion was adopted.

House.—In the House, Mr. Holland introduced a bill to exempt from taxation the City Bonds.

Supreme Court Associate Justice.—The democratic District Convention met to-day at 10 o'clock for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the vacant Associate Justiceship of the Supreme Court.

The Convention adjourned until 4 o'clock P. M., and on re-assembling, the Hon. Albert Voorhies, of the parish of St. Martin, was declared the democratic candidate for the office.

Extensive forgery on a New Orleans house.—LOUISVILLE, Jan. 19.—A man calling himself Joseph Norton, of New Orleans, on Friday last, passed to W. E. Snoddy, of this city, a check on the Citizens' Bank of New Orleans, purporting to have been signed by Messrs. Rotchford, Brown & Co., and to have been certified to by the Bank. It has been ascertained to have been a forgery. The forger received for it $4,100 in money, two thousand dollars in Hardin county Railroad bonds, and Mr. Snoddy's note for the balance. Norton also disposed of several similar forged checks to different parties. The forger has escaped and his whereabouts not been ascertained.

Jan. 20.—A reward of $100 has been offered for the arrest of Norton, the forger of the $10,000 check on the Citizens' Bank. His real name is Alexander Norton, and not Joseph, as he represents it. His upper lip protrudes peculiarly.

The Hardin county railroad bonds which he received in part for the check were numbered 33 and 73.

Fire at Shawneetown.—MEMPHIS, Jan. 19.—A destructive fire occurred last evening in Shawneetown, Ill., which is reported to have destroyed nearly half the town.

ARIZONA.

The overland mail reports that gold continues to be found on the Gila river as far as the country was prospected, and a number of Mexicans were reported to be making making twenty dollars a day at dry washings. The Arizona Copper and silver mining operations have proved very successful, the silver mines having yielded eighty dollars to the ton.

UTAH.

Dates of the 6th ult. have been received from Salt Lake city.....The charge of treason preferred against a number of Mormons has been abandoned by the United States Attorney.....The weather at Salt Lake continued to be intensely cold.

CALIFORNIA.

The steamship Quakor City, Capt. R. W. Shufeldt, from Minatitlan, brings the California mails of the 5th inst., and one hundred and twelve passengers from San Francisco via Tehuantepec—advices twelve days later than we received by overland mail at St. Louis.....The Pacific Mail Company's steamship Golden Age, which left San Francisco on the 5th last., and brought the Quaker City's mails and passengers to Acapulco, has two hundred and fifty passengers for New York, via Panama.....The shipments of treasure by the Golden Age are as follows, viz.: $1,205,713 for New York; $468,372 for Europe, via Panama; $65,000 for New Orleans, via Tehuantepec; $771 for Panama and other places; making the total shipment $1,739,856.

The California Legislature permanently organized yesterday by the election of the following officers: House of Representatives.—W. C. Stratton, Speaker; G. Gilman, Chief Clerk; S. Moore, Sergeant-at-arms. The Locompton democrats have a large majority in both branches of the Legislature.

Business at San Francisco, during the past two weeks, has been almost at a stand still.

CONGRESSIONAL QUARREL.

NEW YORK, Jan. 22.—The New York Herald's Washington correspondent says, that during an executive session of the Senate, an angry and excited discussion arose between Senators Douglas and Fitch, which it is thought will terminate in a duel.....The debate occurred upon the confirmation of Potter, the Collector at Toledo, Ohio.

Senator Pugh opposed Potter's nomination, because it displaced his friend, and said that if the President desired an issue with him he was ready for it. He stoutly denounced the appointment, and asked his senatorial friends to vote it down.....Senator Douglas said he would vote with Mr. Pugh, and then proceeded to denounce the Illinois appointments as dishonest, corrupt, and the occupants of the offices incompetent for the stations to which they had been appointed.....Mr. Fitch emphatically denied the statement. Douglas, thus interrupted, paused in his remarks, and Fitch again said the statement of Mr. Douglas was untrue. Fitch was called to order, when Douglas continued his speech.....Fitch replied with great bitterness, saying in the course of his remarks, that Senators knew how to prize anything from that quarter (pointing to Douglas).....Fitch was interrupted by cries of order.....Excitement prevailed.....Douglas commenced to reply, but was called to order.....Several motions were made that Douglas be allowed to go on.....Davis opposed the motion, and turning to Douglas said that his language was that of a highwayman and a bravo.....The exciting debate was put an end to by a motion to adjourn which was carried.

It is said the lie was given, and the most severe personal remarks indulged in.

Rumors of a Duel.—WASHINGTON, Jan. 24.—Rumors are in circulation of a pending hostile correspondence between Senators Douglas and Davis, but these have no foundation. There is no ground for a personal issue between them. Notes have passed between Douglas and Fitch, but it is thought the affair will be amicably settled.....The wisest friends of Senator Douglas think that the administration intends to force him to take a back seat in the Democratic party, but would prefer to push him out of the organization altogether. An early opportunity will be improved by the administration senators to make an issue with Douglas in open session on his charges relative to the Illinois appointments.

MR. DOUGLAS AND THE CHARLESTON CONVENTION.—The Chicago Times, a journal friendly to Mr. Douglas, and supposed to coincide with him in views says:

Mr. Douglas will not ask a nomination at the hands of the Charleston convention. If in that body his friends should present his name, and he be nominated, he will not feel at liberty to decline it; if his friends should not present his name, the nominee of the convention will receive his support.

LOCAL.

The Louisiana Legislature is now in session at Baton Rouge.

GOVERNOR WICKLIFFE, in his message says, that on the 1st inst., there was in the Treasury for general purposes, $621.96. Estimated receipts for the present year $985,000; estimated expenses; $1,201,976; deficit, $216,355; yet the Governor says that with economy and retrenchment, no increase in taxation will be necessary, and that it may soon be reduced.

He calls the attention of the Legislature to the dispute between the Treasurer and Auditor. The Treasurer refused to cash a warrant, a mandamus was taken out against him, the Court decided against him, and the Treasurer appealed to the Supreme Court, which has not yet given judgment in the case. There is also another dispute between the Treasurer and Auditor about the investment of the School funds. On the blank day of August, the Auditor reported to the Governor the sum of $76,000 of the school fund to be invested. The Treasurer did not unite in the report; the Attorney-General sustained the Treasurer; the Governor concurred in the opinion of the Attorney-General, but desired to invest the whole amount, believing that all defective legislation had been "cured" by the act of 1858; and the Auditor, on the 26th day of August, reported near $9000 to be invested. What became of the balance, $66,000, is not stated. The Louisiana system of banking receives a brief but fitting eulogy.

The subject of protection from overflows is warmly commended to the attention of the Legislature. The recommendation of the State Engineer of a general survey of the State, or in default of this, of the Mississippi river from the Arkansas line to the Gulf is strongly urged by the Governor. He thinks it would be well to place the whole subject of levees under the direct control of the State, instead of leaving it as now to the respective Police Juries of the Parishes and the riparian proprietors. To meet the expenses the State would thus incur, it is proposed to use a part of the 'Swamp Land Fund, and to levy a tax upon all land subject to overflow. The proceeds of the sale of swamp lands during the year amount to $191,609 24; internal improvement lands to $17,959-48; and school lands to $12,677 35.

A "State Seminary of Learning" has been established by law near Alexandria. The Board of Supervisors meet on the second Monday of February next at Baton Rouge, to determine upon the "nature and character of the institution," which it appears have been left blank. The only thing that has been done is to erect a house.

The management of our Charity Hospital is warmly commended, as is also that of the Insane Asylum at Jackson and of the Institute for the Deaf, Dumb and Blind at Baton Rouge.

The Governor very properly says that the people will never feel satisfied until a fair experiment has been made of a quarantine, which has not been done. The Legislature should enforce a rigid quarantine or repeal it altogether. One hundred railroad bonds of one thousand dollars each were issued by the State to our railroad companies in 1858, which, with those previously issued, make an aggregate of $1,735,000. The estimates filed in the Auditor's office of bonds required in 1859 amount to $388,000. The Governor suggests that a Reserved Fund be established for the "Redemption of these bonds." Though but little was done the past year in the extension of our railroads, yet the public mind has become convinced of their great necessity, and hence a good foundation has thus been laid for future action. It is suggested that Louisiana be placed upon the same footing with Mississippi as to voting in the Board of Directors of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad Company. Charges of bad management in the affairs of this company have been officially preferred to the Governor, and the Legislature is asked to examine them.

Special attention is called to the necessity of Legislative action to protect New Orleans from the danger of crevasses, which might stop the cars on the Jackson Railroad for forty-six miles, as those on the Opelousas road were by the Bell and Labranche crevasse. The Executive earnestly advises the repeal of the law which throws upon the State the expenses of criminal prosecutions.

The Governor earnestly favors the acquisition of Cuba.

THE NEW ORLEANS SCHOOL OF MEDICINE.—The report of this institution to the Auditor of the State, in accordance with law, shows the total expenditures on account of the school, since its commencement in May, 1856, to be $68,713 45.; the total receipts, including $10,000 of the sum of $20,000 appropriated by the State, to be $38,102-95; leaving debt due by the school of $30,182 95.

The conditions on which the State appropriation was made were:

1st. That the Faculty should give lectures, free of charge, to one meritorious student from every parish in the State, during a period of ten years.

2d. That they should keep open a Free Dispensary for three days in each week, during a period of ten years.

3d. That the members of the Faculty should attend the Charity Hospital, if required, without charge.

The report asserts that the conditions have been complied with, that the institution is entitled to the balance of the $20,000, appropriated by the State, and suggests the propriety of an additional appropriation of $10,000 in order to relieve the institution of the pressure of a heavy debt. As to the part which the New Orleans School of Medicine has had in stimulating progress in medical instruction, the report says:

Let the events of the past two years say what the New Orleans School of Medicine has done towards giving our city her merited prominence as a seat of medical learning. Notwithstanding her superb buildings and equipment, derived from State munificence, the Medical Department of the University, after an existence of nearly twenty-five years, had never been able to attract a larger class than 225 students, until the New Orleans School of Medicine was established. Since that time the classes of both institutions have been annually increasing, and the number of matriculates in the two schools at this time is more than 450, or more than twice as many as the elder institution had ever attracted hither while occupying the field alone. It is not at all improbable that, in five years, the number of medical students in New Orleans will reach one thousand, provided these institutions be properly nurtured by the State, and sustained by their Faculties.

THE INSANE ASYLUM.—The Courier has a review of the report of the Insane Asylum, which it thus condenses:

There were remaining in the Asylum on the 31st of December, 1857, 125 patients—84 were admitted since that date, making the whole number treated during the year, 209. Of those, 32 were discharged recovered; 9 discharged or removed in an improved condition; 3 eloped; and 27 died, leaving 137 in the Asylum, December 31, 1857. 114 of the patients were supported at the expense of the State; 25 were paying patients, one was a slave and 10 free negroes. Three patients were from Mississippi, three from Arkansas and two from Texas.

The causes of death are given as follows:

Chronic Diarrhea, 15; apoplexy, 2; dysentery, 2; heart disease, 2; epilepsy, 1; general debility, 2; marasmus, 1; suicide, 1; phthisis pulmonis, 1; paralysis, 1. Four of those were under 20 years of age, eight under 30, seven under 40, five under 50, two under 60 and one over that age. 86 of these remaining in the Asylum are males, and 37 are females.

Of the 137 patients remaining, 67 are natives of the United States; the balance are foreigners by birth.

Since the establishment of the Asylum, 710 patients have been received from various sections of Louisiana, 453 of whom were from this parish.

Most of those discharged as recovered, were recent cases; a fact which shows the importance of placing those thus afflicted promptly under proper treatment.

The attendant physician calls attention to the necessity of relieving the Asylum of the care of idiotic or weak-minded persons, and also of helpless paupers, who are not proper subjects for an insane asylum.

The physician accompanies his report with some valuable observations upon the causes of insanity, in which he attaches great weight to intermarriages of blood relations as a prime cause of insanity.

The report also shows:

The appropriations asked for are—$21,000 for subsistence, and $5000 for repairs and improvements.

The Asylum farm and garden have furnished products of the value of $1841; there has also been made in the Asylum, mainly by the patients, clothing to the value of $1470.

A tabular report is given of the number of patients in twenty-two lunatic asylums in the United States, amounting to 4723, with the annual expenditure of each institution, amounting to $908,359. While this shows an average cost for each patient of $205 per annum, the average in our asylum is only $105, a fact that indicates the care and economy of those who control it.

THE CHARITY HOSPITAL.—during the past year the admissions into this noble institution were, 11,337; discharges, 8923; and deaths, 2270; remaining on the 1st instant, 641. Of the whole number admitted, 6568 were born in foreign countries, 1751 in the United States, and 18 unknown. There were 122 births, 18 being still-born. The expenses of the institution for the year were $70,845 67, and the receipts, including the balance previously on hand, $72,039 47. Though the amount actually disbursed in cash is as is above stated yet the Hospital owes considerable, and will have to pay next month $21,000. The institution is sustained chiefly by the tax on passengers, concerts, balls, etc., and State appropriation which, last year, was $22,000. The sources of revenue have very considerably fallen off within the past year. The tax on balls, etc., produced only $3525, and that on the theatres scarcely anything. The amount of the passenger tax yielded but $19,640, so that the Board asks from the Legislature at least $40,000, as absolutely indispensible to enable the Hospital to keep open doors for the sick destitute. The report of Judge Lea to the Legislature suggests that some permanent income be provided by taxation; and to this end that the fines imposed by the Recorders and the First District Court be appropriated to this purpose. The Legislature, we trust, will come promptly to its relief. Bulletin.

Dr. W. G. Austin is the Treasurer, and chief executive officer of the institution.

THE LOUISIANA PENITENTIARY.—According to the report of the clerk of this institution, the number of convicts remaining in the Penitentiary on the 31st of December, 1858, was 326. Of this number 78 were convicted of murder, 44 of manslaughter, 10 of attempts to kill and 20 for arson. During the past year 88 prisoners were received, and for the same time 88 were discharged on expiration of sentence; 3 were pardoned; 6 died, and 2 escaped. We learn from the report of the Board of Control that the net profits of the Penitentiary for the past year amounted to only $2574. That a larger sum was not realized is ascribed to the fact that no demand existed during the larger portion of the year for the product of the looms of the Penitentiary.

OVERFLOW IN THE REAR.—The burning of the second section draining-machine has caused the rear portion of the Second District, and a portion of the First, to be overflowed. From the Common-street shell-road, down the Bienville-road, and even further down, the whole country is flooded—the water coming up as high as Prieur-street. Unless this machine is speedily put in working order, great damage will be sustained by property-holders in that section.

TUESDAY-EVENING, January 25, 1859.

THE following table exhibits the ruling prices in our Cotton marts this evening.

New Orleans Classification:		Good Middling	11¼@12¼
Inferior	6¾@ 7¾	Middling Fair	12¼@12¾
Ordinary	8¼@ 9¼	Fair	—@—
Good Ordinary	10¼@10¾	Good Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¾@11¼	Good and Fine	—@—
Middling	11¼@12¾

The following summary, copied from the New Orleans Price Current, of 21st inst., furnishes the annexed statement of the week's business: The week opened with rather more general activity than we had occasion to notice for some time past, as the business included somewhat more extended operations in several articles of Western Produce, besides a continued demand for Cotton, Sugar and Molasses. Within the past few days, however, the operations in Cotton have been somewhat checked by the full prices claimed, and an unfavorable assortment, besides which the tenor of the late European advices seems to have inclined buyers generally to await more full particulars.....On Wednesday four days later European advices were received, having been brought to New York by the steamer City of Washington, from Liverpool, 5th inst. The Cotton market is reported dull, though without material change in prices, some circulars still quoting Middling Orleans at 7d. while others note a decline of 1-16d. The Manchester advices were very favorable, but the public funds had been unfavorably affected by the position of affairs between Austria, Italy etc.....The river is 8 feet 6 inches below high-water mark.....Our semi-weekly report closed upon a good enquiry, though with transactions but to a moderate extent, as full prices were generally claimed, while the market presented but a poor assortment. The sales of the first three days of the week were 26,500 bales. On Wednesday the market opened within moderate enquiry, and the tenor of the City of Washington's advices, received in the forenoon, not being of a character to aid the demand barely 4000 were disposed of. The next two days, buyers waiting further European advices, but little business was done, and the sales scarcely reached 5,500 bales, making a total for the week of 36,000 bales. In prices we have no marked change to notice within the past few days, and repeat the quotations given in our last report. We may remark, however, that the comparative scarcity of clean Cottons, causing from Strict Middling up, compels buyers to pay very full prices for them, while the abundance of the lower grades makes the market easy for those who are disposed to purchase mixed lots, especially those running low down into the dirty orderies, which are exceedingly dimunished, with an accumulating stock. Total receipts of the week 56,528 bales.

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to about 11,000 hhds.; we quote for inferior and refining, 4@5; common to good common, 5¼@5½; fair to fully fair, 5¾@6¼; prime to choice, 6¾@7¾; centrifugal and clarified, 7@8; Refined, 9¼@— ₱ lb.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 15,500 bbls; the quotations being for inferior and fermenting, 29@31; prime to choice, 32@33; hf-bbls. 34@36c ₱ gallon.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs, planters, 5@5½; Leaf, inferior to common, 0@6½, fair, 7@7½, fine, 8@8½, choice heavy and light, 9@10c ₱ lb.

FLOUR.—The sales of the week have reached about 24,000 bbls. at $4 70@4 75 for unbranded; $5 25 for superfine; $5 50@5 60 for extra; and $6 75 for good to choice extra.

GRAIN.—The supply of Corn offering has increased, with a dull market—prices ranging from $1 00@$1 10 ₱ bushel for yellow and white. Oats sell at 75@70 and 70c ₱ bushel, for good to prime old St. Louis.

PORK.—The transactions in Mess have been at $18@18 25, and rumps at $13 ₱ bbl.

BEEF.—The market is very dull at $11 for Mess, and $8 ₱ bbl for Prime.

BACON.—Sales at for shoulders 7@7¼, ribbed sides 9@9¼, clear sides 9¾@10c¼, and sugar-cured hams at 12½c ₱ lb.

LARD.—We quote at 10@10¾, for inferior to good No. 1, 11¼@11¾ for prime, and 12½c. ₱ lb in kegs.

BUTTER.—Western, 0@13½; Roll, 10@20c ₱ lb.

COFFEE.—We quote 10¾@11c for fair, 11¼ for good fair, 11¾ for prime.

LIVE STOCK.—The supply is ample, and the market easy. We quote: Beef—Western, 7@10c, Texas, $13@40, according to quality; calves and yearlings, $6@18; Hogs 7½@8c ₱ lb; Sheep $3@6; Cows $30@85 ₱ head.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

CERTIFICATES OF THE UNIVERSAL SUCCESS OF THESE MACHINES in this State have been published, and of

OVER 500 SOLD IN THIS REGION,

The undersigned is not aware that any is out of repair.

SINGER'S FAMILY AND PLANTATION MACHINE combined, cannot be excelled for fine work, and sews with equal facility a leather trace, and is WARRANTED THREE YEARS, even in the charge of negroes.

SEWING MACHINE PREMIUMS.

The fact that the American Institute, and many leading State Fairs have at different times awarded the FIRST PREMIUM to the Avery Sewing Machine, and to other worthless Sewing Machines, when in competition with all the best Sewing Machines, proves that the decision of a Committee of Examiners is no evidence of the superiority of a Sewing Machine. For this reason, I. M. Singer & Co. have not recently contended for the Premium at a Fair, nor have they authorized their agents to do so, but in a very few instances the agents have exhibited the Machines and have been successful.

The First Premium of the State of New York

WAS

AWARDED TO SINGER'S SEWING MACHINE,

At the State Fair in Syracuse,

IN OCTOBER, 1858.

There has not been a State Fair in Albany for five years. The FIRST PREMIUM was also awarded to Singer's Machine at the late Fair at Memphis, Tennessee.

The FIRST PREMIUMS awarded to Singer's Machine at the American Institute, at the Exposition Universal in Paris, and the leading Mechanical Associations in the United States, are on exhibition at 38 Camp street.

Mention is not made of these Premiums as evidence of the superiority of the Singer Machine, but to prevent the public from being deceived by the false statements of the agents of other machines.

The ONLY RELIABLE EVIDENCE OF THE SUCCESS of Sewing Machines is the CERTIFICATES OF THOSE WHO USE THEM.

CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

Piermont Valley, Nov. 21, 1858.

Mr. Editor: If you think the enclosed rhyme worthy of a place, please give it a place in the "Children's Column" of your excellent paper.

This little sister was walking with her teacher one day, when she made the reply to his question, which he thinks should be carefully treasured in better verse.

A. E. H.

MITTIE'S LOVE.

"God and my mother best."

A tender child of Dixie, with eloquent eyes,
As deeply blue as our Southern skies—
Rosy her lips, and her smile as gay,
As the sunbeams bright on a summer day,
Her laugh full of music, her form full of grace,
And happiness lends its sweet charms to her face,
Her heart is as light and as free from care,
As fleecy is the inhabitants of air.

One day little Mittie was bounding along,
Her glad voice singing, like mock-bird's song,
Her silken curls waved in the soft summer air,
A gem of her dressed or a vision more fair?
I spoke then in jest to the little maid,
"Whom do you love, Miss Mattie?" I said,
"Most of all, good," the maiden reply;
"But God and my mother the best love I."

A MISSAID LETTER.

Elmira, June 1858.

My Dear David: From which I owed you a letter, but could not find time to fill it out, from the constant sight-seeing and other obligations. But nevertheless my mind was in anticipation of the classical objects which would interest you in your collegiate course of studies, and throw a charm around them, and give a fresh impetus to your pursuit of knowledge in the vast field which is opening before you of science and literature.

To look upon the magnificent ruins of that once beautiful city of Athens, like a gem from the Ocean, of purity and splendor, which once gave laws to literature, and the fine arts—and see the relics of those gorgeous temples, still lingering in the perfection of architectural beauty and [illegible] of years have rolled over them, leaves an impression upon the mind of the [illegible] which the wide world still acknowledges has never been surpassed.

Mr. Athens, the Eye of Greece, Mother of Art
[illegible]

[illegible] proeminent, though now desolate; yet there [illegible] clad with its natural beauties, as when [illegible] Poets caught their inspiration upon its [illegible], or quaffed the purest of Helicon's clear stream. The air is as pure as when the eloquence of Demosthenes was [illegible] its undulating breezes.

[illegible] I should like to have stood with you upon [illegible] hills to look around upon the magnificent pros-

See the Olive grove
[illegible] where the little Bird,
[illegible] their warbling song the summer long,
[illegible] hill, the vapor, with the sound
Of the [illegible] waters of Ilyssus roll
[illegible] "There Ilissus rolls
[illegible] within its walls."

We would be surprised to see the dry bed of that famous river, looking now as if it could never have been [illegible] of poetic and imagery, of genius the most [illegible] in the world. But there it was before our eyes, [illegible] angelic temple of Jupiter Olympus, whose [illegible] stands in stately grandeur, models of elo- [illegible] beauty for ages still to come, to admire the [illegible] and splendor of their de- [illegible] walked beneath the sculptured architrave, [illegible] and resolved with the breath of flowers, which [illegible] their native beauty and wildness crept along the [illegible] pavement, and wreathed the crumbling pedestals [illegible] lofty columns with their lovely petals, while the [illegible] breeze crept along, and in its dying cadence chaunted a mournful requiem over departed greatness.

The thought of the glory, of such a temple, where the light of [illegible] shone radiant with intellectual beauty, and where thousands assembled capable of appreciating the [illegible] of art which surrounded them, placing them [illegible] all nations, the earth by their intelligence and [illegible] cultivation, with a language so polished and re- [illegible] the most fastidious would detect the least [illegible] in its elegant idiom.

It would [illegible] to the lovers of Greece acquiring a purity [illegible] resembling the original, more [illegible] taught in the present day in the most re- [illegible] University of the world; and, we were informed, [illegible] there from various portions of the earth [illegible]

The [illegible] Greeks, it is said, evince a great thirst for knowledge and are quick to learn. The boys have an early [illegible] development, but there is no profes- [illegible] talents.

[illegible] acts like an incubus upon their [illegible]

I should like you to have looked upon [illegible] genius, bursting upon the [illegible] their relics! and stood upon [illegible] where Demosthenes addressed the po- [illegible] the Athenians, and chained them by his ap- [illegible] and walked in the academic schools [illegible] Socrates, where multitudes once listened to [illegible] The Valley is still blest with perpetual [illegible] olive throws its soft shadows over its [illegible] fragrant with the pearl, while the bold out- [illegible] rounding hills, swell upon its ambient air [illegible] reflecting the light of heaven upon [illegible] lovely forms of poetic beauty in those charming soil- [illegible] of [illegible] inspiration.

[illegible] the youth of our own loved country! [illegible] encourage and inspire them with a love of [illegible] and intellectual elevation. Every object of [illegible] within their grasp, and the wide field is open [illegible] to the highest offices of state. But the love [illegible] of knowledge alone is its own reward, and will amply re- [illegible] all efforts to acquire it.

[illegible] ruins of Athens are few, but those few wreathed [illegible] and architectural beauty, and like [illegible] eloquence, stand monuments of un- [illegible] while time shall last.

[illegible] love of Grecian literature, will be inspired by [illegible] with its country, poets, philosophers, orators and [illegible] while you are young.

LETTER FROM A LITTLE BOY.

Dear Mr. Editor: I have just read to me the "Children's Column," and was so much pleased, I thought I would get her to write you a little letter for me. I am a little boy, but I can spell some. I am a little [illegible] years old; I have no brothers or sisters. My [illegible] Jemmy Lee, is gone to live with God and [illegible] I try to be a good boy, so that when I die I will go to God too. I have no good grandmamma to [illegible] me now. She is with the angels too. But I have [illegible] several times. THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

From a Young Lady in Kentucky.

The following letter is beautiful in penmanship, pleasant to read, and brings before the fancy the vision of a beautiful face. As to Magazines, the Home Circle first. Harper is worth forty of Peterson. Send us the "Bible Questions."

Walnut Grove, Caldwell Co., Ky., Dec. 28, 1858.

Dear Mr. Gillespie:—Allow me to say a few words about your charming paper. Every Saturday night we send to the office for it; and oh! with what avidity do we read it. I would rather, far, read it than the Ledger or Peterson; because it contains something worth reading.

Which, Mr. Editor, of the two magazines, Peterson's or Harper's, do you consider the best for young ladies to read?

I do wish so much that you could spare room in your paper for some "Bible Questions." There is nothing I delight in more than to search the answers. If I can get some subscribers for the Advocate, I will send their names, (and money too.)

Pardon this intrusion on your time, and consider me as ever your friend.

Lulie Benton.

In Anecdote of Webster.

"The private path, the secret acts of man,
If noble, far the noblest of their lives."

Mr. Webster was fortunate in those nearest relations which develop, feed, and make the soul glad all its days. A father of the true Puritan stock, strong in resolution, firm in purpose, but loving and tender in disposition, his name was never mentioned by his distinguished son but with a gush of deep emotion. His mother was the worthy wife of such a husband.

Mr. Webster married the woman he loved, and the twenty years which he lived with her brought him to the meridian of his greatness. An anecdote is current on this subject, which is not recorded in his books. Mr. Webster was becoming intimate with Miss Grace Fletcher, when the skein of silk getting into a knot Mr. Webster assisted in unravelling the snarl—then looking up to Miss Grace, he said: "We have untied a knot, don't you think we could tie one?"—Grace was a little embarrassed, said not a word, but in the course of a few minutes, she tied a knot in a piece of tape and handed it to Mr. Webster. This piece of tape, the thread of his domestic joys, was found after the death of Mr. Webster, preserved as one of his most precious relics.

Important to Housekeepers.

How to keep Meat from spoiling.—At this season of the year when persons are putting up their meat, it frequently happens that a sudden change in the weather, or other causes, gives a tendency to the meat to become tainted. This may be completely remedied by taking a quart of water and pouring into it two or three tablespoonsfull of Darby's Prophylactic Fluid, which may be had at any drug store, and then, after washing the meat in pure water, wash the affected parts with the prepartion well. After using the fluid thoroughly, the meat must be again rinsed in pure cold water. If the meat is badly tainted, a larger quantity of the fluid to the same quantity of water should be used.

To housekeepers this information will be very valuable for more purposes than to prevent their meat from spoiling. It will apply to removing the rancidity from butter and lard, with the same result, taking pains to have the fluid come in contact with every portion of the tainted article. We have frequently tried this simple plan ourselves, and known others to try it, and have never known it to fail. It entirely removes all bad odor, and renders the meat as sweet and solid as ever it was.

HUMOROUS.

Oriental Wit.

A young man going on a journey entrusted a hundred denars to an old man. When he came back, the old man denied having had any money deposited with him, and he was had up before the Khazee.

"Where were you, young man, when you delivered this money?"

"Under a tree."

"Take my seal and summon the tree," said the Judge. "Go, young man, and tell the tree to come hither, and the tree will obey when you show it my seal."

The young man went in wonder. After he had been gone for some time, the khazee said to the old man:

"He is long—do you think he has got there yet?"

"No," said the old man, "it is at some distance; he has not got there yet?"

"How knowest thou, old man," cried the khazee, "where that tree is?"

The young man returned, and said the tree would not come.

"He has been here, young man, and given his evidence, the money is thine."

A Smart Boy.

"George, what does C A T spell?"

"Don' know, sir."

"What does your mother keep to catch mice?"

"Trap, sir."

"No, no, what animal is very fond of milk?"

"A baby, sir."

"You dance, what was it scratched your sister's face?"

"My nails, sir."

"I am out of patience. There, do you see that animal on the fence?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then tell me what C-a-t spells?"

"Kitten, sir."

This may be old, but we clip it on account of a remark it elicited from a legal friend of ours. "That boy," said he, "if he lives, will make a splendid witness."

Good.

During a recent trial at Auburn, the following occurred to vary the monotony of the proceedings.

Among the witnesses was one, as verdant a specimen of humanity as one would wish to meet with. After a severe cross-examination, the counsel for the Government paused and then putting on a look of severity, and an ominous shake of the head, exclaimed:

"Mr. Witness, has not an effort been made to induce you to tell a different story?"

"A different story from I have told, sir?"

"That is what I mean."

"Yes, sir; several persons have tried to get me to tell a differeot story from what I have told, but they couldo't.

"Now, sir, upon your oath, I wish to know who those persons are."

"Weal, I guess you've tried 'bout as hard as any of them."

The witness was dismissed, while judge, jury and spectators indulged in a hearty laugh.

Good Story.

The following story is told of Jemmy Maher, who has so long been the gardener of the Presidential mansion in Washington: The President had heard rumors that Jemmy was accustomed to get drunk, and be uncivil to the visitors at the White House; so one bright morning he summoned him into his presence, to receive his dismissal. "Jemmy," said the President, "I hear bad stories about you. It is said you are constantly drunk and uncivil to visitors." Jemmy was puzzled for a reply—at last he said: "Mr. President, be dad, I hear much worse stories about you, but do you think I believe them? No, by the powers, I know they are lies."

Unfortunate.

One of our leading Presbyterian clergymen, while visiting a brother minister at Patterson on Tuesday last, for the purpose of officiating in his pulpit on that evening, had his overcoat and shawl stolen from the hall of the residence of his fellow-preacher, while the family were partaking of their evening meal. In the pocket of the coat were four sermons—one of which the gentleman designed delivering on that evening—but having lost them he was obliged to speak extemporaneously, and, of course, under a disadvantage. It is hoped that the thief will read the discourses, and so profit by them as to hereafter obtain his clothing in a more honest manner. [Newark Daily Advertiser.

OBITUARIES.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. ELIZABETH, wife of Rev. W. C. Mathews, died in her 33d year, on Christmas eve last, in Choctaw county, Mississippi. She embraced religion, and joined the Methodist Church in early life. From that time until the day of her death, she was an exemplary Christian and devoted follower of that "precious Jesus" whose name she loved so well to speak, and whose goodness to praise, when her soul was filled with His heavenly love. On that beautiful evening, just as the sun went down, her happy, precious soul left its sick tenement of clay, for climes where the sun never sets and where death never comes. We love thee, sweet sister; but, we will not grieve after thee; we only hope to go where thou hast gone. All is well with thee; but, alas, that little cottage in which a few days ago all was peace and gladness, is overshadowed now in gloom—an affectionate mother, a kind wife, is gone; gone, forever. A deeply afflicted husband and eight little children, are left to mourn their loss.

W. H. Crawford.

CULLINAS HANNAH, was borne in Blount county, Tennessee, September 9, 1797. In 1826, he was happily converted to the Christian religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church; of which he lived a consistent member until God took him from the Church Militant to the Church Triumphant. At an early age he married and emigrated to Pickens county, Alabama, and was one of Pickens' oldest and best citizens. Near the close of November last, he received an injury from a fall, while attending to some business about his cotton screw; and, after lingering 19 days from the effects of that fall, he departed this life in great peace, December 14, 1858, in the 61st year of his age, shouting Glory to God. Thus passed away from the scenes of this life, brother Hannah, a man of faith and Christian piety, leaving a wife, 14 children and a large circle of relations and friends to mourn his loss. As a citizen, brother Hannah, was quiet, neighborly, and ever the supporter of the public order and public morals. As a husband and father, he was kind and affectionate. As a man he was honored and respected, and dying, he gave earth for heaven. May we, also be ready.

A. J. Coleman.

MRS. MARY ANN C., wife of James G. Ussery, in her fortieth year, died in Greeo county, Alahama, on the 28th of December 1859. The deceased was a daughter of John and Elizabeth Fleet—was born in Halifax county Virginia, where she was raised, and where she married in October 1838; in 1840 she left her native country, and moved to Hardimon county Tennessee. Two years after she came to this country, in which she remained with the exception of two years (in Tuskalnosa) up to the day of her death. At the age of about 17 years she was awakened to a sense of being a sinner—and by repentance toward God and the exercise of faith in Jesus, she was adopted into the family of the Elect of God's children, shortly after which she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at New Hope in her native country, in which she remained an acceptable and orderly member until called from works to her reward. She has left a husband, two children, and a large circle of friends to weep over her decease. But why weep? for while they mourn and sorrow she exults and rejoices, being redeemed—and fully beyond their reach—and above the ravages of time, and chance, and change.

I. G. Smith.

JOSEPH BARKSDALE, departed this life in great peace, in Holmes county, Mississippi, on the 27th of November 1858. Brother Barksdale was born in Georgia in 1802, and moved to this State at an early date; obtained religion some twenty years ago, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and lived a devoted follower of Christ. At all times brother Barksdale desired to let his light shine, that others seeing his good works might be constructed to glorify his Heavenly Father. All that know him respected and loved him. Although he was the subject of great afflictions for many years, yet he did not murmur. He endured all, as seeing Him that is invisible. As a Christian he was humble and devoted, in his disposition he seemed to feel that he felt himself the least of all. As a neighbor he was kind and charitable. As a citizen he was peaceful and patriotic. In his hours of greatest suffering, the grace of God was sufficient. The religion which had so long been his solace sustained him when the final trial came. When told that he must die, no dread alarms terrified his soul. Calling his wife and children around him like the patriarch of old, he gave to each his parting blessing. Thus died a beloved husband, an affectionate father and kind brother—in the full triumph of a living faith—in the 57th year of his age. He leaves a disconsolate wife and nine children with many friends to mourn his loss. But we sorrow not as those who have no hope. Our loss is his eternal gain, who can sincerely say let us die the death of the righteous and let our last end be like his.

James G. Carlisle.

WILLIAM YARBOROUGH, Sen., died on the 2d of January, 1859, at his residence on Pearl river, Marion county, Mississippi. Brother Yarborough was born on the 19th of April, 1788. When a child his father emigrated from South Carolina to Georgia where he lived there until he was grown and married. He married Rebecca Clark in 1812; in 1818 he removed to Marion county, Mississippi. In 1826, or about that time, he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and embraced religion. He lived and died a Methodist. He had for a year or two been a sufferer, and was confined to his bed several weeks before his death; and oh, the intense suffering of those long days of his illness, time will never erase from the memory of those who were with him while he was confined; but he bore it all patiently. He often talked to his friends and wife about dying; and bade them prepare for death; he died in the full triumph of faith, and was carried away to the glory land. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, they rest from their labor, and their works do follow them. The Lord bless his disconsolate, and deeply afflicted wife.

H. T. Lewis, P. C.

DR. JOHN A. WHETSTONE died at his residence, Ashburn, near Bastrop, Morehouse Parish, La., December 0th, 1858, aged 55 years. He was born in Orangeburg District, S. C., and removed to Alabama with his parents, and graduated in the Medical School of New York in 1824. He was engaged in a large practice in Autauga county, Ala., for many years; and removed to this parish in 1853. He had been a member of the Church and a professor of religion for many years. For several years he had license to preach, and stood fair in the estimation of his brethren of the quarterly conference. Dr. Whetstone was no ordinary man. He made his mark in every community in which he lived. His loss will be severely felt in this community and parish, which need the aid of ardent and energetic minds to build up their interests and carry out their enterprises of usefulness. In his feelings he was remarkably charitable. He never spoke ill of nay one. Before the fatal relapse which marked his illness, he told his wife that he had strictly scrutinized his condition, and he believed if God should call him away, he should be ready for the summons. The attendance on his funeral was the largest ever known in this country. The Masons of several Lodges turned out, and did worthy honors to their deceased and distinguished brother. He leaves a large family to deplore his loss. May the God of the widow, and the father of the fatherless, be their protector and friend!

H. B. Price.

JOHN W. ALLEN, of Russell county, Alabama, died at his residence last Sabbath evening, January 2d, 1859, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. For about twelve months he has been affected with a malignant tumor on the neck; which, in connection with diseased liver and kidneys, from which he suffered for a number of years, caused his death. For two weeks previous to his death, his brain and organs of speech were paralyzed—thus he was rendered insensible to his sufferings; and we, his friends, desired the glorious testimonies of the bright immortality into which his spirit was ushering; unconscious, not permitted to give testimony to that trying hour, of victory over death; yet, his godly life, the pure Christian principles which ever marked his paths, give unmistakable assurance of his perfect triumph and safety in that eternal kingdom of happiness, provided for the righteous. He was a man of "clean hands and a pure heart, who lifted not his soul up to vanity." Christian humility dwelt on his brow. He was a Christian all his life. The good of others was ever his aim. The poor and afflicted in him ever had a good friend. All movements for doing good, disseminating Christianity, shared liberally of his means. He had more than ordinary intellect, yet no confidence in self—his trust was ever in God. In consequence of feeble health all his life, he was denied extended action; yet few have lived who so invariably impressed upon the minds of all with whom he came in contact the truths of Christianity and their great importance. To suffer God's will was his destiny. O, that we might all learn this! and have no other aim save its accomplishment. How fleeting time—life, a few years. My grandfather—my father—and now, my uncle.

A. W. Allen.

A HAPPY DEATH.

MRS. CAROLINE B. GROCE, consort of Dr. B. W. Groce, at the residence of her husband in Talladega county, Alabama, fell asleep, sweetly reposing in the arms of her Savior, Wednesday, 9 oclock, A. M., 22d December, 1858. She obtained religion some seventeen months previous to her death, evincing in life that faith in God, "which sweetly works by love, and purifies the heart;" enabling her to rejoice amid the wasting of that most deceptive disease (consumption.) Her sufferings were painfully protracted; four months she was confined to her bed, yet she murmured not, but with patience and resignation, committed herself into the hand of Him who doeth all things well. Being often asked by her husband about her religious state, her reply was: my confidence is in the Savior, my trust is where it has always been. Some two months before her demise, (at night) thinking it would be her last, she said it was to her the most precious season ever enjoyed, save one, soon after her conversion, so signally memorable for the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit. Her religion was that of the Bible, not selfish, but generous and diffusive; pervading the family circle, where like a nucleus, she shone with the brightest luster. Nor did her full heart find there room sufficient for its warm expansions, but exhorted visiting friends to be faithful, who deemed it a privilege to wait about that couch around which the angel of mercy kept such a ceaseless watch. And although death, like a treasure-seeking angel was there, still her peace, like the gentle flowing of a river, was onward, deepening and widening to its course to the haven of Eternal Life. And her righteousness as the waves of the sea; wave coursing wave, bearing pious admonitions beyond home to other friends, far from the scenes then passing; exhorting them to meet her in Heaven. As she neared the waters of Jordan, her children were assembled, each to receive a mother's dying blessing, requested their father to tell them, when old enough to appreciate it, that their mother's last prayers were for them. (What an incentive to piety in children!) Let the example be followed by all mothers. In that solemn hour, silence seemed to reign, except disturbed by feelings too big for utterance. For she could not speak, but soon revived, and with a voice stronger than for weeks before exclaimed, with triumphant language, thank the Lord, my sight is failing, I am losing sight of this world, and will soon be freed from all my sufferings. She then said to her fond father, who stood by with deep emotion, "my last breath shall be spent in prayer for you;" then soon breathed her last. Think what a prayer that was! How close to the throne of grace; how near the blessed Savior; how near the bliss of Heaven; with what fervor was that petition offered?—On whom shall the blessing rest? May not father, husband, and children, share the blessings thus invoked, though one so tender babe; but why weep—let tears be dried, and hushed be the rising sigh; for them a mother prayed, a Savior died, and feels for them more than a mother's care, sweetly blended with power omnipotent to save; in which power, their mother so firmly trusted; for "her delight was in the law of the Lord, and to His law did she meditate day and night." Humility seemed a prominent trait in the character of Sister Groce: in meekness, in modesty, in retiring unassuming gentleness, she set before her friends a noble example. Calm and composed when the shadows of death began to thicken around her. Thus her sun of life went down at noon day, in the 35th year of her age, in the midst of usefulness, cares and responsibilities of a family, in whom she felt an interest such as pious mothers alone can feel. But she is gone to the home of the blessed, where husband, children, and friends, may rejoin her society, never more to be separated. How full of comfort to the stricken heart, for in Heaven there is no sin, no death, nor sorrow, nor weeping there, but joy and gladness in the presence of the Lamb, forever and ever: "where the righteous will shine as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father." And while the tear of sympathy falls, we trust that weeping kindred and friends will be faithful unto death, for of such Christ says, "they shall be mine when I make up my jewels."

PULPIT PROPRIETY.

...ery place and every relation has its proprieties; ...consequently, may have its improprieties. The pul... ...ers no exception. And first, we should say, that ...ty and Christian courtesy are imperatively de... ...ed in the pulpit. This, all will admit. But the ...llance is not so universal as the requisition.

...r examples: minister of good report among the ...ul of his congregation, asks a brother to preach in ...pit. How does the strange brother sometimes ...e this courtesy? He tells the congregation that he ...g to preach the truth, that they shall hear the truth ...ow. The emphasized way in which he is careful to ...his leaves the impression that it is the speaker's he... ...that the pastor of the Church is in the habit of ...ching something else rather than the truth—that ...ople have not been faithfully dealt with. Again, ...k this smacks quite too much of a self-righteous ...t that he, by eminence, is going to speak the truth; ...preachers, peradventure, have been afraid to say ...plain terms the truth of God. It may be, they ...been so anxious to win the hubble of reputation ...certain class, that they have "sweetened the ...ext to suit the diner's taste." But this man, honest ...and truth loving soul, is going to do no such un... ...dering. No, no! he is going to speak the truth. ...another example of what we regard as an impro... ...The preacher in such cases, (nearly always a ...e) tells the audience that he is going to give them ...ruit without varnish or trimming; that he will not ...all variegated rainbows, flowery meads, verdant ...sparkling rills, alpine scenery or gorgeous sunsets, ...nothing of the kind; but plain hoe-cake and ...and greens. Away with "the feast of reason and ...ow of soul," his sober and unsophisticated mind ...abide or utter anything so worldly, light and ...

SINS OF THE PRESS.

MR. EDITOR:—I was glad to notice in your last paper a rebuke of a very common sin of the day—bitterness on the part of editors and correspondents of religious papers. It is a great stumbling-block in the way of observant worldly men, to see how uncharitably Christian brethren belabor each other. "The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle and patient towards all men." Of course the greatest charge that can be brought against this species of writing is, that it is contrary to the will and word of God and the sweet spirit of the Gospel. But they who practice it should also know that it does not advance their ends, nor do any good to anybody, to say nothing of the absolute harm effected by causing the world to scoff at Christian professions, by embittering the breast whence it flows, and by exasperating him at whom it is aimed. If we bite and devour each other, how dwelleth the love of God in us? All this we may say, and not forbid a righteous indignation and a manly, brave rebuke of sin and error.

Apropos to the subject, suffer me to speak of some other sins, towards which our papers and preachers, (by pen and palpit) are drifting, viz: Slang and Puffery. I will venture the assertion, that out of the original matter in the last quarter's various issues of the Church South, I could cull several scores of slang phrases, and pet words, (distinguished by inverted commas,) which disfigure the effusions of our brethren, and weaken their strength.

Puffery and puffing is another grievance which demand abatement. Really, dear brother, if you will just give your attention to the wholesale manner in which we tickle each other—praise each other's looks—each other's labors—each other's everything that can be praised; how we puff every new book, and trumpet to the world the name of every body that does a little something for us; you will be led to ask yourself whether we have not degenerated from the good old Wesleyan Methodist Church, into a Mutual Admiration Society. How can we do these things in the face of God's word, which tells us only to seek that honor which cometh from God; not to let our left hand know what our right hand doeth; that a little child is greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven; and, that we must not resemble the Gentiles in the exercise of lordship, but he that would be greatest among us, must be servant of all. A little child, it is said, once strayed into a cemetery, where, as is common, there were no epitaphs to be seen but flattering ones; thereupon the child would know "where the bad people were buried?" The reader of our Church papers might inquire with equal pertinence, whether there be any small men in the Church South, since all of us, by our own accounts, are Sons of Anak. Dear brother, suffer me to warn my brethren—and now, ere it be too late, bid them beware of downrigh toadyism. If we do not correct this thing, there will presently be nobody in our Church, but Dr. Johnson and "Bozzy."

While "my hand is in,"—I give you this specimen of the second sin above alluded to—let me mention one more sin, rather error, which is becoming common—a parade of learning for learning's sake. Mr. Wesley tells us that he could have written much more elogantly than he did, but he dared not do so. A great many of our writers are wasting their energies by writing over the heads of a majority of the Church. Pedantry in not greatness; nor is it necessary for us to get above the clouds to show to the world that we have left the mud of bad grammar, and the verbal awkwardness of our early days.

The Methodist Church, it is everywhere acknowledged, has laid aside her homespun dress. But it is not necessary, to convince the world of that fact, that we should play the fop, and assume ruffles and diamonds. Methodism can never be a dandy. The two do not agree; and when Methodism reaches that point, it will cease to be Methodism. If it would not seem invidious and unkind, I could very soon point you to literary labors among us that do no good; and that serve no end save a display of authorship, and announcement of the fact that their authors are Latinists, Grecians and Philosophers; if the use of "receptivity," "subjectivity," "objectivity," with occasional Latin and Greek phrases (used without necessity,) make Latinists, Grecians and Philosophers. We need among us now, some friendly but brave satirist to bring us to common sense, and with firm hand show us ourselves as others see us. Write me down a croaker, if you will. I do, nevertheless, assert that the signs of the times are ominous. God grant, though He may chasten us sore, not to give us over unto death. It is not yet too late to mend our ways, and search for the old paths. There is other work for the Methodist Church to do, besides that of making to herself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness. NATHAN.

UNIVERSALISM IN NEW ORLEANS.

AT THE close of a letter about the state of things in New Orleans, a correspondent of the Christian Advocate thus speaks in regard to the Universalists:

"Universalism, in the shape of a church organization, was planted at New Orleans about twenty-five years ago by the Rev. Theodoro Clapp. He was the successor of Larned as pastor of the First, and at the time, the only Presbyterian Church of the city; a young man fresh from Andover, and regularly graduated in the Calvinistic theology. In a few years his opinions underwent a change, and he broke off from the Presbyterians, taking with him a considerable number of followers; and settled down as the head and pastor of an independent congregation. Three years ago Mr. Clapp retired from his pastorate, on account of ill health, and resides in Louisville, Ky. The congregation is now administered to by a young divine from New England. During these long years, in which evangelical churches have multiplied greatly, this Universalist Church seems to have gained but little ground. The congregation is not as large as in former years, and there are no indications of aggressive life. Compared with its condition and prospects ten years ago, the present exhibits more decline than progress. This solitary congregation is the sole exponent of the Unitarians and Universalits in the city."

ROMAN LAWS ON BAPTISM.

THE following are, according to the Univers, the Roman laws which, in the eyes of the Pope, justify the abduction of young Mortara. Here is the abstract of them: "First, Interdiction to Christians to baptize the children of Jews without the consent of their parents, with the exception of the case in which the child is evidently in danger of death. Second, Express recommendations to Christians not to enter as servants into Jewish families. Similar recommendations to Jews not to employ Christians in their service, and above all not to entrust Christian women with their children. Third, When, in spite of these precautions, it happens that a child belonging to a Jewish family has been validly baptized, there is an obligation to protect the faith of that child, and for that purpose to carry it away from its parents, should they not consent to its being brought up in the Christian religion."

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI—No. VII.

Original Baptist Church.

MR. EDITOR: Our three refugees all had families—and their forced separation from wives and children, was inexpressibly painful to the hearts of husbands and fathers, but no other alternative promised them any security; and so, committing their all to the care of God, they bowed to their fate. Traveler's bread was somehow prepared by a union of cornmeal and bear-oil, and other articles were added, such as were indispensable on their long and perilous journey through the various Indian tribes inhabiting the vast region between the Natchez country and Georgia.

But an unexpected difficulty sprang up. Not a man could be found willing to risk the penalty, of "aiding and abetting" in the escape of the refugees. Their absence from home a single day or night, might throw suspicion on them and lead to disastrous consequences; and the question was debated with increased anxiety, "who will take their supplies to their place of concealment on Bayou Pierre?" The question was answered. There lived in the vicinity a noble hearted and during woman by the name of Chloe Holt, who acted in the capacity of accoucheuress for the settlement, and was every way suitable for such an adventure as was now on foot. She rather tauntingly said, if the men of the neighborhood were so faint-hearted that not one of them could be prevailed upon to take Dick Curtis and his companions in exile their promised supplies, in order to give them a chance to escape from the clutches of their relentless persecutors, if they would furnish her with a good horse, surmounted with a man's saddle she would go in spite of the Spaniards.

They were glad to avail themselves of her generous offer, and the horse was accordingly brought and saddled as she desired.

All things being ready, she made her appearance attired as a man, and mounting the horse in keeping with his and her equipment, she boldly dashed off.

The journey was hastily and successfully made. No one molested "Aunt Chloe," and that adventure was her boast to the close of her life.

If any one will show me her grave, I will have a monument erected thereon, to perpetuate her name and her noble deed to generations yet unborn.

Whoever may in future write the history of the Baptist Church in Mississippi, let them not neglect to make honorable mention of Chloe Holt. "Peace to your ashes," old friend, wherever they rest!

The 23d of August, 1795, the day on which Mr. Curtis left his home on Coles-creek, was a dark day to the little church in the wilderness. And how dark to those desolate and weeping children! And how mysterious did all appear to the exiled refugees! But the hand of God was in all this, as we shall presently see.

Onward the exiles journeyed—fording or swimming the smaller streams, and making rafts of logs to ferry themselves over the larger rivers—until they arrived in the white settlements north east of the Indian country. In process of time they got to the former home of Mr. Curtis, on Great Pee Dee, in South Carolina, where they remained over two years.

Here their religious privileges were unrestricted, and in spiritual matters they passed off the time profitably to themselves and to others. While there, Mr. Curtis was regularly ordained by Elders Benjamin, Moseley and Mathew McCullans, and was duly empowered, when he should be permitted to return to the Natchez country, to constitute a Baptist Church according to the "faith and order" of that denomination.

In the meantime, the Natchez District was claimed as belonging to the United States, and Colonel Elliot had been sent on by the General Government, to enforce our claim, by negotiation, if possible—if not, by arms.

After many vexatious delays, he had to assume a belligerent attitude before the Spanish Commandant would yield. But early on the morning of the 30th of March, 1798, the Fort at Natchez was evacuated; and the same day, the Americans took possession of the works.

While this much desired event was verging to maturity, our Baptist friends were not idle spectators. They had re-commenced their meetings under the lead of John and Jacob Stampley, Hargail and others. They had written to the exiles in South Carolina to come home; and expectation was on tip-toe to hail their arrival. A rude church had already been erected in Stampley's Settlement, and furnished with pulpit and seats. It was Saturday night, and Messrs. Curtis, Hamberlin and De Alvo, were within half a day's ride of home. At early dawn they resumed their journey—thinking it no harm to travel a little on Sunday under such circumstances. Mr. Curtis had not got home before he fell in with cheerful companies of former acquaintances on their way to "the house of prayer." They assured him that he would not find his wife and children at home, for they were then on their way to church; so he turned with the company towards the place of worship.

When they arrived at the church, Pattie, as he called Mrs. Curtis, had not yet come, but he was assured that they all were well, and as the hour for preaching had come, they requested him to go immediately into the pulpit and preach them a sermon. While he was turning to his hymn and text, behind the book-board, his wife came in unobserved by him. The inconsiderate people had given her no intimation of the presence of her long exiled husband. When he rose up, she gazed at the pulpit to see who was going to officiate, and seeing it was her own beloved, long lost, but now restored husband, it was more than her womanly heart could endure in silence. She shrieked and swooned away, and was borne from the house in an unconscious state. Cold ablutions were resorted to, but the warm embrace and soothing voice of her husband soon quieted her nerves. All returned to the church, and Elder Curtis, as we shall henceforth call him, preached an appropriate and feeling sermon. The dark and menacing clouds of persecution had now passed away. All was light, and love and joy, in that little Protestant brotherhood.

I shall have to ask the indulgence of one more number, before I leave these original Mississippi Baptists. Yours affectionately, J. G. JONES.

DEFINING.

THE Christian Advocate and Journal says: The Western Christian Advocate seems mystified at our late remark that our papers "have come practically on to the ground of this paper; holding still to their theoretical differences, they all now recognize as practically best the course we have all long advocated." We doubt whether many of our readers have mistaken our obvious meaning. We said expressly that the papers "hold still their theoretical differences" from us, but "recognize as practically best" the Restrictive Rule process, for which we have all along contended, as the only one admissible for a new term of membership. This fact is now patent in all our General Conference papers; we think, and it is all we asserted. The discussion of what precise measure is proper to be attempted in the above way, together with the whole question of slavery as pertaining to the attention of the General Conference, we have deferred till a suitable time before the General Conference session; that time is now nearly at hand, and we shall then discuss it with all necessary detail.

POPULAR ENGLISH PREACHERS.

An English letter to the Christian Advocate and Journal, gives the following account of SPURGEON.

It is remarkable that his style does not appear to suit the American taste as it does the English. I have not heard an American gentleman say that he admired him. I have heard some of the most distinguished ministers connected with your body say how greatly they were disappointed in him. Perhaps, however, it would be found, in like manner, that a racy American preacher, such as might equal in his popularity with those who are characteristically American, the popularity of Spurgeon with our most nationally English, would similarly fail to secure the admiration of most Englishmen. Whitefield, it is true, was equally popular on both sides of the Atlantic, but at that time America was still thoroughly English.

Not that I mean to compare Spurgeon with Whitefield, except as regards his popularity, in which respect there is undoubtedly some ground for comparison. Spurgeon seems to be predominantly a vulgar man. Such was not Whitefield. Nevertheless, whatever your critics may suppose, he has beyond a doubt his strong points. Granted that his taste is often wretched, that his breeding is manifestly and greatly defective, that his recent pastoral letter, after his recovery from sickness, addressed, in particular, very pointedly to the sisters who had thought of him and cared for him, was, in many parts, disgusting and altogether unparalleled compound of positively gross and indelicate expressions of endearment and an almost impious assumption of apostolic style and dignity; granted that his style and illustrations in preaching are often really profane, and all but blasphemous; yet Englishmen are not altogether without justification for the overwhelming popularity with which they have distinguished this bold young Baptist preacher. His voice is remarkably good and well-managed, clear, round, ringing, and pleasant; his delivery lively and natural; his style is unimitated idiomatic talk; his remarks are often quaint, smart, racy, and memorable; his illustrations are generally clear, apt, and telling; his bearing and delivery, notwithstanding occasional unjustifiable outbreaks of various descriptions, are ordinarily those of an earnest man, who wishes not to astonish or fascinate, but to convince and impress. His very doctrine, bold, outspoken Calvinism, is, as I have intimated, a great attraction to many. Some like to hear this because of its almost startling strangeness of late years; others feel refreshed and re-assured in hearing a man of the day and of the people boldly and without compromise utter forth doctrines which philosophy and refinement seemed to have almost silenced in this land. There is an old Puritan partiality for the doctrines of grace and personal election which still lies deep in the heart of much people of this land. And, at the voice of Spurgeon, these felt like the old warior at the sound of the trumpet-blast of battle. There are many tempers, too, which will ever welcome fatalism in philosophy, if they affect philosophy, or Calvinism with its decrees in religion, if they are decidedly religious, as congenial and almost necessary doctrines. The result of all is, that Spurgeon is immensely popular. Doubtless he is often coarse, sometimes too, though but seldom, he is really dull. But as a rule, whatever he may or may not be, he keeps up the attention of his hearers. He never diserts, never drones, never slumbers. His reputation is such that he can afford a few failures. Even when he fails most egregiously, there are many of his hearers who never find it out. Fashion and prestige make dullness in him seem important if not impressive; and the confident, tho intelligent-seeming manner, which never fails him, his look and tone, as if he were talking to purpose, his bearing, as of master over his congregation, carry him bravely through his heaviest performances.

The same writer furnishes some details concerning-

GUINNESS.

You are aware that besides this English there is an Irish phenomenon, the Rev. H. Grattan Guinness. He has, I believe, been supposed by many to be a Baptist, like Spurgeon. He is, however, an Independent. Report says that he is of the family of the famous porter-brewing firm of Dublin, though only collaterally connected with that branch which now has the brewery. The Guinnesses have been connected with the Established Church, and also, through the late eminent Rev. Thomas Roberts, who married a Miss Guinness, (of the other branch,) with Methodism. Mr. Guinness has now left Dublin, and is, I believe, pastor of the Church connected with Now College, St. John's Wood, London, where Dr. Halley now is principal, as successor to Dr. Harris. Mr. Guinness started as a strong Calvinist, nearly if not quite as ultra as Mr. Spurgeon. I shall be surprised, however, if the atmosphere of St. John's Wood, latitudinarianized and transcendentalized as this has been now for some years past, does not greatly modify the broad Calvinistic dialect which Mr. Guinness used at first. Dr. Halley, the principal of St. John's New Wood College, is almost the only official person connected with that institution who retains that form of moderate but decided philosophical Calvinism, which twenty years ago was the prevailing creed of evangelical Congregationalists in this country. Of Mr. Guinness's characteristics as a preacher I have no personal knowledge, and have not heard much. But I understand his voice is sonorous and commanding, and his brogue, when he becomes warm and energetic, decidedly Hibernian. He does not, I believe, indulge in anything bordering upon the coarse or the profane.

His style, says the writer, is nothing transcendent. And yet one can easily conceive that, though the matter may not be of first quality, still, practical and evangelical sermons, of his pathetic and pictorial order, delivered with earnestness and power, are likely to be popular. Not philosophy, but strong and assured statements of doctrine, with appeals to the conscience, the experience, and the heart, are what the people of England, speaking generally, love to hear from the palpit.

MR. ELLSWORTH'S WILL.

THE report of Mr. Ellsworth's magnificent bequest proves to have been erroneous in one respect. The entire residue of his estate, after liabilities and legacies amounting to nearly $200,000, goes to Yale College, but only in trust, as a fund to aid needy and deserving students. Mr. Ellsworth, therefore, has not founded an American Oxford, as at first supposed; but he has endowed the talented and aspiring Children of the Poor, for the purpose of education, with a fund yielding, by various estimates, forty thousand dollars per annum, more or less, and sufficient to support at Yale College, with a little exertion of their own, three or four hundred of those sterling students whose education is to be their all, and who have no time or money to waste upon the follies of college-life. Here is truly an opportunity of immense magnetic power: a prize to draw out the last best energies of thousands who might else have never thought it their right to aspire, for themselves or their children, to anything better than a muscular, or even a trading, development and activity in life.

MEZZOFANTI.

THE current number of the Princeton Review contains, among other good articles, a sketch of the life of that wonderful linguist, Cardinal Mezzofanti, who died about ten years ago. His biographer, Dr. Russell, has collected and preserved, in his work just published, a multitude of instances proving the very extensive, indeed almost miraculous knowledge of languages possessed by this son of a carpenter of Bologan. Von Zach, who made an occasional visit to Bologan, in 1820, was accosted by the learned priest, as he then was, in Hungarian, then in good Saxon, and afterward, in the Austrian and Suabian dialects. With other members of the scientific corps the priest conversed in English, Russian, Polish, French, and Hungarian, Von Zach mentions that his German was so natural that a cultivated Hanoverian lady in the company expressed her surprise that a German should be a professor and librarian in an Italian university.

Professor Jacobs, of Gotha, was struck, not only with the number of languages acquired by the "interpreter for Babel," but at the facility with which he passed from one to another, however opposite or cognate their structure.

Dr. Tholuck heard him converse in German, Arabic, Spanish, Flemish, English and Swedish; received from him an original distich in Persian; and found him studying Cornish. He heard him say that he had studied to some extent the Quichua or old Peruvian, and he was employed upon the Bimbarra. Dr. Wiseman met him on his way to give a lesson in California Indian to some natives of that country. He heard "Nigger Dutch" from a Curacoa mulatto, and in less than two weeks wrote a short piece of poetry for the mulatto to recite in his rude tongue. He knew something of Chilpeowa and Delaware, and learned the language of Algonquin Indians. A Ceylon student remembers many of the strangers with whom Mezzofanti was in the habit of conversing in the Propaganda, those whose vernaculars were Pegnan, Abyssinian, Amarian, Syriac, Arabico, Maltese, Tamulic, Bulgarian, Albanian, besides others already named. His facility in accommodating himself to each new colloquist justifies the expression applied to him, as the "chameleon of languages."

But we have no space for enumerating the names of the languages he had mastered, and must wind up with Dr. Russell's summary and careful estimate of the Cardinal's acquisition. He adopts, as his definition of a thorough knowledge of language, an ability to read it fluently and with ease, to write it correctly, and to speak it idiomatically. Judging Mezzofanti by this high standard, his biographer comes to the following result in brief, his work giving the details at length:

1. Languages, frequently tested and spoken by the Cardinal with rare excellence, thirty.
2. Stated to have been spoken fluently, but hardly sufficiently tested, nine.
3. Spoken rarely and less perfectly, eleven.
4. Spoken imperfectly, a few sentences, and conversational form, eight.
5. Studied from books, but not known to have been spoken, fourteen.
6. Dialects spoken, or their peculiarities understood, thirty-nine dialects of ten languages, many of which might justly be described as different languages.

This list adds up one hundred and eleven, exceeding by all comparison every thing related in history. Jonadab Almanor and Sir William Jones are not claimed to have gone beyond twenty-eight! while Mithridates and Pico of Mirandola have been made famous by twenty-two. The Cardinal said he made it a rule to learn every new grammar and apply himself to every strange dictionary that came within his reach. He did not appear to consider his prodigious talent so extraordinary as others did. "In addition to an excellent memory," said he, "God has blessed me with an incredible flexibility of the organs of speech." Another remark of his was, "that when one has learned ten or a dozen languages, essentially different from one another, one may with a little study and attention learn any number of them." Again he remarked, "If you wish to know how I preserved these languages, I can only say, that when I once hear the meaning of a word in any language I never forget it."

And yet it is not claimed for this man of many words that his ideas at all corresponded. He had twenty words for one idea, as he said of himself; but he seemed to agree with Catherine de Medicis, in preferring to have twenty ideas for one word. He was remarkable for the number of languages he had made his own, but was not distinguished as a grammarian, a lexicographer, a philologist, a philosopher or ethnologist, and contributed nothing even to the department of "the study of words, much less of science."

His personal character was gentle, humble, modest, humane, and he was a sincere and devout man. His goodness was his own work, his peculiar talent the gift of Heaven—not acquired, but born; and being natural, could not be taught, transferred, or even explained to others, nor scarcely understood by himself.

LATEST STATISTICS OF METHODISM.

" " Parsonages	2,350,992
Numbers in Society	856,555
Increase the last year	136,036

This is a magnificent showing. The increase for the last year, it will be observed, is considerably above what we lately gave. What a responsibility for the moral welfare of this country, and indeed of the world, devolves upon a denomination of such gigantic energies! The returns of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, have not been made up for the year, but their last year's Minutes show:

Traveling Preachers	2,434
Local Preachers	4,007
Membership	655,777
Its late increase, unascertained, but not less than	50,000

Adding the figures of both bodies, we have for Episcopal Methodism in the United States:

Traveling Preachers	8,938
Local Preachers	12,437
Members, (with probable Southern increase)	1,662,332
Increase (the South at 50,000)	180,036

What a host of local preachers have we here! Who does not see the expediency of training thoroughly and working systematically this mighty part of our agency?

The increase of the South being yet but conjectural, we give it at only 50,000; we believe it will be found larger. If it bears any proportion to that of the North, the joint increase for the year can hardly be short of 200,000—by far the largest ever known in the history of Methodism. In one former year the increase of the undivided body was 157,000.

The census of the United States gives us church accommodations for about three and a third millions; this was eight years ago; and it included only our real church property; it must, however, be borne in mind that in much of our work long circuits include five times as many appointments as have chapels, and that portions of Methodist families can attend worship but part of the day.

Making the most cautious allowance for deficiencies in our data, and estimating three members of the congregation to one of the Church, and including the local preachers of England, Canada, etc., there cannot be in the world less than

Methodist Preachers	50,000
Methodist Communicants	3,500,000
Methodist hearers	10,000,000
Hearers in different Methodist denominations in the United States	6,649,298

MODERN CALVINISM.

AN ENGLISH correspondent of the Christian Advocate and Journal makes the following statement, which, we apprehend, is very nearly descriptive of a similar state of things in this country.

I received a letter a few days ago from a highly intelligent Wesleyan gentleman, inviting me to spend an evening at his house in a few weeks' time, for the notable purpose which you will gather from the sentences I am about to quote from his letter. He says: "I have two or three neighbors, dissenting ministers, amiable, clever, thoughtful men, (one well known to you and all England,) who want a quiet, courteous statement of the articles of faith held by themselves and by Wesleyans, to see where we agree, and at what point we diverge. One at least of my friends does not know whether he is a Calvinist or an Arminian; another preaches both doctrines, just as his text may suggest. The object is information, not controversy in its offensive sense, hardly argument to produce conviction, but to see what differences we have. Modern Calvinism (witness the Bishop of Ripon's sermon at St. Paul's) is so different from the Calvinism of Fletcher's day, that its professors can hardly define it." I intend to go to this gathering. I expect to learn something personally, but do not expect any new light or appreciable result to follow from this sort of mutual edairtesement.

The state of mind described in my friend's letter, as characterizing his ministerial acquaintance, is, I am of course aware, at least as common in the States as among ourselves. The one thing on which strict Calvinism has substantially depended for support of late years in England has been the necessitarian philosophy. Modern exegesis has shown that if Calvinists look to the Bible for the maintenance of their creed, they can find there but a precarious support, while consciousness and the general drift of the word of God seem to be decidedly opposed to them. But their stronghold has been the philosophy of choice and motive, hence Robert Hall, who seems never to have preached Calvinism, is reported to have said that if he found a Bible-student who denied Calvinism he simply concluded that he was "no philosopher." No Christian heart loves the doctrine of election, taken all round in its entirety. Fletcher so exposed its repulsiveness and its inconsistency with the spirit of the Gospel, and Methodism, in all its genius and characteristics, has been so utterly and so mightily antagonistic to it, that the tone and tendency of modern Christianity is decidedly adverse to it. All that was required to loosen its hold of the leaders of theological thought in modern dissent and evangelical Churchism, was to do away with the authority of that philosophy of causation, as applied to the motives and volitions of men, on which, to so many logical thinkers, Calvinism seemed to repose with the assured strength of scientific demonstration. Now, another kind, an altogether different school of philosophy, has, to a considerable extent, supplanted the old. Transcendentalism, more or less "pronounced," has made a decided impression on the present generation of thinkers. Many of the younger dissenting ministers in particular have embraced it, and all such have given up Calvinism. As usual there is both good and evil in this movement. The evil is that too many of these ministers have not only cast off Calvinism, but have more or less receded from the ground of the common evangelical faith.

Nevertheless there is a reaction from this reaction. In dress, in thought, even in preaching, there are at this time two opposite schools. The one is all refinement and exquisiteness, philosophic or poetic, transcendental or effeminate, or perhaps both at once. The other affects the bold and the bluff, the strong and manly, too often the coarse, the grotesque, the violent. Both these schools flourish together; their adherents mingle at the universities, and jostle each other in the streets. They are found in the pulpit as well as elsewhere. So, just at the time when it seemed as if the prevailing fashion in evangelical was more and more one of vague philosophizing, of Gospel dilution, of super-refinement, of transcendentalism in one or other form, Spurgeon appeared with his coarse Calvinism to startle the Christian public, and to become, at least for a time, the most popular preacher in England.

A FORGOTTEN EMPIRE.

The empire of Zabedj had no native historians, and the fragmentary notices which survive to us are dug out like historical fossils of gigantic proportions, from the Hindoo puranas, and the narratives of the mediæval geographers of Arabia.

One of the earliest and most authentic accounts of the Maharaja of Zabedj is to be found in the remarkable Arabic manuscript known as the "Voyages of the two Mahommedans," who travelled in India and China at the latter end of the ninth and the commencement of the tenth century. In this singular narrative the description of the empire of the Zabedj is given by Abouzeyd, of Bassora, from the reports of Soleyman, who, [illegible] two mariners, who had traversed the territory, in making voyages to and from China. The centre of the kingdom and the residence of the sovereign was at (illegible, Zaba,) Java, which Soleyman describes as then so populous that its innumerable towns were within sight of each other, and the rural inhabitants were so densely headed, that when the cock crew at sunrise, his call was caught up and repeated through an area of one hundred leagues.

East and west of Java, the empire extended from China to Cape Comorin, a thousand leagues in extent, and embracing innumerable islands, amongst others Kala, (which there is little difficulty in identifying with the modern harbor of Point de Galle in Ceylon,) which, lying midway between Arabia and China, was the emporium to which the merchants of each resorted, to exchange the products of the West for aloes, camphor, sandal-wood, ivory, ebony and spices.

Walkaaer has come to the conclusion that the empire of Zabedj did not survive beyond the seventh century of our era, after which the islands of which it consisted became subdivided into numerous petty sovereignties. It is mentioned by Delaurier, in a learned contribution to the Journal Asiatique, for September, 1846; but beyond these and a few other casual allusions, we have nowhere succeeded in finding any historical record of an empire which, for ten centuries at least, must have been one of the most remarkable and powerful in the East.

PROTESTANTISM IN BELGIUM.—Twenty-three years ago there was not one native protestant in Belgium, one of the citadels of Romanism; there were a few protestants, children of foreign Protestants or of Dutch [illegible]. Now there are sixteen Protestant churches, thirteen [illegible], five evangelists, five colporteurs, eleven [illegible], eight hundred children in school, about 1,000 communicants, and 5,000 hearers, who regularly [illegible] worship, all of whom have been [illegible] Catholic Church.

MINISTERIAL FIDELITY.

A great office confers great honor upon him who fills it. The ministry of the Gospel is the greatest office in the world. No other, filled by men, is formally instituted of God. No other is filled by men elect, chosen, and specially called. No other has special inspiration and spiritual anointing for its incumbents. No other has intimate, close, contingencies, and sanctions, of such high concernment. No other is honored with the divine confirmation of "signs following"—the specially promised, speedy, immediate, and almost miraculous, "Seal" of the Spirit of God, in the moral resurrection of the souls of men. To a spiritually illumined mind, it is not wonderful that the learned, proud, and prosperous Saul, after the visit of "the heaven vision," should "count all things but loss for excellency of the knowledge of Christ," and should "thank Him who enabled him, for that He counted him faithful, putting him into the [ministry." The highest honor that can be conferred on man or angel, is to be called of God to preach the "unsearchable riches of Christ."

"A great office requires the best and highest thoughts of an undivided mind—the concentrated energies of an entire character—the undiluted inspiration and enthusiasm of a whole heart. "It is not reason that" men filling the office of the ministry "should leave the word of God and serve tables." But, according to Apostolic example, they should give themselves "continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word." Necessities may require the attention of the mind and the use of the hands, occasionally, or for a time, in the service of affairs, as in the case of Paul, when he provided for his sustenance by the work of his hands; but no man who is truly called to "this ministry," unless he partially apostatize, will have any other leading and controlling aim in life. If he maintain intact the freshness of his consecration, and the integrity of his vocational vows, he will give his whole life to the work, making it as nearly as may be a continuous and all-absorbing ministry of the Gospel, whatever may be his ecclesiastical relations or personal circumstances—making even his occasional involuntary service of the business of the world, tributary to his greater freedom to do his appropriate work. It is a little thing that an insignificant and unworthy sinner, when called to go on a mission in the name of the "King of Saints," should make his arrangements, as speedily and as thoroughly as possible, to "embark" for his post, and give himself wholly to the discharge of its duties. He who cannot do so, should "decline the appointment," or, if he has "accepted," and finds that his "private affairs imperatively demand his attention," he should "resign," that his place may be better filled.

A great office demands diligent and continous study and training in order to the attainment of the ability and skill necessary to the right discharge of its duties. Greater ability and skill cannot be required in any office under heaven than that needed in the ministry of the Gospel. This thought should sink down into the ears of all ministers, and all candidates for the ministry, and should have the widest possible application. It is only in the light of this thought that the question of ministerial education can ever be settled. And it is only in the same light that men already in the ministry can be properly guided in their general homiletical and pastoral studies, and special pulpit preparations. The Scriptures contemplate no lower grade than "able ministers of the New Testament," whatever may be the "diversities of gift." We are to "approve ourselves as the ministers of God," in all things, and under all circumstances; "by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left." "Study to show thy self approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Timothy was also exhorted to "be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished up in the words of faith, and of good doctrine, whereunto" he "had attained." In mental training, development, and furniture—in the attainment of the "charity that doth not behave itself unseemly," and that is "courteous" in manners—in the comely use of "sound speech that cannot be condemned"—in the attainment of the wisdom that "winneth souls"—a minister should exert all his power of acquisition, and employ all his time.

A great office imposes great and solemn responsibilities. "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust." "I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing and His kingdom; preach the word, be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine." What burning words! And how their fervor increasingly kindles with the lapse of time, and the loss of opportunity!

TAKING STOCK IN CHINA.

We rejoice to learn that the idea of the re-inforcement of the China Mission begins to grow. In response to the pledge of Br. Deems to raise $200 in his District, Rev. N. H. D. Wilson, of the Greensboro District, pledges a like sum. By the next issue of the North Carolina Advocate we hope to learn that all the Districts have responded, and that nothing is wanting but the man, and we trust that he also may be ready, if North Carolina has a suitable one. It is no disparagement to a Conference, however, though it be one of the best, if it have not a suitable man for a missionary to China.

We have no doubt that the time is rapidly approaching when every Conference in our Church will be represented in China; and it is all important that not a single mistake be made in the choice of men. A few mistakes of this kind would weaken confidence in our missionary management, bear heavily upon our foreign missionary treasury, abate the zeal of the Church, and throw us back, in our "foreign policy," a quarter of a century. Indeed, we think there ought to be a commission, composed of men largely versed in all the knowledge pertaining to missionary operations in China, to decide upon the suitableness of every man proposed.

We need men of special aptitudes and energies for China—pious, intelligent, energetic, accomplished, wide-awake men—men of power—who will not be swept along upon the tide of circumstances, but who will control that tide, and make their own circumstances.

We therefore admire the sagacity of the editor of the North Carolina Advocate, manifest in the following:

"We wait with prayerful anxiety for the assurance that some suitable member of the Conference is willing to volunteer for life as a missionary to China. And we beg leave to suggest that the pledges to support a representative of the Conference in that country, be so enlarged as to include any one who may be selected for us by the Bishops, in the event of a failure to procure a member of our own body. This plan would have the double advantage of strengthening the bonds of union which bind us to such other Conference as may furnish the missionary, and of cultivating a more direct sense of responsibility among our people for the support of foreign missions."

Rev. Young J. Allen, of the Georgia Conference, and his wife, both young and well educated, are to go out as missionaries to China. The Southern Advocate hopes that the South Carolina Conference will furnish a travelling companion. Could not Mississippi furnish [illegible]

INCREASING POWER OF RELIGIOUS LITERATURE.

This is one of the great facts of the age—one of the most encouraging signs of the times. In earlier times, the integrity of the common christian faith and conscience—the rectitude of public religious opinion and sentiment—the culture of religious character and experience—the awakening of the world asleep in the arms of the Wicked One—all depended, almost altogether, so far as public instrumentalities were concerned, upon a scattered ministry, in a new country, laboring under innumerable discomforts and disadvantages. This occasional watering of the vineyard of the Lord, was, and is, valuable—indispensable—the chosen and chief means of personal and immediate awakening and conversion. But the silent, gentle, all-pervading influence of the invisibly distilling dew of a widely circulated religious literature, was needed to prepare and enrich the ground for ampler harvests to the ministry, and to sustain and keep in tone the results already attained.

This healthful power for the conversion of the world—this more generally pervasive influence of the "leaven" and "salt of the earth"—though yet in the inciplency of an incalculable development, and of an unimaginable universality of application, which, in maturity, will enwrap the world in an atmosphere of grace and truth—is now increasingly enjoyed. Christian newspapers are finding their way into all the families of the land, bearing—along with all the important news of the movements of the great and growing world—intelligence from the different sections of the expanding and victorious kingdom of Christ, and furnishing, to old and young, learned and unlearned, short, racy, and attractive presentations of the different forms and phases of thought and feeling—keeping mind, heart, will and imagination, full of intelligence, life, vigor, and inspiration.

And one of the most potent, comprehensive, and productive influences of the religious press, is that exerted upon the secular press, as seen in the increasing and gratifying recognition and support, by the latter, of the scriptural standard of faith, morality and sentiment. Much yet remains to be done in this direction, but this "revolution"—one of the greatest of the time—is silently and surely progressing. In this view, and in all others, it is an absolute duty to God, and an indispensable necessity for the world's enlightenment, elevation, conversion, and purity, that the religious press set a becoming example of moderation, courtesy, taste and tone—an example, it must be confessed, heretofore much needed.

In addition to the circulation of religious journals but mainly through their circulation, good books, the products of christianly-trained minds, representing all departments of literature, and furnishing all desirable knowledge and culture, are becoming common in almost every household. Sunday Schools, for the religious education of the children and youth of the land, with amply stored libraries, are springing up throughout the country; and these peculiarly sacred seminaries, unnoted by the great world, are silently preparing an infant generation for peaceable and happy citizenship in the kingdom of Christ, where twenty-five, thirty, and forty years ago the children of this Christian country went astray from their birth, "like the wild ass's colt."

All the Churches are emulating each other in this noble work, and we sincerely rejoice in the success of all. The results of the efforts of the Methodist Church, North and South, with their respective Publishing Houses, and collateral agencies, are sufficient to justify her in thanking God and taking courage. A writer from Cincinnati to Zion's Herald, in speaking of this matter, says: "It establishes the fact hitherto partially, at least, ignored, that we have a Methodist literature that is not to be despised, as well as a Methodist Church that cannot be omitted in the enumeration of religious bodies. The increased and increasing wealth, educational advantages, numbers and literature of our church are well fitting it to take its place in all classes of society, as it has hitherto always done among the poor and illiterate. It was no wonder that they succeeded when they brought the gospel to the poor. It remains to be seen, nay it is already seen, that they are able to prosper and increase, when they are daily demonstrating by the facts, that in preaching the gospel, they are proclaiming a truth directed to all, and calculated to save all classes of society. And I really believe, he continues, that a very few years will prove to the world that which is now evident to the few, that the Methodist Church is already prepared to compete for the palm, with any other church, of success in scientific, literary, moral and religious investigations and enterprises."

To "spread the books," and circulate the periodicals and papers, is one of the greatest duties, and greatest means of usefulness, and involving one of the weightiest responsibilities of the Methodist ministry of the present day.

UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH.

For many years past there has been in the South an increasing sense of the necessity of founding educational institutions, for males especially, equal in every respect to the great Northern institutions which have for so many years monopolized the higher American education. This idea has at length germinated and expanded into results. The Methodists have already built their "Southern University," at Greensboro, Ala., and will open it, fully equipped and manned, in the coming Autumn. And the Episcopalians, after several years consultation as to location, have at length definitely decided upon Sewanee, upon the plateau of the Cumberland mountains, near the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, in the South-East corner of Tennessee, not far from its intersection with Alabama, Georgia, and North Carolina—a very central, elevated, and romantic location. Ten Bishops, ten clergymen, and twenty laymen, constitute the Board of Trustees. Subscription books have been recently opened, and handsome subscriptions are coming in from all parts of the country.

We like the movement, because it is a contribution towards the supply of a great want of this section of the Union, and because it is to be a Christian Institution—denominational, if you please—the only truly christian schools in the land. Bishop Polk called on us a few days since, and presented us the report on the location, with the maps appertaining. He justly feels great interest in the success of the enterprise, and we heartily wish him and his co-laborers God-speed.

WELL DONE.

Some time since a gentleman in Alabama, a member of the Methodist Church, agreed to endow the chair of Biblical Literature, of the Southern University, at Greensboro, Ala., with $25,000.

A few days since, a lady in Mobile, a member of the Methodist Church, agreed to endow the Chair of Biblical Literature, of the East Alabama Male College, at Auburn, Ala., with $26,000

The friends of Centenary College and Soule University should wake up.

A GOOD SUGGESTION.

Some time since we mentioned that a worthy local preacher of Mississippi, had proposed that a fund should be raised to distribute the Advocate among the hotels and steamers, and also to supply the poor of the city.

A friend, a layman, writes, that he will guarantee ten persons from his parish who will give ten dollars each for the purpose. A distinguished minister, also, sends $5,00 to send the Advocate to the poor. Much could be done in that way. Each one sending donations should specify as to their application.

Rev. Alex. McBride requests us to state that his address is Enterprise, Miss., instead of Mobile, Ala., as heretofore.

METHODIST PRESS.

Extraneous Influence of Christianity.

The Methodist Protestant, which we always open with pleasure, has the following excellent remarks, among others, on the above subject.

An absolute control of all the domains of human thought and action, a supreme dominion over all the nations of the earth, is indeed expected as the ultimate fulfilment of prophecy. This hope has always been indulged since the first converts swelled the admiring train which followed the Savior while on earth, and even before his appearance animated the bosom of the devout Jew, whose vision, quickened by the divine promises, attempted to pierce the distant future. In the middle ages, it was this expectation which greatly aided in building up the great usurpation of the Papacy. * * * *

The truth is, that the Christian religion has modified the whole civil polity of the world. It is Christianity which dictates all that is good in civil law, which modifies the spirit of nations, which even softens the asperities of war. What Pagan nation would ever have dreamed of that lofty heroism, that noble courtesy, that almost superhuman fairness in dealing with enemies which we call chivalry? Courage abounded in the ancient warriors, but it was fired by a ferocity which had no place in the heart of the ideal knight of the old romance. * * * *

So, too, with the position of woman. That has been raised most wonderfully by Christianity. Among the ancient Pagan nations, woman was, what she now is in Mohammedan countries, alternately a slave and a toy. Even the Jews had no adequate conception of the dignity of the matron's character, and to this day, in their liturgies, the men thaunt loud praises to God that he has been pleased not to make them women. If all this has changed; if woman has now a right to claim not only the protection and love, but the respect and tender sympathies of man, if she is in short restored to her original position as a help-meet for him, she owes it all to the influence of Christianity.

"In Labors More Abundant."

Zion's Herald has an article on "Traits of Bishop Asbury." Dr. Strickland's book has, for the first time, brought the memory of this great and good man into proper appreciation by the Methodists of the present time. Of his industry, Zion's Herald says;

In industry and perseverance he was fully equal to Wesley, and probably not surpassed by even the apostle Paul. Sickness and pain could not deter him from keeping his appointments and constantly making new ones, so long as he had strength to sit on his horse and to proclaim the gospel of Christ. It would be safe to estimate, that in addition to his public labors, he made at least fifty thousand pastoral visits, and every moment of his time not spent in public duties or private devotion and study, traveling and conversation, was occupied in giving advice and counsel to the ministry under his charge—a ministry, which, when he commenced his actual superintendency by being appointed assistant, numbered only ten persons, but increased during his life to seven hundred, besides, perhaps, more than two thousand local preachers. The membership when he commenced was only one thousand, but when he died, was more than two hundred thousand. Thus while the population of the country had multiplied only about sevenfold, the membership of the Church of which Asbury was superintendent, had increased two hundredfold—an unparalleled increase, to be attributed only to the blessing of God upon the labors of a devoted band, who, with him for a leader, threaded valleys, climbed mountains and forded streams, visiting alike the palace of the great and the cottage of the poor, the thickly settled city and the secluded log-house of the pioneer, and holding up Jesus Christ as the Savior of all them that believe. For this, they asked no wealth nor luxury—they required only food and raiment, and the barest support of their families—and Asbury was known once to sell some of his own wearing apparel, to obtain a little money to comfort one of his fellow-preachers.

North Carolina Conference Statistics.

We were glad to find a summary of these statistics in the last North Carolina Advocate, for the reason that just previously we had read in the Religious Herald a letter from a North Carolina correspondent, rather glorying in the statement that Methodism, as he was led to suppose, was on the decline in North Carolina.

Local preachers, 192. White members in full connection, 27,805. White members, on trial, 3630; total white members, 31,627. Colored members, in full connection, 11,770. Colored members, on trial, 1429; total colored members, 13,199. The whole number, white and colored, in full, and on trial, is 44,826. It will be observed that the whole number on trial, white and colored, is 5059. The increase has been beyond precedent in the history of the Conference; $8133 15 has been collected for missions; and $2696 58 for the contingent fund.

There are, in our bounds, 270 Sabbath schools; 365 superintendents; 1310 teachers; 9377 scholars; 16,121 volumes in libraries. The amount reported as having been collected and expended for Sunday-school books, is only $463 59; but doubtless more was expended than was reported.

Romish Pauperism.

This, and every other American city, is over-run with swarms of begging Romanists, who eat up the charity of the land as greedily as did the locusts of old the land of Egypt. In addition to these paupers, Romish societies of all sorts have saintly looking women and innocent looking children urging their way into every door, begging for professedly benevolent objects. Besides, they obtain various appropriations from the city, and probably from the Legislature, professedly for the same objects. Church after Church is built, no doubt, by this same money, begged for the poor!

As to the paupers, the North Western Christian Advocate makes some good suggestions. It says:

It is a perplexing question how to deal with the mass of Popish paupers. We could, in such cities as this, manage without difficulty American, and even German and English poverty, but the Celtic is unmanagable. The appeals made by Irish women for aid are the most touching and affecting which it is possible to conceive, and the tears with which they are enforced, wash out all incredulity. Yet they are not to be trusted. Who is not familiar with the fact that Celtic witnesses have been known to swear one way in court with "uplifted hand," and, to reverse that testimony completely when a Bible was presented with the crucifix upon the cover? What is the lesson that fact teaches us? It is, that only the symbols of their own faith can compel an honest utterance. In view of these facts, many of the most benevolent persons of the country urge that the relief of our Irish Catholic population be left to the Holy Church. It can administer aid with no danger of imposition, for they will not attempt to deceive the man that "holds the keys." The Church can also aid them much cheaper than strangers. Lastly, its priesthood collect enough from their votaries for this purpose to do the work well, and should be required to do it. Public opinion should ordinarily hold that Church in loathing which fails to provide for its poor. Protestants have been indirectly contributing to the extension of American Papacy by generously taking care of its pauperism, and leaving it to expend all its strength in Church-extension. It is time to change these tactics, and let each Church assume the care of its own poor, and of its due proportion of those not in any way connected with the Church.

We suggest that at least this much is necessary as a safeguard, whenever charity is rendered this class of applicants—1st. Demand the written statement of the parish priest, that the applicant is temperate in his or her habits, and is really in need of assistance. This will relieve you of three calls out of five. 2d. Go to the residence of the applicant and see that help is needed, and that the story told you is verified.

Pastoral Visiting.

One of our people makes a call, in the Nashville Christian Advocate, for increased diligence among our preachers in the discharge of that all-potent but much-neglected means of usefulness, pastoral visiting. The editor says:

A pastor's visit is not social, it is official—professional. To while it away in indifferent or polite conversation, like any other welcome visitor, does not meet the case. He is expected to suggest certain subjects, to make spiritual inquisition, to awaken pious reflection, to bring up all-important but too often forgotten things.

What would be thought of the family physician, calling, in his character as such, and spending an agreeable time, and leaving without feeling a pulse, or making an inquiry or prescription on health? He would be thought a very agreeable man, but a poor physician.

A minister, from truly pastoral visits, not only improves his congregation but his sermons. He gathers hints for discourse, and learns from actual observation, where and in what proportion exhortation, instruction, or rebuke is needed. He gets the moral range of his hearers, and knows how high, how low, and at what to aim. He does not beat the air or strike in the dark. A sense of the fitness of a subject often invests it with freshness and life. Many things need to be said and applied to the individual or family which cannot be done in the great congregation.

Is it going to far too say, that for building up a holy Church, pastoral visiting holds the relation to preaching that, in a holy life, private prayer holds to public devotion?

Some Exceptions, and Otherwise.

Our brother Editor, Watson, of the Memphis Christian Advocate, will excuse us, we know, for the utterance of a kindly criticism. The leading editorial, in his last issue, is headed, "Must man's moral nature be changed?" In a Methodist paper, it should have been, "Man's moral nature must be changed." This Mr. Watson believes, and so argues throughout the article. But we confess we did not feel pleased to see this important question left open, in large letters, under the editorial head of so valuable and influential a Methodist paper as the Memphis Advocate. It was in disagreeable coincidence with the fact that several of the contributors to the Memphis Advocate teach a doctrine that does leave the question open.

Again: The first sentence of the next editorial begins as follows: "Man is a religious animal!"

We beg our brother to excuse us. We cannot relish such a setting forth of the case. We relish neither its theology nor its taste.

But in spite of these things, we are always rejoiced to find the Memphis Advocate on our table. It is a good paper, and is doing good.

Dr. Boring.

The Texas Christian Advocate informs us that "The Rev. Jesse Boring and his family sojourned in the city a few days recently, on their way to San Antonio. Large audiences enjoyed a great pleasure and received, we think, no small profit from the two sermons preached by Dr. Boring in the Methodis pulpit on Sunday last. They were noble presentations of the Gospel of the grace of God—massive in thought, forcible and eloquent in delivery; the mind and heart of the preacher were in them, and both the judgment and feelings of the congregations were evidently reached. A peculiar interest was given to the occasion by the sympathy of the audiences with the affliction of the preacher, and his excellent lady, in the recent death at this place of their son-in-law and daughter, Doctor and Mrs. Word. Christian deaths, Christian mourners, and Christian sympathizers! Even sorrow drops her disguises and stands confessed an angel in their presence."

Editor's "Evil."

The St. Louis Christian Advocate says: "We have just laid down a long, prosy communication, which the writer says, "You will please read carefully, correct, and publish, or examine it, and write to me your conclusion as to publishing it." It is now Thursday noon (almost), and during the whole of the week, thus far, we have not positively found time to read even the daily papers, while our own paper mail lies in heaps on the table. From daylight to long after dark we have been going here and there—watching this and then that, helping and directing first at one thing and then another—sometimes putting "proof" in the pocket and reading it by snatches as we could. A good part of Thursdays, Fridays, and Saturdays we usually spend with our exchanges, preparing news and other matter for our own paper; and now we are modestly asks to examine, and "carefully correct" something less than a score of pages of badly-spelled, unpunctuated, spider-track-looking manuscript, or at least write to the author giving our opinion of its character, and our decision as to the disposition to be made of it."

Historical Mission of Methodism.

The Christian Advocate and Journal, in one of a series editorial articles now appearing, entitled "The Actual Crisis of Methodism," ("crisis," as heretofore remarked in these columns, is too strong a word) has the following remarks. They have been uttered before, but cannot be too often repeated, and should be graven, as with an iron pen, upon every Methodist heart.

Through whatever changes we pass, we should bear steadily in mind our great historical mission in the world, and admit none that will be incompatible with it. That mission has been the revival and spread of Scriptural holiness. So Wesley himself happily asserted. This, to be sure, is the design of all Churches, but it is ours in many pre-eminent respects. We have not only peculiar practical means, but some distinctive doctrines answering to it. It is our ostensible characteristic, and we are comparatively lost, as a Church, if we lose this distinction. Our whole history and ecclesiastical constitution are marked by it. If Methodism has already answered its historical design in bringing English Protestantism somewhat up to this common purpose of Christianity, still we have the responsibility of keeping it up. It would be a disastrous fallacy for us to suppose that our historical appointment in this respect has been accomplished, or ever can be, till the mission of the Gospel is achieved throughout the world. Any tendency to such an opinion should be universally and persistently checked by us.

In the light of this capital idea should we judge of every change occurring, or proposed among us, for we must always be a "revival Church in our spirit, a missionary Church in our practical system."

French and Irish Catholics.

The Canada Christian Guardian, (Wesleyan,) speaking of a controversy in Canada between the French and Irish papists says:

It appears that, while nearly all the members of that communion in Upper Canada are Irish, a large proportion of the Priesthood is French. The state of things is attributed to the influence of a French Bishop, who, it is alleged, has employed his influence and authority, as far as possible, to degrade, expel, and otherwise dispose of the Irish priests, and fill their places with others of his own nation. This, it appears, has been felt to be a serious grievance by the Irish Romanists, but this discontent has never found any definite expression until, recently, a number of persons styling themselves "An Association of Irish Gentlemen," have drawn up a strongly worded document remonstrating against this indignity and injury. The Irish Romish Clergy are, in point of bigotry, intolerance, and blood-thirstiness, unequalled by their brethren in any part of the world. If Popery must be perpetuated in our country we would vastly prefer the milder type of it held by the Gallican Church, to the more repulsive ultramontane doctrines held by the Irish Romanists. The effects of Romanism in France are bad enough, but in Ireland they are far worse. But whatever may be the immediate result of this controversy, every friend of truth and liberty, will rejoice to find it in a proof that the reign of passive submission to authority, even in the Papal communion, is coming to a close.

Take Care of the Converts.

The Canada Christian Advocate, (Methodist Episcopal) says:

It is generally supposed that a re-action must follow a revival, and that there must be falling away among those who have been brought into Church fellowship; but we cannot conceive that there exists any necessity for this, though we admit that it too frequently occurs. We fear that much of the backsliding that does occur among young converts, and which we have to deplore, is attributable to a want of proper care and attention on the part of older members of the Church; they do not watch over these babes in Christ "as they who must give an account," hence they become discouraged and turn again to folly.

Lay-Co-operation.

The Richmond Christian Advocate, under the new editor, looks with a kind of kindly distrust upon this movement. We would suggest that our Conferences all test it, and that our papers all refrain from discussion until it is fairly tried.

PRESBYTERIANS AND SOCIETARIANISM.

The Southern Presbyterian, published at Charleston, S. C. calling attention to the appeal of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, says:

"While we cheerfully bid God speed to the American Tract Society as a great Christian institution, and willingly aid in disseminating its Evangelical publications; yet we are not ashamed to confess that we entertain a preference for the works issued by our own Board. And, therefore, we say to our Christian friends, give to the Tract Society as much as you can, for it is doing a great and good work, which cannot so well be done by any other instrumentality, but, at the same time, we would urge you, as Presbyterians, to devise and execute liberal things for your own Board.

FIRST PROTESTANTS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The Presbyterian Herald, noticing the interesting and valuable series now appearing in this paper, on the "Introduction of Protestantism into Mississippi," from the pen of Rev. J. G. Jones of the Mississippi Conference, says:

We know nothing of the facts in the case, but as New Jersey was originally settled mainly by Presbyterians, we think it more than probable that Mr. Swayze was a Presbyterian, and not a Congregationalist, as the writer states; and being so far removed from a Presbyterian he organized an Independent Church. If so, the Presbyterians were the pioneers of Protestantism in Mississippi.

We judge Mr. Jones is correct.

Bishop Simpson's health, we are glad to learn, from the North-Western Advocate, is rapidly improving.

BISHOP PIERCE INVITED.

We learn that Bishop Pierce has been invited to go to California by the San Antonio overland mail route, and a separate coach, with military escort for himself and family, tendered him, free of expense. We do trust he may find it convenient to go that way. We are pushing our missionary outposts farther and farther in that direction, hoping to meet our Pacific brethren after awhile, and we should be glad to have a Bishop lead the way.

MEETING OF THE PUBLISHING COMMITTEE.

The Publishing Committee of the New Orleans Christian Advocate are requested to meet in this office on Wednesday the 9th of March next. They are, J. T. Heard, M. S. Andrews, A. S. Andrews, from the Alabama Conference; B. M. Drake, W. H. Watkins, and J. J. Wheat, from the Mississippi Conference; and J. C. Keener, J. B. Walker, and Linus Parker, from the Louisiana Conference.

Rev. Joseph H. Phelan, as we learn from Alabama papers, died at Rockford, Alabama, on the 17th ult. He was formerly a member of the Alabama Conference. Since his location he had filled various offices in connection with the Alabama Legislature. One of the most courteous and amiable men was ever knew was Joseph H. Phelan. He was a brother of Hon John D. Phelan, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of that State.

We Call Attention to the medical advertisements of J. Wright & Co. 21 and 115 Chartres Street. We know nothing of medicine ourselves, and do not expect to become any wiser in this respect. But it is valuable—indispensable—nevertheless; and Mr. Wright has everything in this line that may be needed. Whenever you need medicines read his advertisement, and you will know where to send.

Telegraph Literature.—The literature of the telegraph, as evinced by the messages to be seen in almost any of the principal telegraph offices of this city, is decidedly peculiar, and exceedingly interesting. For instance, imagine, if you can, a more touching allusion to the death of a near and dear relative than the following: "John dead—on ice—won't keep—come quick."

N. Y. Times.

Alabama Conference Depository.—The Card of Drs. Hamilton and Neely, Agents, will be found under the head of "Special Notices." They have already obtained, as they say, $25,000 in notes. Hon. R. A. Baker writes, that it will probably reach $30,000 before they leave Mobile. The Agents are the choice of the conference for that work, and will vindicate the choice.

Rev. Joshua T. Heard called to see us yesterday, on his way up Red River. We were glad to take him by the hand. Mr. Heard is Presiding Elder of the Mobile District, Alabama Conference, and has long been one of the most useful and valuable men of the Conference.

F. W. Ober, 61 Poydras street, dealer in Northern and Western Produce, and Groceries, will supply all who order, even Alabama and Texas. He is a man to be depended on, as we know from an acquaintance of many years.

Mississippi Conference Assessment.—This notice will be found under the head of "Special Notices." All the preachers and members of the Mississippi Conference will be interested in it.

Our New Volume commences with this issue. We trust that our new dress of type, our unsurpassed press-work, as well as the reading matter, will give pleasure.

We invite those needing a teacher to the advertisement of J. W. S.—Ashland, Hanover county, Va.

Waverly Institute, a delightful situation, in Texas, needs a lady assistant. Read the advertisement, which we should have noticed sooner.

Rev. S. G. Starks, President of State Female College, Memphis, Tenn., requests us to state that Isaac A. Reed is Agent for that institution.

Read The Advertisement of Mr. Colman, Agent for the New American Encyclopedia. We certify that his books are very valuable.

Hon. Jas. E. Belser, a distinguished lawyer, and one of the oldest citizens of Montgomery, Alabama, died at his residence, a few days since.

Rev. Charles Taylor, D. D. requests us to state that his address is now Columbia, S. C. instead of Spartanburg, as heretofore.

Mrs. Alice T. Scratt, wife of Rev. S. B. Scratt, of the Louisiana Conference, died Jan. 21st. The obituary will appear next week.

A Letter From Liew, our native preacher in China, will appear next week. It is sent by Rev. J. R. Lambuth.

Our News-Department this week will be found to possess unusual interest.

Our Own Notices—They will be found under the head of "Special Notices." Be sure to read them.

Our Next Paper will be filled with reading of more than ordinary interest.

The Minutes of the Louisiana Conference are now being sent out.

Dr. Wightman, we learn, will accept the Presidency of the Southern University.

William H. Prescott, the celebrated historian, is dead.

PERSONAL.

The Grand Duke Constantine,

Brother of the Emperor of Russia, recently visited the United States Steam Frigate Wabash in the harbor of Genoa.

Senator Seward,

It is said, on account of the opposition of the Clay Whigs, the Americans, and the less ultra Abolitionists, cannot possibly get the Black Republican nomination for President in 1860.

Lamartine

Has just received $70,000 for his monthly course of literature.

The Empress Eugenie

Made a birth-day present to the Princess Royal of England, of a splendid Sevres vase, of considerable hight, standing on a pedestal of pate dure; the ground is a delicate rose pink, and the frames of the medallions gold arabesques of a white ground. Each compartment represents one hour of the summer day, and the paintings are most exquisite.

Baron Pennefather

Has resigned his seat on the Irish Bench. The venerable Judge (who was called to the bar in 1795) has recently been in a very infirm state of health. For some years he has been deprived of sight, but his wonderful memory enabled him to discharge his judicial duties efficiently, and in latter years some of the heaviest property causes have been tried by him.

Lieut. Maury,

Of the National Observatory, and so well known for his indefatigable and successful labors in the construction of Wind Charts, has received a compliment from a high quarter. He has recently received a communication from Admiral de Chabannes, Vice-Admiral and Commander-in-Chief of the French Naval Division of Brest and La Plata, who regards his researches as having stimulated the ardor of all who are interested in the perfecting of navigation; and awards to him the credit of being the discoverer and pioneer in his peculiar department of nautical science.

Mr. Gerard Stuyvesant,

A well-known citizen of New York, died on the 18th inst., at the age of fifty-four. Mr. Stuyvesant was a descendant of the old Dutch Governor of the same name.

Dr. O. W. Holmes

Has, it is rumored, declined an offer of $5000 from Bonner, of the Ledger, to write half a column each week, for one year, for that paper.

Thackeray's

Children are daughters. Tom Hood left a son and daughter; his son, distinguished as author and artist, about taking holy orders in the church of England, the daughter, Mrs. Broderip, is wife of a clergyman. Disraeli is childless. Dickens, as he lately told the Corporation of Coventry, when thanking them for a present of a gold watch, has seven sons.

Miss Hosmer—

"Hattie Hosmer, of Watertown"—the sculptress—domiciled at Rome in the house of Miss Charlotte Cushman, who entertains a sisterly regard for this young child of genius.

NEWS FROM THE INTERIOR.

TEXAS.

Books and newspapers find ready sale.... Houston is growing under the influence of railroads, and aspiring to rail connection with New Orleans.... The Victoria Advocate says, that Wm. Free mulatto—the Lavaca barber—who speaks the English, French and Spanish languages fluently, is a good penman, has traveled in the Free States, is thirty years of age, and was fully acquainted with the consequences of his act, has gone into voluntary servitude for life, and chosen Mr. E. Clegg, of Victoria, for his master.

Settlement of Brazos Reserve Indian Difficulty.—A council has been held of gentlemen representing the whites in the neighborhood of the Brazos Reserve Indians, and the following agreement was made between them and the chiefs of the tribe:

The Indians shall not leave the neighborhood of the Reserve for other purposes than to hunt stock, and then only in parties of three together, to be accompanied by a responsible white man. The former course of hunting and camping without the Reserve is to be entirely abandoned. No white person or persons are to be held responsible to the Indians for anything heretofore done to them, and they are from now to be good men and friends to the white people.

The above is a mere outline of the terms reported by the commission. The report was adopted by the whites collected at Palo Pinto county to the number of two hundred, after which the companies were disbanded on the 13th and they returned to their homes.

ARKANSAS.

Immigration from Virginia, Georgia, Alabama and the Carolinas is heavy, and the country is rapidly improving in respect.

TENNESSEE.

Hon. Jere Clemens has assumed the editorship of the Memphis Eagle and Enquirer, which he conducts with much ability and spirit.

The Mississippi and Tennessee Railroad.—We learn that the Mississippi and Tennessee Railroad Company have completed contracts, with reliable and responsible parties, to complete the road through to Granada within two years, when our cotton will be by rail with New Orleans and the Gulf will be completed.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The Legislature voted against the extension of the road from Danville to Greensboro, defeating it until the next session, two years, and losing the through travel.... The first car load of coal from the coal fields of North Carolina reached Wilmington on the 19th inst. It was conveyed thither by steamboat. Unusual manifestations of gratification were exhibited.

GEORGIA.

The Governor of Georgia has issued a proclamation declaring that the notes of the following Banks in that State will be received in payment of the dues of that State, viz: The Bank of the State of Georgia; the Cherokee Insurance and Banking Company, at Dalton; the Marine Bank of Georgia, at Savannah; the Bank of Columbus; the Bank of Middle Georgia at Macon; the Bank of the Empire State, at Rome; the Planters and Mechanics' Bank, at Dalton; the Exchange Bank of the State of Georgia, at Griffin; and the Mechanics' Bank of Augusta.

FLORIDA.

Yellow Fever at Tampa.—As will be seen under our own head, we have had another death in this vicinity from fever. Last week we stated that there were no cases of fever in this city: we should have added that there were several on the west side of the river.—Tampa Peninsular, 15th inst.

Sam Jones dead.—The Tampa Peninsular, of the 15th inst., says Mr. Kilburn, who arrived at that place the day previous, states that the Seminole Indian Chief, Sam Jones, is dead. It is said that Tiger Tail has been appointed in his stead. The latter expresses a desire to remain in Florida, and is willing to comply with anything the government may require of him, but declares that, unless compelled, he will not go West.

Mr. Wm. H. James has been appointed Assistant Civil Engineer at the Pensacola Navy Yard, in place of Mr. Botts, who was lately drowned in the attempt to rescue a lady of Pensacola who had fallen overboard from a steamer.

ALABAMA.

Cession of portion of West Florida.—A friend has shown us a private letter from Judge Yelverton, who has been appointed by the Governor of Alabama a Commissioner to report of this State, to negotiate with the proper authorities of the State of Florida, relative to a cession of a portion of West Florida, including Pensacola, stating that the Legislature of the latter State had passed a joint resolution, which had been approved by the Governor, leaving it to the people of that State to vote upon the question of cession. The letter states that the resolutions passed the Senate to leave it to West Florida, but the House amended them, leaving it to the State. It is all the same, for if the West votes for it, it is well understood that the cession will take place.—Montgomery Confederation.

The city of Tuscaloosa, by a vote of 183 to 4, a few days since resolved to tax itself $40,000 for the benefit of the North and Southwest Alabama Railroad. The road runs directly through Alabama, and intersects with the Mobile and Ohio at Meridian.

We earn that the Directors of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company have concluded to make the last call upon the people of Mobile to furnish the means necessary to finish their great enterprise and we are glad to learn they are likely to succeed in raising the requisite amount by private solicitation. On Tuesday evening $146,000 had been raised, considerably more than half the amount necessary.

The Negroes' Crop.—Mr. J. S. Bylington informed us the other day that he made two rather remarkable cotton purchases lately. One was the cotton crop of the negroes of Dr. Lucas, in this vicinity, for which he paid $1800 in cash, every cent of which goes to the negroes. The fact is, Dr. Lucas, unlike any other Montgomery planter's negroes, could easily buy the Grecly family as it stood before he commenced with the half-clad abolitionists out of their sixpences. Yet, by dozens of slaves in this town, who legitimately make money of their own, every year, to buy out the homestead of the Vermont farmer. It is amusing that such a class should have the sympathies of a people who have to work so much to keep body and soul together. The second purchase was a bale of remarkable size. It was, we believe, the last crop of W. C. Bibb, Esq., and weighed just 1365 pounds. It occurs to us that that is the largest, by long odds, that we ever heard of.—Mail.

MISSISSIPPI.

D. Walker, of Vicksburg, once [editor of the Sentinel] has been appointed Consul to Genoa.... Rev. Dr. Marshall delivered a lecture before the Vicksburg Lyceum.... The city of Vicksburg is unusually prosperous.

New Orleans and Jackson Railroad.—The Sunny South of the following news in regard to the progress of this road:

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

...on says, the most harmonious feeling and the best understanding have been brought about between the company and its contractors. Besides this, additional capital, additional energy and skill have been infused into the concern, which cannot fail to produce desirable results.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Commerce of Charleston.—We learn from statistics published in the Mercury, that the value of the exports from Charleston for the last year, is about twenty-five per cent. greater then the value of the exports of the previous year,—a gratifying exhibit of the substantial prosperity of that city. The value of the exports of 1858 is $19,321,585, against $15,790,782 in 1857. The average amount of exports from Charleston for the last eight years, $16,324,653. The value of imports in 1858 is only $913,828, showing a falling off of fifty per cent. since the previous year.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

NEWSPAPERS or pamphlets sent to Europe in wrappers are subject to letter postage, but tied with a cord, only newspaper postage is charged.

THE Washington States says, that an extra session of Congress is now seriously talked of.

The Cuban Telegraph.—The Savennah Republican says, the work on the Cuban Telegraph line is progressing with commendable speed. The posts had been distributed for thirty miles at the close of operations on the 19th inst.

THE value of buildings erected in the last year at Chicago is estimated at $3,000,000.

Through Tickets on Southern Roads.—The Philadelphia North American says, that the President of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, has communicated to the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, on application of a committee appointed to solicit the earliest possible arrangement for a through ticket system on the railroads leading to the South and Southwest, a new schedule of rates from the principal Southern cities to Philadelphia and New York. These rates were to go into operation, or through tickets to be offered for sale on these terms, on and after Monday, January 24th. From this schedule we extract the following:

	Philadelphia.	New York.
From New Orleans to	$49 00	$50 00
" Vicksburg	46 00	48 00
" Memphis	34 00	36 00
" Grand Junction	33 00	35 00
" Jackson	34 00	36 00

The Admission of Oregon.—The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Courier writes: It is ascertained that the Oregon State bill will pass. So, if the Presidential election comes into the House, Oregon, with a population of 44,000, will have the same weight with New York, whose population is near four millions. But, fortunately, Oregon will be on the Democratic side, and thus balance the vote of Kansas, should that Territory be individedly admitted into the Union.

THE marine losses on hulls and cargoes on the North-western lakes, for the year 1858, amounted to $732,232; in 1857 to $1,387,935, a decrease the last year of $655,703. The loss of life in 1858 was 122; in 1857 it was 493; a material difference.

THE WEALTH of the two great centres, Boston and New York, amounts to eight hundred millions of dollars. New York having $525,000,000; Boston $275,000,000, or a little more than one half that of New York. The property of Boston is one hundred millions more than that of the city of Philadelphia, and nearly three times that of Baltimore. It is said that Boston has more property, per capita, than any other city in the world.

A NEW movement in the Dudly Observetory difficulty was made on Monday week. The Trustees, in the absence of Dr. Gould, took position of the building, heretofore held against them by the late Scientific Council, and the officers appointed by the Trustees are now in possession.

PRESIDENT Buchanan's receptions are to be held during the remainder of the session every Saturday at 2 p. m. His evening receptions will commence on Tuesday next, at 8 o'clock, and will take place on each alternate Tuesday.

ADVICES from Naples state that Mount Vesuvius is again in full eruption, and presents almost magnificent spectacle each night.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.

Prince Napoleon had gone to Turin for the purpose of marrying the daughter of the King of Sardinia. It is expected his visit will encourage the disaffected Italians, and produce a demonstration. Count Walewski, the French Foreign Minister, had protested against the erroneous impression that appears to rule supreme without contradiction, and it is reported he has expressed the determination to retire when the counsels of moderation are no longer listened to. It is rumored at Paris that Gen. McMahon is to be appointed to the command of the Army in Italy, and that thirty thousand men of the African contingent are to reinforce the French Army there. The Paris Constitutionale admits the existence of serious difficulties between France and Austria, in relation to the Danubian as well as the Servian question, but says war is only possible. In the event of a rupture of existing treaties the impression prevailed that the marriage of Prince Nepoleon to the daughter of the King of Sardinia would secure the support of the French Government to Victor Emanuel, in placing him on the throne as King of Italy.

HAVANA.

The Diario hopes, from the tone of the French press on the President's Message, that France will oppose the designs of the United States on Cuba.

SOUTH AMFRICA.

In Chili, a revolution seems imminent. All the opposition periodicals had been silenced—156 persons, among them three members of Congress, had been arrested and fined, and the three deputies expelled—and the provinces of Santiago, Vulparuiso, and Acoragua declared in a stage of siege for ninety days. Which will be sustained, the Government or the revolutionists, remains to be seen.

In Peru, the carpenters of Lima had rebelled against the importation of houses, but were subdued. Congress was in session. A bill had been introduced into the Senate authorizing the President to contract for a loan of fifty million dollars. Sr. Ortiz de Caballos had resigned the Secretaryship of the Treasury, and was appointed Minister to Spain. Sr. Juan Jose Salcedo had been appointed Secretary of the Treasury, and Sr. Antonio Arenas Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The blockade of the ports of Ecuador by the Peruvian squadron, still continues. Private advices announce arrangement of the dispute between the two Republics, by means of the Chilian English meditation.

In Venezuala, Gen. Paez had been received with great demonstrations of enthusiasm at Cumana and Puerto Cabello, and arrived at Valencia, in the midst of an immense and enthusiastic crowd. The National Convention had ratified the appointment of Gen. Castro for the Presidency, till the next election. A project of amnesty had been presented in the Convention, excluding, however, Gen Jose Tadeo Monagas, who, it was said, was conspiring against the country in the neighboring Island of Trinidad.

DOMESTIC.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31.—Acquisition of Cuba.—The house report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon the acquisition of Cuba, as prepared by Mr. Branch of South Carolina, traces the various acquisitions of territory by our Government from the Revolution to the present time. It estimates the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, (exclusive of coastwise trade,) between the Atlantic and the Pacific, at $200,000,000, and expresses the belief that within five years it will increase to $500,000,000. It asks whether the nations which, for an adequate consideration, placed us in a position to render the use of the Gulf of Mexico a necessity, can refuse the concessions necessary to the enjoyment of those possessions. It says it is as important to remove Spain from Cuba now, as it was to remove France from Louisiana in 1803. The report contrasts Napoleon Bonaparte's willingness to sell in 1803, with the reluctance of Spain to sell the Island of Cuba to the United States, while making no objections to sell territory to France and England. The report cites the acts of 1811 and 1812, authorizing the President to seize Florida. It complains of the conduct of Spain in the purchase of Florida, and says that Louisiana and Florida were transferred and retransferred between Spain and France and England; but when Florida became necessary to the United States, Spanish pride revolted, and we could not buy Florida on any terms. The report details the advantages of the acquisition of Cuba under several classes. It shows that the sugar and molasses consumed in the United States cost the consumers $9,000,000 more than if Cuba belonged to the United States, and that our farmers would sell flour, pork and lard to the value of $8,500,000, where they now sell none. The Committee say this exhibit is made to show that we can afford to pay a liberal price for Cuba, and not to excite the cupidity of our citizens. The report says the native white population of Cuba eagerly desire annexation to the United States, and that no civilized people, a majority of whom are averse to our institutions, ought to be taken into the Union. It approves of the President's sentiments against acquisition of the Island by any dishonorable means, and expresses the opinion that, notwithstanding Spain shows no apparent disposition to sell, and threatens to refuse a sale under any circumstances, yet that the President had a motive in proposing the purchase at this time, and to reject the bill would be construed by Spain as indicating the dissent of our people as well as of Congress from the views of the President. The bill is similar to those under which the acquisition of Louisiana and California were made.

LOCAL.

A miserable census report of this city having been made to the Legislature, representing New Orleans as having decreased greatly in population, when it is known to be rapidly increasing, the Mayor is having a new census taken. Who were the census takers? It would be edifying to know the names of men who could thus violate all official honesty and trust.

Bank of James Robb.—The name of this bank will be changed to "The Mercheants" on the 1st of February, and the capital increased to $1,000,000.

Crops in Northern Louisiana.—The Morehouse Advocate of the 15th says: "So far as we have been able to learn, every planter in the perish has not only made as much cotton as he could gather, but an abundance of corn. Some of the farmers have made corn enough to do them two years.

The Consolidated Debt of the City. The last annual report (for the year 1858) of the Commissioners of the Consolidated Debt of this city, has been laid upon our table. From it we learn that, during the year the collections of the tax amounted to $620,515 18, out of the $650,000 levied by the Common Council on real estate and slaves. Other collections from arrears for the years 1852 to 1850, inclusive, have been made.

The total debt of the city amounts to $7,988,130 25, showing a reduction during the year of $133,000, notwithstanding that $97,000 of Bonds of the old city, due 1st January, 1859, have been paid on presentation, and ample means on hand to meet the remaining debt, maturing in 1859.

The total amount of old corporation debt is $1,803,130 25, with interest added $96,366 50. The bonds issued by the Commissioners up to the 31st ult. were $6,185,000 with an interest added of $371,100. The total indebtedness, therefore, is $7,988,130 25, and total interest $467,460 50.

Rich Cargo.—A steamboat arrived a few days ago at our wharf, from the Red River, with a large party of gentlemen and ladies from the north-western parishes, who are visiting our city for pleasure and amusement. Among them were eight widows, whose aggregate wealth amounted to five millions of dollars. One of the said ladies is the owner of six hundred slaves, and another makes a crop of three thousand bales of cotton.

There were at the date of the last report swamp land warrants unsold amounting to 116,343·62 acres, which was increased to 132,798·04 acres by refundment upon cancellation of swamp land warrants erroneously located, amounting to 16,454 42 acres.

The amount of swamp land by warrants authorized for sale by act of 1855 has been exhausted, and no swamp lands can now be sold other then those which come within the provisions of the graduated acts of 1857.

Statistics from Auditor's Report.—The general statistics of the report relate to the year 1857. As compared with the statements of the previous report, giving similar statistics for 1855, the results are as follow: Total value of property $378,911,901, against $321,281,882 in 1855; total amount of taxes assessed, $1,398,349 81, against $1,372·285 84; land uncultivated, 6,010,964 acres, against 5,265,926; land cultivated in cotton, 750,256, against 616,788; land cultivated in cane, 215,305, against 248,195; land cultivated in rice, 4,905, against 3,177. The production of cotton in 1857 was 407,018 bales, against 368,077 in 1855; while that of sugar was 58,249 hhds., against 283,466 in 1855.... The white population of the State in 1857 is summed up at 308,864, against 301,764 in 1855; the black slave population 298,519, against 263,167 in 1855; the free colored, 18,718, against 22,843 in 1855... The number of educable youth in the State in 1857, as given in the report, was 76,518, against 72,244 in 1855.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, February 1, 1859.

The following, copied from the New Orleans Price-Current, furnishes the annexed statement of the past week's business:—

The operations of the market, though somewhat interfered with within the past few days by rainy weather, have been to a very good extent in most of our leading commodities. Cotton, though not presenting a brisk market, has moved off pretty freely, and Sugar and Molasses have been dealt in to a good extent, though the latter article has lost a portion of the recent advance. In Tobacco the transactions are still limited, but there has been more movement within the week in most articles of Western Produce, and it will be seen that the rates for Pork have advanced. On Thursday, the 28th inst., the Arabia's advices, one week later, were received, reporting an id. decline in the Liverpool Cotton market, with sales for the week of 46,000 bales. The advices from the manufacturing districts were favorable, but holders of Cotton at Liverpool were pressing their stocks on the market. At Havre, also, the market was depressed, and a decline of 1 franc had taken place, tres ordinaire being quoted at 101 francs. Money was more stringent in England and Consols had declined ¼ per cent, being quoted at 95¼. The river fell 14 inches in the early part of the week, but it has since risen 1 inch and is now 4 feet 7 inches below high-water mark.

COTTON.—The following table exhibits the ruling prices this evening:

New Orleans Classification.

Inferior	—@—	Good Middling	11¾@12
Ordinary	—@—	Middling Fair	12¼@12¾
Good Ordinary	10 @10½	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¾@10¾	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	11¾@11¾	Good and Fine	—@—

Our last report closed upon a very fair demand, and we noticed sales for the first three days of the week of 35,500 bales, without material change in prices. On Wednesday buyers again came forward and operated pretty freely, taking about 13,000 bales. On Thursday the weather was partially rainy and somewhat unfavorable for business, but there was, nevertheless, quite a good demand, which resulted in further sales of some 12,500 bales. Friday, with still rather unfavorable weather and European advices one week later fully due, the market presented a comparatively quiet appearance at the opening, though some few lots had been disposed of, when about noon the Arabia's advices were received, reporting a decline of ⅛d. at Liverpool and 1 franc at Havre. Operations were at once checked by this intelligence, the sales made previous to its receipt summing up about 5,500 bales. The sales for the past week amount 66,500 bales. Arrived in the same time 50,954 bales. Exports of the week 53,157 bales. Stocks in presses and on shipboard not cleared on the 28th inst. 465 38 bales. With respect to prices, we have again to remark that the comparative scarcity of clean bright Cottons enables holders to obtain very full prices for them, and we find it necessary slightly to advance our figures for the better grades, while low running and dusty descriptions are very abundant, and continue neglected and mostly nominal.

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 17,000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 4 to 5¼; Common to Good Common 5¼ to 5¾; Fair to Fully Fair 6 to 6¾; Prime to Choice 6¾ to 7¾; Centrifugal and Clarified 7 to 9; Refined 9¼ to — cents per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 14,560 bbls. The quotations are: For Inferior and Fermenting 27 to 29; Prime to Choice 30 to 32 in hhds. and in half-bbls. 33 to 36 cents per gallon.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs, planters, 5 to 5½; Leaf, inferior to common 6 to 6½; fair 7 to 7½; fine 8 to 8½; choice, heavy and light, 9 to 10 cents per pound.

FLOUR.—The sales of the week have reached 16,000 barrels, at a range of $4 75 to $5 00 for fine and unbranded; $5 50 to $5 55 for superfine; $6 50 to $6 75 for extra, and $7 00 for ordinary to choice extra.

GRAIN.—The demand for Corn has been fair and prices well maintained—prices ranging from 80 to 90 for good to prime mixed up to 95 cents per bushel for prime to choice white and yellow. Oats sell at 77½ to 80 cents per bushel. Bran has been selling at $1 00 to $1 10 cents per 100 lbs. Wheat—85 to 90 cents per bushel for inferior, $1 00 for prime red, and $1 10 to $1 20 for prime white.

PORK.—The sales for the past week ranged at about $18 75 to $19 00 per barrel for Mess; $18 50 for N. O., and $13 50 to $14 00 for Prime.

BEEF.—The market very dull. Prime at $6 50; Mess at $14 00 per barrel.

BACON.—Shoulders 7¼ to 7½; Ribbed Sides 9½; Clear Sides 11 to 11½; Sugar-cured Hams 12½ cents per pound.

LARD.—In barrels and tierces 11¼ to 11½; kegs 12½ to 13 cents per pound.

BUTER.—Western has been selling at 9½ to 12½; prime roll butter at 18 to 20 cents per pound.

ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging 12 to 14 cents per yard; India Bagging at 13½ to 14c. Bale rope, machine made, at 7½ cents per pound.

BAGS.—Have sold during the week at a range of GUNNY BAGS—16 to 11 and 11½ cents for heavy to extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 10½ to 11, good fair at 11¼, and prime at 11¾ cents per pound.

MONEY MARKET.—The applications for discounts at the Banks, chiefly for short loans, continue to be pretty heavy, and those institutions are generally working fully up to their line, but in the out-door market the supply of money continues to be very ample, and all good paper, where the makers are well known, can be readily passed at rates from 8 to 9 per cent. for good mortgage notes; 8 to 9 for first class long dated acceptances; second class ditto 9½ to 10, and for short commercial paper from 6 to 7 per cent. per annum.

LIVE STOCK.—Beef Cattle—heavy and extra choice Cattle 12½ cents per lb. net; good and choice Western 8½ to 10c. per lb. net. Hogs at 8 cents per lb. net. Sheep $3 00 to $5 00 per head. Milch Cows, $35 to $70 and $90 per head. Veal Cattle, $6 00 to $11 00 per head.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN NOTICES.

OUR OLD AND DISTINGUISHED PREACHERS should labor for the ADVOCATE as well as the young men. When they do not, it is a pity, for their influence would enable them to be of great advantage to the paper, and their example would encourage and train the young preachers to great usefulness in this way.

The Venerable Peter Cartwright is an instance on the other side. He recently sent TEN new subscribers, and the money for many old ones, to the Ladies Repository. Will our leading men lead in the effort to raise our list at once to ten thousand? Come, "most potent, grave and reverend Seniors," we all honor you; let us follow you in this path of usefulness.

The Proportion of ADVOCATES taken, to the white membership of the Church, ought to be as one to five, at least. Families do not average more than five white persons in number. The Alabama Conference has 45,646 white members. Ten ADVOCATES to five members would give us over 9000 subscribers in that Conference. If it be said, that other Advocates circulate there as well as ours, we reply—every family ought to take their own Advocate first, and then any other they wish. Again: the families in our congregations, not members of the Church, will take the ADVOCATE if applied to; and this will more than compensate for any loss on the other score. According to this rule, in the Mississippi Conference, which has near 20,000 members, we ought to have 4000 subscribers; and in the Louisiana Conference, which has near 10,000 white members, we now have 1806 subscribers.

Just look at this, and think about it! It could be done this year. Brethren in the ministry, please state and enlarge upon this calculation before all your congregations. It would give us 15,000 subscribers.

TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS FROM EACH PREACHER is what we propose, and hope for during the present year, as the minimum standard. Many, of course, will procure a much larger number; but we hope no Preacher will fall below this. It is not a large number, and it will not be hard work to reach it. Brethren in the ministry, could you not obtain this number within the next month? What a tide of success and encouragement for the paper—for you—for the Church—it would create!

An Example.—The Western Christian Advocate says—Monday, January 3, 1859, was the heaviest day's work in the periodical line ever experienced by the Cincinnati Book Concern. There were received and transferred to the books some 2250 subscribers to the Western Christian Advocate, and 1,200 in the Ladies' Repository. The same figures for each were entered Thursday, December 30th, making the total for the two days—3500 for the Western Christian Advocate, and 2400 for the Repository.

Are Southern Preachers so utterly behind Northern Preachers in appreciation of, and labor for, religious periodicals? Let it be said no longer.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

THE ADVOCATE now has a much larger circulation than any other paper published in New Orleans or the South-west, and is rapidly increasing. It is therefore the best advertising medium to all the country commercially connected with this city. The following are our

RATES:

One square, one insertion	$2 00
Each subsequent insertion	1 00
One square, one year	26 00
Each additional square	15 00

The price for six months is three-fourths of the price by the year—the price for three months is half the price by the year.

Twenty-five per cent. discount on the above prices, in behalf of our Schools and Colleges.

PROSPECTUS OF
THE NEW AMERICAN CYCLOPÆDIA:

Now in course of Publication by D. Appleton & Co., New York: Edited by GEORGE RIPLEY and CHARLES A. DANA, aided by several hundred Writers in all Branches of Science, Art and Literature.

The design of this work is to furnish the people with a popular Dictionary of Universal Knowledge.

All branches of scholastic erudition will be fully represented, and the scholar and professional man will find it stored with references in every sphere of learned inquiry. In the abstract sciences it will be no less trustworthy and valuable. Throughout its successive volumes the work will present a fund of accurate and copious information on Astronomy, Natural Philosophy, Mathematics, Mechanics, Engineering, the History and descriptive of Machines, Law, Political Economy, Grammar, Music, etc. etc.

The Natural Sciences, will form a leading feature of the Cyclopædia, and will present an accurate record of the great discoveries that have marked the progress of Chemistry, Geology, Botany, Mineralogy, etc. during the last fifty years.

Due space will be devoted to an exposition of the principles of Physiology, Anatomy and Hygiene, which will be prepared in a manner adapted to popular information, by eminent writers of the medical profession.

In History it will give not merely a catalogue of barren dates, but a copious narrative under their appropriate heads, of the principal events in the annals of the world.

In Geography and Ethnology it will embody all the remarkable results of original investigation which so brilliantly distinguish the present century.

In Biography it will not only record the lives of men eminent in the past, but will devote a large space to sketches of distinguished living persons, prepared by writers who, from locality, personal acquaintance or special research, are most competent to do them complete and unbiassed justice.

Agriculture, in all its branches, will have the most careful attention.

The Industrial Arts, and that Practical Science which has an immediate bearing on the necessities of daily life, such as Domestic Economy, Ventilation, the Heating of Houses, Food etc. will be treated with that thoroughness which their great importance demands.

It is intended that the work shall bear such a character of practical utility as to make it indispensable to the collection of books in every American household. Abstaining from all doctrinal discussions, from all sectional and sectarian arguments, it will maintain the position of absolute impartiality on the great controverted questions which have divided opinions in every age.

The History of Religious Sects will be written, as far as possible, by distinguished members of the different sects respectively who have made their history and doctrines a special study.

As the New American Cyclopædia is intended to meet the intellectual wants of the American people, and in some degree to be the product and representative of American civilization, it will, as far as the nature of a Cyclopædia permits, possess a strictly original character, although in the plan of its arrangement it will follow the alphabetical method of the popular Conversations Lexicons, which experience has amply shown to be the most convenient and useful.

All the information of any importance contained in the following works, will be comprised in the New American Cyclopædia, viz:

Encyclopædia Britonnica, Encyclopædia Metropolitana, Penny Cyclopædia, Conversations Lexicons, Encyclopedie Moderne, Dictionnoire de la Conversation, Encyclopœdia de Gens de Monde, Biographie Moderne, and all other works of any importance of a similar character, whether in the English or other languages.

With the command of ample and effective resources, which have been fully tested in the volumes of the work already completed, the publishers do not hesitate to offer the "New American Cyclopædia" to the public as superior in extent, variety and exactness of information—in adaptation to the wants of the American people—and in concessions and attractiveness of method, to any similar publication.

The work will be published exclusively by subscription, in fifteen large octavo volumes, each containing about 750 two-column pages, and in exterior appearance will be at once elegant and substantial.

The volumes will be issued serially in Cloth Binding at $3 each, Library style (leather) $3 50, Half Morocco (plain) $4 each, Half Russia (extra) $4 50 each—payable on the delivery of each volume.

Clergymen, Physicians, Lawyers, Planters, Mechanics, Politicians, Merchants—and the People generally—will find the New American Cyclopædia of great interest, and practical use. Among the writers are:

Hon. Edward Everett,	George Ticknor, Esq.,
A. A. Gould, M. D.,	George S Hillard, Esq.,
Charles C. Hazewell, Esq.,	A. A. Hayes, M. D.,
T. M. Brewer, M. D.,	Nathan Hale, Jr., Esq.,
Capt. G. S. Blake, U. S. N. Acd.,	J. Esten Cooke, Richmond Va.,
Dr. J. W. Palmer, Baltimore, Md.,	Prof. J. P. Holcombe, Univ. Va.
W. G. Simms, of South Carolina,	Prof. Cutting of Rochester.

The Importance of the Work.

It is nearly thirty years since a CYCLOPÆDIA was published in this country; since that time we have doubled both our population and our area—peopled the Gold Regions—Discovered a New Continent—gone through a War—buried our third generation of great Statesmen, in Clay, Calhoun, Webster and Benton—built towns like Chicago—all our Railways—our Ocean Steamers—our Iron Houses—invented the Photograph—the Electric Telegraph and the Lightning Press—introduced Cheap Postage—Steel Pens—Gummed Envelops—Lucifer Matches—Ice—Omnibuses—Chloroform, etc., etc. These matters will be all dealt with in this work.

Some of the Reasons.

For Subscribing for Appletons' New American Cyclopædia.

1. It is truly American in its character.
2. It is a work which everybody needs.
3. It is learned and comprehensive, yet clear and succinct.
4. It is new and original.
5. It is rich in biography of the living as well as the dead.
6. It is a storehouse of facts and data on all branches of knowledge.
7. It excels all other works of the kind, in richness, variety and extent.
8. It is the book for the Planter and the Former.
9. It treats on Agriculture in all its branches.
10. It supersedes the necessity of purchasing many books.
11. It saves much time and labor.
12. It states facts without attempting to bias the judgment.
13. It maintains perfect neutrality in all matters of mere speculation.
14. It is a book of entertainment as well as instruction.
15. It is a treasury of knowledge in all branches of the arts and sciences.
16. Its religious articles are truthful, and free from bigotry and partiality.
17. It observes a strict neutrality in treating of the great political questions of the age.
18. No one desiring knowledge can afford to do without it.
19. It is the easiest way of securing a useful and extensive library.
20. It is exceedingly cheap.
21. Thousands have examined the volumes already issued, and have expressed great satisfaction, both as to the matter and the manner of execution.
22. The high character of the publishers guarantees its satisfactory completion.
23. No parent can bequeath a better legacy to his children.
24. Its daily perusal will contribute more to the intellectual advancement of the young than all the novels in the world.
25. The publishers' pledge, given in the prospectus, will be promptly and fully redeemed.

Ten Thousand Subscribers are already obtained, and among them the following:

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

CERTIFICATES OF THE UNIVERSAL SUCCESS OF THESE MACHINES in this State have been published, and of

OVER 500 SOLD IN THIS REGION,

The undersigned is not aware that any is out of repair.

SINGER'S FAMILY AND PLANTATION MACHINE combined, cannot be excelled for fine work, and sews with equal facility a leather trace, and is WARRANTED THREE YEARS, even in the charge of negroes.

SEWING MACHINE PREMIUMS.

The fact that the American Institute, and many leading State Fairs have at different times awarded the FIRST PREMIUM to the Avery Sewing Machine, and to other worthless Sewing Machines, when in competition with all the best Sewing Machines, proves that the decision of a Committee of Examiners is no evidence of the superiority of a Sewing Machine. For this reason, I. M. Singer & Co. have not recently contended for the Premium at a Fair, nor have they authorized their agents to do so, but in a very few instances the agents have exhibited the Machines and have been successful.

The First Premium of the State of New York

WAS

AWARDED TO SINGER'S SEWING MACHINE,

At the State Fair in Syracuse,

IN OCTOBER, 1858.

There has not been a State Fair in Albany for five years. The FIRST PREMIUM was also awarded to Singer's Machine at the late Fair at Memphis, Tennessee.

The FIRST PREMIUMS awarded to Singer's Machine at the American Institute, at the Exposition Universalin Paris, and the leading Mechanical Associations in the United States, are on exhibition at 33 Camp street.

Mention is not made of these Premiums as evidence of the superiority of the Singer Machine, but to prevent the public from being deceived by the false statements of the agents of other machines.

The ONLY RELIABLE EVIDENCE OF THE SUCCESS of Sewing Machines is the CERTIFICATES OF THOSE WHO USE THEM.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Patience and Perseverance.

"Ma! O ma! Please give me an orange," said a little boy to his mother; whose attention being occupied with other matters, took no notice of the little fellow. "Ma! I want an orange. Ma! ma! please to give."

"Come here Arthur," said his aunt Jane, who was sitting, unseen, in a quiet corner of the room, and who had heard the child's oft repeated request. "Come here, I want to speak to you."

Arthur came instantly, and looking up in his aunt's face, waited to hear what she had to say; perhaps he rather expected she would give him the orange. His large blue eyes opened wider and wider, they looked as if nothing less than an orange would satisfy them.

"———do you not see that ma is busy now and cannot attend to you? Remember you are nearly six years old and should have more patience."

"Patience," said Jane, what's dat?" said Arthur

"Patience! why patience means 'wait a while,' and sometimes it means wait a long—long—while, and do not be in a hurry. Now do you know what patience is?"

"O yes, aunt; wait a long—long—while, and don't be in a hurry," said Artie.

"Yes dear, that is it; and now that you understand it so well, sit down and do not trouble your ma."

Arthur quietly obeyed, and for some time seemed lost in thought. Patience was rather a hard lesson for a boy of six summers to learn; but his aunt's words seemed to have made the impression she wished; for, having waited quietly some time, he got up, resumed his play, and the orange seemed to be forgotten.

A few days after, Arthur was playing in the room where his aunt was sewing; tired of running about he took a skeleton map of Europe that his father had given him the Christmas before and began to put it together; a feat which he had often performed alone and of which he was very proud, frequently calling his aunt to admire the ease with which the pieces fitted into each other. But this time, alas! alas! the whole powers of Europe seemed to have declared war, offensive and defensive; he turned the pieces upside-down and down-side-up, length-wise and cross-wise, side-wise and corner-wise, all in vain! Greece found herself close to the White Sea, and England took up her position in the Mediterranean; France invaded the domains of Russia, and Norway tried hard to push her cold nose into the sunny vales of Italy.

It was a plain case, all Europe was convulsed, and Artie could not set it right; he tried and tried; but it seemed as if the harder he pushed the pieces, the less they seemed inclined to fit.

Poor Artie! his patience and temper both gave way; and, bursting into tears, he threw the pieces passionately from him, exclaiming, "I will never try to do it again. Never, never again."

"Fie, Artie! Fie!" said his aunt, coming to the rescue of the scattered pieces. "I thought you were too big a man to cry for such a little thing."

She took the sobbing child in her arms, and gently wiping the tears from the big blue eyes, soon succeeded in calming his ruffled spirit.

"Artie, do you remember what aunt Jane told you "Patience" was, the other day?"

"O yes, aunt; patience is, wait a while, and wait a long while too."

"Yes, darling, that is it exactly; and now listen while I tell you of something else that is just as useful as patience, perhaps even more necessary for a boy who has to fight the battle of life, and who ought to do it bravely. That other something is, Perseverance. It is a long word, I know, Artie; but I think I can make you understand what it means; will you try?"

"O yes, auntie; you know I always try to do what you bid me."

"Well, now listen; perseverance means—to do a thing again and again until you get it right—and never to give up. If you cannot do it right the first time, try again—but never give up. Now tell me what patience means?"

"I know, aunt Jane—I know," said Artie, looking much pleased at being able to understand such a long word. "I know quite well; it means "to try a ting adain and adain until you did it."

"Yes, darling; and now, suppose you and I were to try to put this map together—what would that be?"

"Perseverance, said Arthur, trying to make the little rosebud mouth say the big word; and, sitting down on the carpet, the child and aunt reconciled the contending powers of Europe in a much shorter time than Metternich and other older and wiser heads were able to do.

About a week or two after the above scene, a fine barrel of apples made their appearance; ripe, ruddy russets. Apples that would have snapped their fingers at Jack Frost, only they had not the fingers to snap. Any how, they smiled and turned their rosy cheeks to him, as much as to say, "try your powers upon that." O! what lovely apples they were! and truth to tell, Arthur loved apples even better than oranges.

"Ma, give me another apple; O ma, please give me another. I have had but two; and Jenny has had four!" His ma was as usual busy, and Arthur's request was perhaps not even heard.

Aunt Jane, still sewing in her quiet corner, wondered if her hero-in patience was quite forgotten; and Arthur still continued; "ma, please ma; O ma, do give me another."

Aunt Jane could bear it no longer—it was one thing to preach patience, and another to exercise it; she jumped up, caught the little fellow by his two hands, and looking at him, said "Artie, have you forgotten what patience is?"

The child looked sweetly up in her face, his blue eyes beaming with light and intelligence, fun and frolic seemed to be playing hide and seek in the dimple of his chin, and innocently answered—"O no, auntie, but I wasn't thinking of dat; I was thinking of de other thing—" to try adain and adain until you det it."

His ma and aunt laughed heartily at Artie's practical application of perseverance; and you may be sure, he had as many apples as he wanted.

And now, dear little readers for the moral of my tale, for it has a moral, simple as it is. You have all by nature sinful and polluted hearts; but God has promised, if you only ask Him to give you clean hearts, pure hearts, holy hearts, new hearts—hearts that will delight in loving, serving and fearing Him. Jesus told Nicodemus, "except a man be borne again he cannot see the Kingdom of God" which simply means, that without this new heart you never can go to heaven. Then do not let another day pass without asking your Heavenly Father, for Christ's sake, to give you this new heart. Unlike an earthly parent, His ear is ever open. He will be sure to hear and answer your prayer; but remember, you must, like little Artie, ask perseveringly—Ask again and again, and "never give up until you get it."

AUNT JANE.

A Letter from a Little Creole Girl.

DEAR MR. EDITOR.—You are so kind to little children and write so many pretty stories for them to read, and ask us to write to you, so I have asked my mamma to write to you for me. I am very glad when mamma gets the Advocate, and always want to hear what you say to children. I am a little Creole girl. I cannot write or read very well. I have no sister, but have a dear little brother, whom I love very much. He is five years old—I am six. We both go to Sunday School. I am so glad to go there and learn about that dear Saviour, who died and hung on the cross that I and all might go to heaven. I have learned the ten commandments, the creed and the Lord's prayer. We have a good Sunday School, and our superintendent, Mr. John C. Gordy, is so good and kind, I love him very much. He gave me the minister's prize for good behaviour. I am going to be a good girl, and do all the good advice you gave little children in your new year. Mamma thinks my letter is long enough, so you like short letters the best, so I must stop; but first let me wish you a happy new year; and now I will tell you good bye. From your little friend,

AIMELINA CARLIN.

The Crying King.

The King of Prussia has not been much improved by the "ides of Italy," if we may credit the following account from a Florence correspondent, of his eccentric behavior at the dinner table: The royal patient was perfectly sane all day, received his guests, chatted, laughed, and was quite jolly; the dinner was announced, the company marched in, the King of course took his place at the head of the table, and everybody waited for him to set the example to put their spoons in their mouths. But instead of doing what was expected of him, his Majesty deliberately washed his face in the soup, and then sat complacently smiling on his friends, the long strings of vermicelli hanging down over his eyes and nose and in his hair and moustache. You may imagine the effect. No one dared to laugh, however, and they had to sit out the dinner with this ridiculous figure head covered with gravy, (for he refused towels) talking to them all the while.

Wondrous matter of daily astonishment to me—[illegible] came from Heaven to earth for [illegible] rise from earth to Heaven

WHEAT OR TARES?

"Wheat or tares—which are you sowing, Fanny dear, in the mind of this little fellow?" said Uncle Lincoln to his niece, Mrs. Howard, and he lifted a child, not beyond his fourth summer, upon his knee, and laid one of his hands amid the golden curls that fell about his neck, and clustered about his snowy temples.

"Wheat, I trust, Uncle Lincoln," replied Mrs Howard, smiling, yet serious. "It is the enemy who sows tares—and I am his mother."

There was a glow of proud feeling in the countenance of Mrs. Howard, as she said "I am his mother."

It was Mr. Lincoln's first visit to his niece since her marriage and removal to the city, some hundred miles away from her old home

"Even a mother's hand may sow tares," said the old gentleman. "I have seen it done many times. Not of design, but in thoughtless inattention to the quality of seeds she held in her hand. The enemy mixes tares with the wheat quite as often as he scatters evil seed. The husbandman must not only watch his fields by night and day, but also the repositories of his ground, lest the enemy cause him to sow tares as well as wheat, upon his own fruitful ground."

"Willie," said Mrs. Howard, speaking to her little boy, but ten minutes afterwards, "don't upset my work-basket, stop! I say, you little rogue!"

Seeing that the wayward child did not mean to heed her words, the mother started forward, but not in time to prevent the spools of cotton, scissors, emery, cushion, etc. from being scattered about the floor.

Willie laughed in great glee at his exploit, while Mrs. Howard gathered up the contents of the work-basket, which she now placed on the shelf above the reach of her mischievous boy. Then she shook her finger at him in mock resentment, saying—

"You little sinner! If you do that again, I'll send you off with the milkman."

"Wheat or tares, Fanny?" Uncle Lincoln looked soberly at his niece.

"Neither," replied Mrs. Howard, smiling gayly.

"Tares," said Uncle Lincoln, emphatically.

"Nonsense, Uncle!"

"The tares of disobedience, Fanny. You have planted the seed, and it has already taken root. Nothing will choke out the wheat sooner. The tares of falsehood you also throw in upon the newly broken soil. What are you thinking about my child?"

"The tares of falsehood, Uncle Lincoln!—What are you thinking about?" said Mrs. Howard, in real surprise.

"Did you not say that you would send him off with the milkman if he did that again? I wonder if he believed you?"

"Of course he did not."

"Then," said Uncle Lincoln, "he has already discovered that his mother makes but light account of the truth. Will his mother be surprised if he should grow up to set small value on his word?"

"You treat the matter too seriously, Uncle. He knows that I am only playing with him."

"He knows that you are telling him what is not true," replied Mr. Lincoln.

"It was only in sport," said Fanny, persistently.

"But in sport with sharp edged instruments—playing with deadly poison." The old gentleman looked and spoke with the seriousness that oppressed his feelings. "Fanny! Fanny! truth and obedience are good seeds; falsehood and disobedience are tares from the Evil One. Whatever you plant in the garden of your child will grow, and the harvest will be wheat or tares, just as you have sown."

Mrs. Howard did not reply, but her countenance took on a sober cast.

"Willie," said she, a few minutes afterwards, "go down to Jane and tell her to bring me a glass of water."

Willie, who was amusing himself with some pictures, looked up at hearing his name. But as he did not feel like going off to the kitchen, he made no response, but let his eyes turn to the pictures in which he had become interested.

"Willie!" Mrs. Howard spoke with decision, "did you hear me?"

"I don't want to go," said Willie.

"Go this minute!"

"I am afraid."

"Afraid of what?" inquired the mother.

"Afraid of the cat."

"No you are not. The cat never hurt you or anybody else."

"I am afraid of the milkman. You said he would carry me off."

"The milkman is not down stairs," said Mrs. Howard, her face beginning to crimson; "he only comes in the morning."

"Yes he is. I heard the wagon a little while ago, and he's talking with Jane now.—Don't you hear him?" said the little fellow with remarkable skill, having all the resemblance of truth in his tone and expression.

Mrs. Howard did not look towards her Uncle, she was afraid to do that.

"Willie," the mother spoke very seriously, "you know the milkman is not down stairs, and you knew that you are not afraid of the cat. What you have said therefore is not true; and it is wicked to utter a falsehood."

"Ho! ho!" laughed out the bright-eyed little fellow, evidently amused at his own sharpness, "then you are wicked, for you say that which is not true every day."

"Willie!"

"The milkman has not carried me off yet."

There was a world of meaning in Willie's face and voice.

"You hav'nt whipped me for throwing my cap out of the window."

"Willie!" ejaculated the astonished mother.

"D'ye see that!" and the young rebel drew from his apron pocket a fine mosaic breast-pin, which he had positively been forbidden to touch, and held it up with a mingled look of triumph and defiance.

"You little wretch!" exclaimed Mrs. Howard, "this is going too far;" and springing towards her boy, she grappled him in her arms and fled with her struggling burden from the room.

It was a quarter of an hour before she returned, alone, to the apartment where she had left her Uncle. Her face was sober, and her eyes betrayed recent tears.

"Wheat or tares, Fanny?" said the old man.

MINISTERS SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

The salaries of the clergy of the United States do not average five hundred dollars a year, and yet, as a class, their children are best educated, the most active, refined and elevated of the nation. With less culture, less mental power, there are men all over the land who earn from one to twenty-five thousand dollars a year. But look at the results. Taking them as they come, the biographies of a hundred clergymen who had families, show that of their sons, one hundred and ten became ministers; and of the remainder of the sons, by far the larger number rose to eminence as professional men, merchants and scholars.

As to the daughters, their names are merged in others; but there is a significant fact, which we do not remember to have seen noticed in that connection, that not only here, but in England, where titles are so highly prized, and the possession of "gentle blood" is a passport to high places, it is very often referred to as a matter of note, as indicating safety and respectability: "His mother was the daughter of a clergyman." We will venture the opinion, that three-fourths of the great men of this nation are not over two degrees removed from clergymen's families, or from families strictly religious. When it can be said of a man or woman that the father or grandfather was a clergyman, there is a feeling within us of a certain elevation of character, a kind of guarantee of respectability of blood, purity and integrity.—Hall's Journal of Health.

DEATH FROM WANT OF SLEEP.

The question, how long can a person exist without sleep? is one often-er asked than answered, and the difficulties of answering the question by experiment would seem to leave it forever unsolved. A communication to a British Society, would seem to answer the inquiry, in a description of a cruel mode of punishment peculiar to the Chinese. A Chinese merchant had been convicted of murdering his wife, and was sentenced to die by being deprived of sleep. This painful mode of death was carried into execution under the following circumstances:

The condemned was placed in prison under the care of three of the police-guard, who relieved each other every alternate hour, and who prevented the prisoner from falling asleep, night or day. He thus lived for nineteen days without enjoying any sleep. At the commencement of the eighth day his sufferings were so intense that he implored the authorities to grant him the blessed opportunity of being strangulated, guillotined, burned to death, drowned, garroted, shot, quartered, blown up with gunpowder, or put to death in any conceivable way which their humanity or ferocity could invent. This will give a slight idea of the horrors of death from want of sleep.

A GOOD WIFE.

In the eighty-fourth year of his age, Dr. Calvin Chapin wrote of his wife, who was a daughter of the younger president Edwards, "My domestic enjoyments have been, perhaps, as near perfection as the human condition permits. She made my home the pleasantest spot on earth to me. And now that she is gone, my worldly loss is perfect." How many a poor fellow would be saved from suicide, from the penitentiary, and the gallows, every year, had he been blessed with such a wife. "She made home the pleasantest spot on earth to me." What a grand tribute to that woman's love, and piety, and common sense! Rather different was the testimony of an old man, some three years ago, in the Tombs'-yard of New York city: "I didn't intend to kill my wife; but she was a very aggravating woman."—Let each wife enquire, "Which wife am I?" [Hall's Journal.

Humorous.

Legal Terms.

Tom strikes Dick over the shoulders with a rattan as big as your little finger. A lawyer, in his indictment, would tell you the story as follows: "And that whereas the said Thomas, at the said place, on the year and day aforesaid, in and upon the body of the said Richard, against the people of the State of Massachusetts, did make a most violent assault, and inflicted divers blows, kicks, cuffs, thumps, contusions, gashes, hurts, wounds, damages and injuries, in and upon the head, neck, breast, stomach, hips, knees, shins and heels of said Richard, with divers sticks, canes, poles, clubs, logs of wood, stones, daggers, dirks, swords, pistols, entlasses, bludgeons, blunderbusses, and boarding pikes, then and there held in the hands, fists, claws and clutches of him, the said Thomas."

An Editor that Did'nt get Elected.

Sledge, of the Athens Banner, who was a candidate for Town Clerk at Athens, thus notices his defeat at the recent municipal election: "A young man by the name of Sledge was distanced nineteen votes by his opponent. A great many promised to vote for him, but, like the man in New Orleans, several of them had bought "harps of a thousand strings," and staid at home to practice on their instruments. He has departed for the mountains of Hepsidam, where the whangdoodle roareth, but requests us to say that he is like the revolutionary soldier shot at Bunker Hill—

"I'm wounded, my friends,
But think I am not slain—
Just lay me down to bleed awhile,
I'll rise and fight again!"

The next time you play (old) Sledge, see that you have five Jacks in hand. The fact is, our young friend is a trump, and ought to have been elected; but popular editors are generally kept upon the tripod. [Aug. Con.

A Negro Sentinel.

Theodore Parker, in a recent lecture on Washington, at Boston, repeated the following anecdote, related to him by an old soldier, who vouched for its truth: At Cambridge, Gen. Washington had heard that the colored soldiers were not to be depended upon for sentries. So one night when the pass word was "Cambridge," he went outside the camp, put on an overcoat, and then approached a colored sentinel. "Who goes there?" cried the sentinel. "A friend," replied Washington. "Friend, advance, unarmed, and give the countersign," said the colored man. Washington came up and said "Roxbury." "No, sar!" was the response. "Medford," said Washington. "No, sar!" returned the colored soldier. "Charlestown," said Washington. The colored man immediately exclaimed, "I tell you, Massa Washington, no man go by here 'out he say Cambridge." Washington said "Cambridge," and went by, and the next day the colored gentleman was relieved of all further necessity for attending to that particular branch of military duty.

The Medical Faculty in France.

The Allopaths and the Homœopathe have been before the French courts, the latter having sued the former on account of some ferocious attacks upon the memory of their great patron saint, Hahnemann. The evidence as well as the arguments were of quite an amusing character, and, after hearing all, the judges unanimously determined that, as they knew nothing about the matter at the commencement of the trial, and rather less than nothing after they had heard both sides, homœopathy, being an innovation, must be an impostore. So its disciples were coolly sent about their business, after being politely invited to pay the costs of these interesting and eminently instructive proceedings. The New York Express, which gives the details of the trial, says: "It was rather cruelly observed that the homœpathic system is the best, inasmuch as the homœopathists make fewer victims than the allopathists; their treatment being perfectly neutral and permitting nature to act for itself. The fact has been recognised that the globules of Hahnemann may act upon the imagination of the patient, but here allopathy triumphantly steps forward and claims this principle as its own. An anecdote of the famous Dr. Trousseau was related in support of this theory. Trousseau had a patient, whose nervous system was, she thought (nlady of course) completely shattered. Other physicians were so stupid as to inform her that she was only ill in her own conceit. Trousseau was much more amiable than his predecessors, found his patient worse than she herself imagined, and promised to combat the malady. After preparing a few pills, made of flour and rolled in gum arabic, he sent them in a box carefully sealed, with express orders not to open the box, as this terrible medicine could only be administered by the hand of the doctor himself. The next day Dr. Trousseau called, solemnly opened the box, caused his patient to swallow the contents, and the cure was complete."

Scene in a School Room.

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican is responsible for the following:

"Come here, George, I wish to examine you in punctustion. What is that?"

George—"That? that's a comma."

Mistress—"Right; now what's that?"

George—"Ah! now you've got me where my hair's short; I dun kno."

Mistress—"George, I do not wish you to use any slang phrases here. When you are unable to give correct replies, say so, but do not repeat such phrases as that which you have just used. Now, what's that?"

George—"I dun kno."

Mistress—"Don't know what that is? Why that's a period."

George—(Looking critically at the point in question.) "Ha! ha! ha! New I have got you where your hair's short; that aint nuthin, only a fly dirt!"

Mistress—(Re-examining critically.) "George, you are dismissed."

Spurgeon's Wit.

Spurgeon sometimes gets off a good thing out of the pulpit. A London letter to the Portland State of Maine says: A brother minister called to see him one day, rang the bell, and when the servant came to the door, the Reverend told him to inform Mr. S. that a servant of the Lord wished to have an interview with him. The message was delived to Mr. Spurgeon. "Hum; ha, servant of the Lord—tell the person I can't see him, I am very busy with his master."

Clerical Punning.

Parson Twiss, of New Hampshire, had just married a lady whose Christian name was Desire, and it being in his course of remarks on a certain Sabbath to illustrate the difference between the renewed and unrenewed man in the exercise of love, he delivered himself, to the amusement of his audience, in this way: "Formerly I had no Desire to love, but now I have a Desire to love, and I love freely."

An Italian Post-Office.

The way they manage the post-office at Rome, Italy, is queer, rather. A comedian recently applied for a letter at the post-office, and was told there were forty cents to pay for it. "I can't pay that," said he, "for I know what's in it." "Well, how much will you give?" asked the postmaster. "Four sous is all it is worth to me," said the comedian. "Well, take it then," replied the postmaster, "for I've read it, and it's only a loveletter!"

The Privilege.

One of the deacons of a certain Church asked the bishop if he usually kissed the bride at weddings. "Always," was the reply. "And how do you manage when the happy pair are negroes?" was the next question. "In all such cases," replied the bishop, "the duty of kissing is appointed to the deacons!"

Putting a Fine Point upon It.

A boarding school Miss, deeming "eat" a word somewhat too vulgar for refined ears, thus circumlocuted it, "I inserted some nutritious pabulum into the denticulated orifice below my nasal protuberance, which, being masticated, peregrinated through the cartilaginous cavities of the larynx, and was finally domiciliated in the receptacle fur digestible particles."

Eleven Spoons.

An uncle left in his will eleven silver spoons to his nephew, adding: "If I have not left him the dozen, he knows the reason."

The fact was, the nephew had some time before stolen a spoon from his relative.

Branches Taught.

The Common School Trustees of a town in Indiana say, in a recent report—"No common schools—all uncommon. Branches taught, Euchre, poker, old sledge, vulgarity and profanity."

Attachment.

"I am sorry to say," said the sheriff to a handsome young widow, "that I have an attachment for you." "I am happy to say, sir, that it isn't mutual."

Socrates.

Seeing a scolding wife who had hanged herself on an olive tree, exclaimed: "Oh, that all trees would bear such fruit!"

Love and Affection.

A deed was recorded not long ago in the Recorder's office in Cincinnati, in which the consideration was expressed, "for love and affection and $43,000."

Debts in China.

Every man in China must pay his debts at the beginning of the year, and also at the time of a religious festival about the middle of the year. If unable to settle at these times, his business stops until his debts are paid. Wonder how such a just observance might suit the United States?

Garden, Farm and Plantation.

Always Propagate from the Best.

This is true policy. The best seeds, plants and animals should always be sought for planting and breeding. Though the first cost may be greater, it is far more profitable to cultivate the best vegetables, grains, etc., than the ordinary kinds. The marketable value of the product, if well cultivated and preserved, is always more remunerative than "poor trash," badly grown by careless cultivators. And the same is true in regard to Domestic Animals.

The true course is to breed from the best, whatever may be the expense in the beginning; for it costs little more to raise to any given age a good animal than it does an inferior one—while the former may be ten times as profitable as the latter.

The wide awake, experienced farmer knows that it is nearly as easy and cheap to produce an animal worth $100, as it is to raise one which will sell for only or less than half that amount—and moreover that in so doing his dividends are not only handsome, but in laudable pride is gratified, and his pleasure measurably enhanced. Indeed, the best breeds of animals, the best grains and seeds, the best plants and trees, the best and most productive varieties, the best implements and models of culture, all these are essential to successful, profitable Agriculture. Think of the oft repeated truisms, reader, in making your selections of seeds, plants, fruits, and stock-animals, and, consider, before deciding, whether it is not wise to always propagate from the best. [Rural New Yorker.

New Mode of Wheat Culture.

A writer in the Genesee Farmer says that he has tried the cultivation of wheat in hills like corn, having the hills two feet apart each way, and two or three plants to the hill. And he reports obtaining from a small plot of ground a crop so large as to be equal to 200 bushels to the acre. The soil is kept stirred and cultivated during the growth of the crop.

Bread Cake.

Three cups of very light bread dough; three cups of sugar; one cup of butter; three eggs; a nutmeg and a coffee-cup full of raisins; one teaspoonful of saleratus, dissolved in a little hot water. Rub the butter and sugar together, then add the eggs and spice, and mix thoroughly with the dough. Beat it well, and let it stand to rise.

To Keep Milk Sweet.

Half a teaspoonful of pure carbonate of soda, dissolved in water, mixed with four quarts of milk, will keep it sweet for four or five days, without giving it any unpleasant flavor.

Worth Knowing.

The black sulphate of silver which forms on plated and silver ware, door-plates and knobs, may at once be removed by wiping the surface with a rag wet with aqua ammonia—spirits of hartshorn—and without the trouble of rubbing and scouring with polishing-powder.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

THOMAS LASSITER died at the residence of his father at Beuff Prairie, Franklin Parish, Louisiana, in the twenty-first year of his age. For two years he has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He has left behind, a bereaved wife to mourn her loss; but she mourns not as one without hope, for he has left a lasting testimonial behind that he has changed this mortality for a lasting immortality in the bright realms above. JOHN BOWLES and EMORY THOMAS, children of E. T. and Helen Glenn, and grandsons of Rev. J. B. Glenn, formerly of South Carolina Conference. John Bowles died, aged five years, on the 3d ult. near Auburn, Alabama, of ulceration of the throat; and, on the 10th ult. Emory Thomas, aged two years and ten months. Words cannot express the loss the parents of these lovely little boys, feel; nor can another trust himself to speak of a providence so mysterious. Yet we know our Father doeth all things for the best; and we trust grace will be given the parents, to support them under this painful dispensation.

Auburn, Ala. Jan. 17, 1859. W. E. M. LINFIELD.

A. CAYCE WISE, in his 17th year, second son of Joseph and Sarah Wise, shot himself in attempting to take up his gun, which was lying on the bed; the contents passed through his bowels and came out at his back. He immediately gave the alarm; his father ran to him, and found him lying upon the floor. He exclaimed, "Papa, I am shot, and shall die! Pray for me. Send for Uncle Brown and Hunman" (ministers). They were there in a short time; and, with other sympathizing friends, united in earnest, fervent prayer for his salvation. He lived ten hours, retaining his mind clear to the last; every minute was spent in prayer for pardon, and preparation for death. He confessed his sins; told his friends not to weep but to pray for him. He was not excited. Looked death heroically in the face. Told his weeping father, he did trust in Christ. He died calmly like one going to sleep. Next day he was followed to his early grave by a large concourse of weeping friends. His death has caused a deep sensation in the community. He was an intelligent and moral youth; revered by pious parents; and, though not a professor at the time he was shot, may we not hope that the prayers of his parents and the incessant pleadings of the many pious friends who stood around him for ten hours, together with his own importunate, penitential entreaties, were heard and answered? Was there not a providence in his being permitted to live ten hours perfectly conscious? It should teach a lesson of caution to the young to beware how they handle fire-arms; but, beyond this, it should teach them to be ready to meet death, whether from natural or unnatural causes. Ten hours may not be allowed them after accident or attack of disease. They may be cut down in a moment. Terrible thought! All unprepared it may be. A sister furnishes the following lines:

"Dearest brother thou hast left us,
Here thy loss we deeply feel;
But, 'tis God that hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal.
Yet again we hope to meet thee,
When the day of life is fled;
There, in heaven above to greet thee,
Where no farewell tear is shed.

DR. HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITters have doubtless created as much sensation in the community for its remarkable cures as any other medicine extant. It is a fact that in the minds of many persons a prejudice exists against what are called Patent Medicines; but why should this prevent you resorting to an article that has such an array of testimony to support it, as Hostetter's Bitters? Physicians prescribe it; why should you discard it? Judges, usually considered men of talent, have and do use it in their families; why should you reject it? THE CHURCHES OF SCOTLAND.

HAVING in my last got as far as Dublin, and being, in consequence, once more at sea, it is necessary that we should go back, and (as sailors say,) bring up our leeway.

Scotland, as has been said, is emphatically a Presbyterian country; for while all the denominations here, as elsewhere, have an existence and representation, yet so prominent and overwhelming are the numbers who adhere to the Presbyterian form of worship and doctrine, that other denominations, when all added together, appear as a small moiety of the people. Let us, therefore, take a glance at the subject according to its distinctive appellations, and we have first the CHURCH OR KIRK OF SCOTLAND.

This church, from its doctrine, discipline and form of government, claims an existence from the time of the Reformation—though its actual organization into its present status, dates only from about 1638 to 1688-92, when, by the Solemn League and Covenant, the General Assembly of the Church and Parliament of Scotland pledged "their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor" to its perpetual maintenance. At the union of Scotland with England in 1700, to form the present kingdom of Great Britain, it was one of the stipulations of union that "the doctrine of the Confession of faith, with its Presbyterian form of church government and discipline, as then in use, shall remain and continue unalterable;" and so it has, ever since. The whole of Scotland is divided into thirty-three counties, and each county subdivided into parishes; and each parish, by the original law of the church and parliament, is provided with a minister and teacher at the expense of the lands in the parish; and, as all the real estate is in the hands of a very few individuals, the tax of supporting their minister and teacher is never felt or known by the people generally. There were 963 parishes in Scotland, and the united parliament has since added forty-two more—paying the salaries of these last out of the Exchequer—making 1005 churches or parishes in all, as belonging to the kirk or established church of Scotland. But besides these, there are many (I am not able to say how many) chapels of ease, or quoad sacra churches, to be found in all the populous districts of Scotland, which (being auxiliary to the parish churches in which they are found), though not parishes, have all the functions and peculiarities of parish churches. The minimum salary of each minister is, a house and glebe, (several acres of land,) and £150 ($750) per annum. Some parishes are much wealthier than others, and the salaries, in consequence, often double the minimum in amount—while not a few exceed even that. The ministers are called to a particular parish or church and settled for life; and before 1843 it was rare to make changes. By usurpation in feudal times, and use since, the right to a living in any parish, when it becomes vacant, has become vested in the crown, a nobleman, or gentleman, etc.; so that the patron, having the right of presentation to the vacant parish, can give the call to whom he pleases—the incumbent being a licentiate of the church of Scotland. Of the nine hundred and sixty-three parishes, in only five of them have the people the right to call their own minister, without the intervention of any patron. Of the remainder, two hundred and eighty-nine are in the crown, five hundred and eighty-one in individual noblemen and gentlemen, fifty-two in Town Councils, ten in Universities, and thirty-one in the crown and individuals jointly. The convocations of the church are General Assemblies, Synods and Presbyteries; there being one of the first, sixteen of the second, and eighty-four Presbyteries. There is also a Synod of the church of Scotland in England, with three Presbyteries. The celebrated Dr. Cumming belongs to the London Presbytery. There are three Synods in Canada and thirteen Presbyteries, two Synods in Australia, with missionaries in India, West Indies, etc., in connection with the church of Scotland. But it is time that we should now bring up the

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

This church had its origin in 1843; and found its necessity for existence from the manner of exercising the rights of patronage. A majority of the Church of Scotland had always contended, I believe, that the people of the vacant parish should also (besides the patron) give their call before the Presbytery was under the necessity of ordaining and inducting the presentee to the living; but for some years previously to 1843, cases had occurred where, upon the application of the patron, this view of the Church was entirely set aside by the Supreme Court of the land, by ordaining and commanding the Presbytery to induct the nominee of the patron independently of the wishes of the people, or the claims of spiritual rights of the Church in the premises. The whole question being a conflict between the de facto legal rights of patrons and the de jure spiritual rights of Christ's people and ministers. There were various instances of conflict, but the leading cases were those of Murnoch and Auchterardar. The Church appealed to Parliament, but only to have the decision of the Court of Session confirmed. Whereupon the majority of the General Assembly—and they were the elite and strength of the Church—on the first day of the session in 1843 entered and read their protest against the usurpation of the civil authority in spiritual things; and, with the moderator at their head, left the place of united convocation, repaired to Tunfield Hall, constituted the Free Church of Scotland, and thereby formed such a secession as had never before been known in Scotland—if, indeed, it has ever had its parallel elsewhere. It was indeed a sight of the moral sublime to behold four hundred and seventy-four ministers, men of families, many of them old and greyheaded, voluntarily forsaking comfortable livings and throwing themselves, with their families, upon what, to them, was truly an untried and precarious experiment—the voluntary contributions of their people. But the heart of the people was in the movement, and they found favor every where. The vacancies were soon filled up, (though the people came out where the minister staid in,) and the residue being regarded as submitting to another Head than Christ to their Church, became objects of attack and animadversion on every side. The number of the Free Church ministers also increased by licensure and adherence from other bodies, and great was the cloud of witnesses. In this movement the late Dr. Chalmers was the leading spirit; who, having been invited to deliver addresses frequently at the missionary anniversaries of the Wesleyans, had familiarized himself with the temporal economy and fiscal operations of that body of Christians; and from their system he devised and perfected a plan of monetary arrangements suitable to his own communion; which, in being carried out, has since become eminently successful all over Scotland. (The minimum paid to ministers of this Church out of the sustentation fund, for the last year, was £138—$690; while the maximum, by supplement from the congregation, exceeded even some of the highest in the establishment.) Dr. C. and his brethren set to work immediately, preaching out of doors to the people everywhere—convoking and addressing them as to their plan of operations—buying sites, erecting churches and manses (preachers' houses) in all the parishes from which they had come out, and wherever there was a seceding body in a parish to justify it—building school houses, establishing schools, etc. etc.; so that, at this present time, the Free Church, it is believed, has almost, if not entirely, duplicate ministers (and in most, teachers,) for every parish in Scotland supplied by the establishment. The schools of the Free Church have greater character for thoroughness and efficiency than those of the establishment. Indeed, the Free Church is, in the estimation of your correspondent, in character, usefulness and popularity, (though not in name, or law,) the Church of Scotland. Their doctrine, discipline and government are identically the same—their difference consisting, substantially, in what is above narrated. There is no telling—the day of eternity will alone declare it—how much good the organization and labors of the Free Church have effected among the masses of the people in Scotland; and the good they have done is by no means confined to their own body—it has reached even to others. It infused new life into other denominations; and their example, though there was at first much of bitterness between the two churches, has so much provoked even the establishment to "good works," that that venerable institution, in schools or education, sunday schools, missions, etc. etc., appears almost as a new church compared with what it was thirty years ago and is now far beyond what it was even ten years ago; for it is now a much more laborious and spiritual church than it was at either of those periods. I never heard a more faithful and spiritual sermon from a Methodist preacher than I did from Rev. D. Milne, of Gilcomston, in September last. They have not yet provoked each other to "love," but it is greatly to be hoped that that also will soon follow. The Free Church (as compared with the establishment) has more extensive colonial churches, (synods, presbyteries, etc.,) in connection with it in Canada, Australia, West Indies, India, etc., and missionaries to the Jews, in Africa, India, etc.

Thus you see that there are two regularly organized, fully equipped Presbyterian Churches all over Scotland, without a shadow of variation in doctrine, discipline or government—except as above explained. But it is now time that we should see another, viz:

THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

This is another extensive body of Presbyterians. They have no General Assembly, their Synod being their highest judicatory. They have thirty-one Presbyteries; but some of them are very large, the Presbytery of Glasgow having more than sixty churches and ministers within its bounds. This Church had its organization in 1846-7, three years after the formation of the Free Church, on the principle that in union there is strength. It was formed by a union of the Secession and Relief Churches, two bodies who differed very little in the time or reasons for their dissent from the establishment. The Seceders took their rise about 1719, and were rendered famous by the cases of Ralph and Ebenezer Erskine, etc., whose opinions, that the offers of salvation were to be made to all men, and the fulfilment of the law as a rule of life, in the bands of Christ, to believers, the dominant majority in the establishment would not tolerate. They were a large and respectable body of Presbyterians in 1846; very strict in their views, doctrines and practices. The Relief body had its rise in about 1752-61, and was, like the Secession, another schism from the establishment, because of a difference of opinion as to the rights of induction and settlement of a minister against the will of the people. The object of the Relief Presbytery, was to assist oppressed congregations, etc. The principles of the two were nearly alike, and believing that they could be more useful and successful in the purposes of the christian ministry, they united, as above intimated. They have now in the united church over five hundred ministers and churches, and minister to nearly half a million of people. They have extensive colonial churches in Canada, West Indies, Australia, Africa, etc., etc. The United Presbyterian Church only, of the denominations already described, use a Hymn book—the two first confining themselves to the Psalms and paraphrases.

But we have next the

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH—

A body which took its rise about 1638 et seq. ann.; though the dissenters did not form a Presbytery until about 1743. The dissentients claimed that the establishment, as a Church of Christ, was not sufficiently reformed at the Revolution from the interference and power of the State in spiritual matters, or from the laxity in morals of many of the ministers who had become Presbyterians on the abrogation of prelacy. Hence their name, Reformed Presbyterians. They are very tenacious of their ancient customs and usages—sing only psalms, and those only of the oldest metre. They have one Synod and six Presbyteries in Scotland, about the same in Ireland, and more than both in the United States and Canada, with some missionaries in other places. They exist principally in the south-western part of Scotland, and may be said to be the successors of the Cameronians or Covenanters. But finally, we have also the Church of the

UNITED ORIGINAL SECEDERS—

Embracing one Synod and four Presbyteries, a body fewer in number than either of those last mentioned, but still found in regular organization in various parts of Scotland. They are, of course, the residue of the secession church which did not unite in the formation of the United Presbyterian Church in 1846-7.

We have thus five separate and distinct bodies of Presbyterians—each having its own ecclesiastical order and designation in the land; but all being Presbyterian in their doctrine, discipline and church government. The Reformed Presbyterian Church does not hold to the Westminster confession of faith; but is nevertheless, as they all are, wholly Calvinistic in its doctrines. So we may at least expect that if Presbyterianism, as a distinctive developement of Christianity, can make a people more religious than any other view of doctrine or mode of worship and government, surely we may look for it here, where the choice is among five regular bodies of Presbyterian Churches. If it be possible to be suited fully, as to church government and doctrinal belief, the very shade of an opinion may be satisfied here; but this is not so easy of accomplishment with this people, because they are great sticklers for their opinions, and are very tenacious of the very shade of their religious belief; and just as you advance to, and recede from, their view of doctrine, just so do you increase or diminish in their estimation. You must believe as they do, no matter what your experience is, before you can either fully enjoy religious intercourse with them, or they can feel much interest in you. Such contractedness of belief and practice has kept the people of God, in that country, widely apart, for centuries, and especially those who differ so little, in all that is essential to Christianity. The Free Church disruption, in 1843, with their labors and movements since, has done much towards bringing the denominations together, and the lay preaching of late, by men who are principally Episcopalians, and the union of all denominations in Aberdeen and elsewhere, in daily prayer meetings for a revival of God's work in their midst, indicate the dawn of a day of much greater brotherly kindness and charity. This complaint of exclusiveness, however, rests much more against the people than the preachers, as I consider the ministers far in advance of their people, in this respect. Besides the Presbyterians, the have a large number of Churches and ministers with a congregational union, all over Scotland. They are moderate Calvinists, some of them very moderate in their religious belief. Of late years another body has arisen, commonly styled "New Views" or "Morrisonians," but who term themselves "the Evangelical Union." They are Congregational in government, and Arminian in doctrine, and have been quite hateful, in doctrine at least, to their Calvinistic brethren. They have a goodly number of Churches and ministers, but I am not able with certainty to state what progress they are making, or what is the particular phase of their religious belief. Each of the Presbyterian Churches, the Congregational, and Evangelical Union Church, has, each, a Divinity Hall—same, two or three—for preparing and perfecting young men for the ministry.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

Has also an existence here; but though there are a good many Churches and ministers, yet they are so split up into parties because of differences of views as to prudential means or doctrines or government, that it is difficult to describe, or correctly estimate them. A. Campbell's "Christian system" is much mixed up with all their doctrines and practices.

THE SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CHURCH,

Which is hereu dissenting body, because Presbyterianism is the established religion, has seven dioceses, and a very respectable number of clergymen; but though respectable in point of intelligence and wealth, they are nevertheless an inconsiderable religious body in Scotland. The whole Church, it is believed, are high toned Puseyites.

LASTLY, THE ROMAN CATHOLICS,

Are also found in considerable numbers, reminding one forcibly of the Jacobins and the days of the Stuarts. They have four Bishops, and perhaps 150 clergymen; their members being principally Highlanders.

To sum up, the population of Scotland in 1857 was a little over 2,750,000, and if that number of inhabitants were served only by the 2000 Established and Free Church ministers, it would give a pastoral charge to each, of less than 1500 souls; but, when you consider the number and extent of the other Churches, you are at once astonished at the vast amount of pastoral labor expended year by year upon that people, and how few sheep each shepherd has to care for! Surely the pastors or the flocks, or both, have much to answer for in a coming day, for the want of spirituality and success.

METHODISM.

In that country has in a previous letter been adverted to, as never having, except in Mr. Wesley's day, been successful; and, besides the reasons already advanced why it has been so, I may add another conjecture, also, viz: that the Methodists have not been sufficiently aggressive in preaching their peculiar doctrines of holiness of heart and life as the only reliable proof of Bible election and predestination to individuals, for fear of exciting anew stronger prejudices against what Methodists are supposed to inculcate; and not sufficiently aggressive, either because they have like their neighbors become satisfied, and settle, down with particular congregations; these however, are conjectures. I will say, however, in this connection, that, in my settled conviction, the views of the Scotch people, generally, as to the sovereignty of God's grace in the entire work of human redemption, that it acts only irresistibly—are to be looked to as a reason for the absence of greater spiritual life and usefulness among themselves and throughout the world. The abuse of that doctrine acts as an incubus upon their devotions, and serves as an excuse for their barrenness Such adherence to religious principle as they evince, and devotion to opinions once believed, ought—with a proper sense of responsibility to God for a failure—and will at all times achieve greater things than they have yet accomplished.

DEAR BROTHER:—I am in receipt of a letter from the Celestial Empire, written by LIEW, a live Chinaman and a Methodist Preacher, associated with my son in preaching the Gospel of Christ to that idolatrous nation.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, October 18, 1858.

This letter is sent to the Rev. John R. Lambuth, asking after his health. Noble Teacher! though at a great distance, I think of you often, and trust God for his blessings to rest upon you, that your body may be strong, and continually in prayer and that God will hear and bless you in spirit.

I, your humble servant, hear that you, in your most favored country, in a great many places, preach the blessed Gospel of Jesus. Many have heard and attended to your instruction—therefore, there are many who have repented and become christians. In your beloved country the sound of the Gospel is heard everywhere. The number of those baptized every day is increased, it is all the abundant grace of God. Therefore, the Scripture saith: "Behold the fields! for they are white already to harvest; and he that reapeth receiveth wages and gathereth fruit unto eternal life; that both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together."

This word is fulfilled. In my country, for many years, we have had the true doctrine preached at the five Ports, and that daily and faithfully by many preachers, but those who believe are few. Notwithstanding so much preaching, the mandarins and people still worship idols and evil spirits, mud and wooden images, continually burning incense, hoping the idol will protect them in life, give them happiness, and after death, save soul and body from hell, and take them to the "Western Heavens," where they may enjoy forever blessedness. Both military mandarins and mandarins who govern the people, on the first and fifteenth of each month, diligently pray Bhudda, and all the spirits, to protect the whole empire and give peace to all, increase the fruits of the field, deter all danger, famines and sickness.

Though I, your unworthy servant, have seen in China for many years believers in Bhudda and worshippers of him, I have not seen one receive protection or happiness. Moreover, there are many thieves and highway robbers all over the land—many die of hunger, famine and pestilence. Therefore, where is Bhudda's power and protection? Now, in the ninth month of this year, I, together with your son, have been to many places, preaching and distributing books, and have seen many worshipers of Bhudda and other idols. It is so in all parts of the empire as it is in Shanghai; and I think it is the mercy and loving kindness of God that we are permitted to live, while we have so many wicked customs. Thus God manifests his glory and grace in giving us life. Now, many missionaries are speaking of the atoning love of Jesus Christ our Lord—the word of God and the Gospel of Jesus—that we may understand. Also, now the Emperor has opened the eighteen provinces, and has permitted us to go, preach, build churches, and explain the true doctrine to the people; that the false doctrine of China may be destroyed, and the true doctrine embraced by every one. We wish and pray to God that he would reveal himself to all, that all may repent and become new creatures. The Bible says that the "Kingdom of Heaven is like unto leaven which a woman hid in three measures of meal until the whole was leavened." I hope that in China it may be so. I, your humble servant, with your son, my brother, are ever in union with each other, as the foot and head. We meet and read together the word of God—in parting, repent and hope that we may all meet in heaven, for which cause we are continually meeting on earth.

Moreover, God has given your son, my dear brother, a meek and humble heart. He is daily preaching, with great distinctness, the word of God, and persuading men to live Godly lives. Often when raining and the wind blowing with great violence, he goes to preach, and I have never seen him regret exposing his body. Your dear daughter-in-law is daily teaching the little girls, and instructing them in the good doctrine of the Bible. Walter and Nettie, your grand children, are both good and excellent children—both strong and healthy.

God has also blessed us in our labors at Shanghai. Those who have been baptized, from the beginning up to the present time, are ten in all. Your dear son has already baptized seven.

My dear brother: I thank you for your many kind inquiries after my health, and always praying the blessing of God to rest upon me in every thing. Your unworthy servant is continually making supplication for you, that you may, in your old age, be blessed without measure. If you, my elderly instructor, do not fear the long journey, come to China and see the many wicked customs of the Chinese people. I shall be much rejoiced. I do not know whether your precious body can come or not.

All these words I send to you, and hope you, my elderly and respected instructor, John R. Lambuth, may be ever blessed. I send greeting and love to all your family, and hope all are well. I also send greetings to your Conference and the Church, and hope all are in health and peace.

I, who was born after you, am your humble servant.

JAMES ANDREW LIEW.

The above letter, written by LIEW, in the Chinese characters, was translated by my son; without which it would have been all Dutch to me. I keep this letter for a show to my friends. I have also a letter from my son, a few days later. His little daughter had been at the point of death from inflammation of the bowels. She may be dead. I am anxious to receive another letter that will give the result. Respectfully yours,

JOHN R. LAMBUTH.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI—No. VIII.

Original Baptist Church.

MR. EDITOR: On the return of Elder Curtis to his home in Mississippi, the voice of the oppressor had ceased in the land. The Stars and Stripes had been thrown upon the balmy winds of the Natchez country, and liberty of conscience was proclaimed to all. Our hitherto oppressed and down-trodden Baptist community met in Conference; and under the superintendence of their beloved Elder, Curtis, who presided as Moderator, organized themselves "in due and ancient form" into a regular Baptist Church. Their first Church was called Salem, and stood among the sources of the South Fork of Coles-creek in Jefferson county.

Arrangements were already in progress for the establishment of a Territorial Government in Mississippi, which were soon matured; and from thenceforth the Church had peace and protection from Papal oppression.

I did not, however, set out to write a history of the Baptist Church in Mississippi, but only to show its origin. I have felt it due to the general cause of truth, as well as the fair fame of worthy ancestors, who were the principal actors in the scenes I have described, to correct errors already extant, and to rescue from oblivion interesting facts which should be known to posterity. If ever the history of this branch of the general Church in Mississippi is correctly written, honorable mention will be made of Elder Curtis and his worthy co-adjutors, who breasted the opposition and persecution of the Papal Hierarchy for nearly eighteen years. With many of them I was well acquainted in my boyhood; and I then had, and yet have the most exalted opinion of the depth and uniformity of their personal piety, which had been nurtured in storms, and stood as firm as the mountain oak. So far as I know, they almost universally prayed with their families evening and morning. My own mother, who at an early date became a member of Salem Church, kept up prayer in her family for nearly twenty years previous to her death.

Early in the present century Elder Curtis died at the house of a friend on Beaver-creek in Amite county, where he had gone to seek relief from a cancer, that occasioned his death. His grave is unknown to his relatives.

"His ashes lie, no marble tells us where;
With his name, no board emblazons or sanctifies his song."

But his record is on high! He was a plain, blunt man, but his roughness suited the rough work he had to do.

His wife, "Aunt Puttie," as she was familiary called by the connection, survived, as a hale old lady, until about 1818 or 1819. She died in Jefferson county, and is buried on the plantation of Samuel Bowles, two miles east of Fayette.

The elder Stampleys, so far as I know, are all buried in the neighborhood of the old Salem Church.

My venerable grandfather, John Jones, fought many hard battles for his country and his church. He survived most of his companions in tribulation. He always prayed in his family evening and morning, and had an extra family service on the Sabbath, when the country was destitute of regular preaching. I remember him well, up to the seventeenth year of my age, as one of the most meek, exemplary, and deeply pious men I have ever known. He died on his little farm near Union Town in Jefferson county, upon which some of his descendants yet live, on the 10th of September, 1821, in the 77th year of his age. There he quietly sleeps, beside the wife of his youth and mother of his ten children, awaiting "the resurrection of the just." "These" and many more of the original Church, "all died in faith."

And though I believe Infinite Wisdom directed my youthful feet into another branch of the general Church where I have been more useful to my generation than I could have been any where else, I shall always feel grateful to these Primitive Baptists for the early and safe religious training I received through their instrumentality.

My next will refer to the origin of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Mississippi. Yours affectionately.

MINISTERIAL STUDY OF WORDS.

WORDS constitute the apparel in which the address or sermon goes before the public assembly. As a cleanly and tasteful appearance in the outer man is a recommendation to its possessor, so, a correct pronunciation and proper use of words always recommend the speaker to the favor of intelligent hearers.

The preacher, or the public speaker of any kind, may not possess the advantages of a finished education, and yet by a careful attention to the meaning and pronunciation of his words, he may attain to such accuracy of speech, as shall render him acceptable to congregations intelligent and refined.

But how is this accuracy to be attained? Well, we take for granted that, in accordance with the required course of study, the young preacher has become acquainted with the principles of English Grammar. Next let him look well to the words—the dress, in which he proposes to send out his ideas before the public. Let him read, study and prepare his sermons, with a dictionary always at hand; and whenever a word occurs that is doubtful, either as to import or pronunciation, let the dictionary be consulted. A professor in one of our Southern Colleges said, that if restricted to the use of only three books, he would take the Bible, Webster's Dictionary and Shakespeare.

When an intelligent hearer offers a criticism upon the use of any word, let not the speaker be mortified or offended. If the criticism be unjust there surely can be no ground for offence; and, if it be just, he should receive it gratefully and correct his error. A young brother, while preaching, made allusion to the ancient city of Itome, calling it the great Metropolis; one of his bearers, an elderly man, was puzzled to know who or what this great Metro-po-lis was—probably some ancient hero, of whom he had never read or heard. Presently, however, he solved the mystery—it was Metrop-o-lis the young preacher meant. After the sermon, as the preacher was stopping with him, the brother thought to call attention to the error, saying that he differed with him in the pronunciation of the word. Instead of feeling grateful for the correction, this young preacher took it in dudgeon, and left the house of the good brother grievously offended.

A preacher—a graduate too—making some allusion to the resurrection of the dead, used the spurious word resurred, or resurrected. Said an intelligent old gentleman, one of his hearers on the occasion referred to, "You can say raise, or raised, but there is no such word as resurrect in the English language. It is horrible." This was a rough criticism; but the young preacher took it kindly, and profited by it. It is equally at variance with the accurate use of words, to say suspicioned instead of suspected, or difficulted instead of perplexed. "Brethren" and "children" are words not difficult to pronounce, yet they are often brought out with a ring, and thereby most barbarously treated, as: "Brethring let us sing," "Childring of the heavenly King."

Hoping that some of our younger preachers, at least, may profit by the above suggestions, they are submitted, Mr. Editor, for your disposal. AMICUS.

THE BRAVE ENGINEER.

AT THE station in Syracuse, New York, there is assigned to Mr. Glenn the duty of arranging each day to which of the engines the several trains are to be assigned, so that as the hour of departure for each comes, the engine will be ready to take its burthen.

He was for a number of years an engineer in active service, distinguished for courage and prompt resolution. There are some instances of this, which, by their incidents, ought not to be omitted from the roll of the truly brave deeds done by men.

He was at his bar, his engine careering on with the speed that only steam's strength can give; the road was clear; the busy wheels kept their regular roll; the huge drivers beneath his feet made swift circling, and they who in the cars were borne onward, knew no obstacle in their journey. Everything moved on according to the card, and they who were by the roadside found the car marking, by its passage, the moment as accurately as if it was the hand of a great dial. Suddenly, he discovered a small object near the rail. The human vision grows sharp beyond the optician's art in such an instant. The object moved; assumed form, became only too apparent. It was a little girl playing with the dirt between the rails.

One may in the race pull the blooded horse to his haunches and in a brief space control his movement; that springing muscle has but a light weight to control; the backward paddle soon changes the course of the steamer; but this large engine, with its rather rush than roll, ponderous, powerful, in earnest in its motion that it must have great space of change, how shall this stop before it shall crush out of all form of life the feeble child? The play with the doll is of such importance that the little one does not hear the roar of the wheels, or if she does, it is the child of a cabin proximate to the rail, and the sound is a familiar one—it continues its play, and nearer by an advance that is the very step of death, the train comes toward it. Mr. Glenn determined in a test accuracy of judgment that his train could not stop in time! What if it was checked, and the speed that was measuring the mile by the very few minutes, diminished, the death blow by the swifter would be the more merciful—destruction was certain—the little one must meet the force that would crush it from the record of the living, and its play went on as it were at its mother's feet.

The brave man read the realities of the scene in an instant! He left his bar! The fireman's heart forgot to beat; as for the passengers, they were acting out the every day scenes of a common-place peaceable journey; perhaps the checked speed caused somebody to lay down his newspaper; of the intense scene without, he knew nothing.

He left his bar, and walked firmly over the top of the locomotive, over the boiler, past the smoke stack, he climbed over the front and down the step like framework of the pilot, and grasping that with a desperate strength, he leaned over! The bars of iron seemed to glide dizzily away beneath him, and now the struggle for the child was one between death and bravery, and as ever in this mortal time, the King of Terrors seemed to have all the advantage in his skeleton hand. He leaned over! he reached forward! and at the instant, at that period of time, (moment is too long a word to express this) as the cruel edges of the pilot was about to crush the little one, he, not the locomotive, struck the child; if ever there was a bold love touch this was one; and the child laid between the ties! and on the fast train darted. Then down went the brakes, the strong arm of the brakesman strained the wheel lever to crowd the delaying surface against the speed; then passengers aroused to find the train coming to a halt, while neither station nor tank was near, then this brave man trod his locomotive top back again, and as soon as the power of the advance could be subdued, jumped from his iron step and ran down the road; the wonder was that agitated limbs could move so fast, and here—there was the child, living, unharmed, not a bone broken, not quite recovered from its astonishment at the life-giving blow which had turned aside the dart of death.

Restored to its parents, who thronged around its deliverer, the little one too young to realize that it had quivered on the very verge of another world, was taken home, Mr. Glenn returned to his engine, and the locomotive careered to its grand progress with not a stain of blood upon its harnished metal.

And is not this the record of the deed of the highest order of bravery, the courage that saves life?

THE TURN OF LIFE.

FROM forty to sixty, a man who has properly regulated himself may be considered as in the prime of life. His matured strength of constitution renders him almost impervious to the attacks of disease, and experience has given his judgment the soundness of almost infallibility. His mind is resolute, firm and equal; all his functions are in the highest order; he assumes the mastery over business; builds up a competence to the foundation he has laid in early manhood, and passes through a period of life attended by many gratifications. Having gone a year or two past sixty, he arrives at a critical period in the road of existence; the river of death flows before him, and he remains at a stand still. But athwart this river is a viaduct called "The Turn of life," which, if crossed in safety, leads to the valley of "old age," round which the river winds and then flows beyond without boat or causeway to effect its passage. The bridge is, however, constructed of fragile materials, and it depends upon how it is trodden, whether it bend or break. Gout, apoplexy, and other bad characters also are in the vicinity to waylay the traveler, and thrust him from the pass; but let him gird up his loins and provide himself with a fitting staff, he may trudge on it safely with perfect composure. To quit metaphor, "The turn of Life," is a turn either into a prolonged walk or into the grave. The system and powers having reached their utmost expansion, now begin either to close like flowers at sunset or break down at once. One injudicious stimulant—a single futile excitement, may force it beyond its strength—while a careful supply of props, and the withdrawal of all that tends to force a plant, will sustain it in beauty and vigor until night has entirely set. [Science of Life.

A Washington letter says that the Hon. Robert J. Walker is soon to leave for California, to prosecute the suit in regard to the Almaden Mines, before the Supreme Court of that State. He is said to be engaged in behalf of the claimants, amongst whom he, himself, is numbered.

THE FAMOUS DEAD OF 18[illegible]

THE necrology for 1858 is distinguished by many noted names, but upon the whole it may be remarked that Death has contented himself with fewer "shining marks" than usual. Among American statesmen the most eminent deceased for the year was Thomas H. Benton. With him have departed Senator Evans, of South Carolina, Senator Henderson, of Texas, ex-Senator Bagby, of Alabama, General James Gadsden, of South Carolina, John A. Quitman, of Mississippi, Thos. L. Harris, of Illinois, and ex-President Anson Jones, of Texas. Among lawyers have died Benjamin F. Butler and Chief Justice Duer, of New York. Among authors, Wm. Henry Herbert, Wm. Jay and Madame Ida Pfeiffer. Among merchants, Anson G. Phelps, of New York, and James Adger, of Charleston. Among mechanics, Isaac Newton and John P. Allaire. Among scientific men, Bonpland, the naturalist, and Robert Brown, the botanist. Among painters, Ary Shaffer. Among the sculptors, Edward S. Bartholomew. Among theatrical characters, the great Rachel, and Lablanche, the singer. Among soldiers, Field Marshal Radetsky, of the Austrian army, and Major General Persifer F. Smith, U. S. A. Among naval commanders, Admiral Lord Lyons, of the British service, and two American Commodores, Matthew C. Perry and T. Ap Catesby Jones. Among philosophers, Robert Owen. Among prominent characters at the European courts, the Duchess of Orleans, Redschid Pacha, Grand Vizier of Turkey, and Baron Ward, (the Yorkshire hostler,) Prime Minister at Parma. Among other notorieties deceased, may be mentioned Soyer, the prince of cooks, Dread Scott, whose name will be a famous one in the annals of the country, and Eleazer Williams, the reputed Bourbon.

LUTHER'S PRAYER FOR MELANCTHON.

On a certain occasion a message was sent to Luther to inform him that Melancthon was dying. He at once hastened to his sick bed, and found him presenting the usual premonitory symptoms of death. He mournfully bent over him, and sobbing, gave utterance to a sorrowful exclamation. It roused Melancthon from his stupor—he looked in the face of Luther, and said: "O, Luther! is this you? Why don't you let me depart in peace?" "We can't spare you yet, Philip," was the reply. And turning round, he threw himself upon his knees, and wrestled with God for his recovery for upwards of an hour. He went from his knees to the bed, and took his friend by the hand. Again he said: "Dear Luther, why don't you let me depart in peace?" "No, no, Philip, we cannot spare you yet," was the reply. He then ordered some soup, and when pressed to take it, Melancthon declined, again saying, "Dear Luther, why will you not let me go home and be at rest?" "We cannot spare you yet, Philip," was the reply. He then added, "Philip, take this soup, or I will excommunicate you." He took the soup; he commenced to grow better. He soon regained his wonted health, and labored for years afterwards in the cause of the reformation. And when Luther returned home, he said to his wife with joy; "God gave me my brother Melancthon back in direct answer to prayer."

DR. PUSEY.

THE Roman Catholic Tablet says: "An absurd, but malignant report is current in the religious world that Dr. Pusey and Miss Sellon have been for some time married in a private or clandestine manner. This offensive slander is, no doubt, founded on the prolonged residence of that estimable lady in the reverend gentleman's house, at Christ Church, whither she repaired some time ago, for spiritual consolation and rest, when worn out by the heavy duties of mother superior in her convent. It will be greatly regretted that the law of libel cannot be applied to the authors of this scandalous rumor, whose object is to make Dr. Pusey's opinions contemptible, and through him and Miss Sellon to strike a final and fatal blow at the modifications of the religious life which they have invented, and so successfully developed in the Anglican Church, in spite of the most formidable opposition."

LITERARY.

POWERS' BRONZE STATUE OF WEBSTER has arrived at Boston.

VIANOUX has painted "Niagara Falls by moonlight" for Aguste Belmont, Esq. He has most happily chosen not only the best point of view, but the best time for his purpose. The spot selected, Goat Island, looking over the Horse-shoe, affords the best single view of the Falls that can be obtained, and the time is just at the break of the dawn, as the full-orbed moon is sinking over the distant forests on the Canada shore, throwing a flood of silver light over the rushing waters. The scene is full of solemn grandeur, which the artist has most happily preserved.

DR. LIVINGSTONE, has arrived in safety as far up the Zambezi as Tette; and he and his whole party were in perfect health and high spirits. Of his Makololos, whom he had left there two years before—about one hundred and fifty in number—thirty had died of small-pox, and six more had been killed during his absence. The remainder were still at Tette, and would proceed up the country with him.

SOUTH CAROLINA COLLEGE.—The applicants for admission into College this year have been subjected to a rigid examination. It closed on Wednesday, and the result was declared on Thursday. There were in all 45 applicants, as follows: For Junior 1, for Sophmore 26 and for Freshman 18. The one for Junior was rejected. Of the 25 for Sophomore 13 were admitted. Of the rejected 13, 9 were allowed to take Freshman, and 5 were unconditionally rejected. Of the 18 for Freshman, 14 were admitted and 4 were rejected.

THE FOUR TONGUES.—Some years ago, a bold essay in the Dublin University Magazine prophesied that in the course of time there would be only four languages spoken in the world: English, Russian, French and German.

MADAME LE VERT, OF MOBILE, the author of "Souvenirs of Travel," will shortly give to the literary world another work, to be called "Souvenirs of Distinguished Americans."

SPAIN is being rapidly drained of its few books. Whenever one of any value is found, it is immediately shipped to England or America, whither the best have preceded it. Some tracts of a few leaves each were recently sold at high prices in London, ranging from £7,5s. to £16.

PHILLIPS, SAMPSON & Co., have sold no less than 30,000 copies of Beecher's "Life thoughts," and 20,000 copies of Hulme's "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

DR. WM. PRESCOTT'S CABINET, CONCORD, N. H., has been secured by Professor Merrick for the Ohio Wesleyan University. It is valued at $3000. The Doctor has been one of the most devoted naturalists and [illegible] collectors in his state; and his museum has long been one of the curiosities of Concord.

JOHN HANCOCK, who lately died in Boston at the age of eighty-five, was a nephew of John Hancock [illegible] and manly signature ornaments the Declaration of Independence.

POLITICS AND RELIGION.

We are now, as a nation, approaching one of those periodical political excitements involved in our quadrennial Presidential elections. Although the election is yet somewhat far off in the future, yet the preliminary electioneering and management have already commenced, and the excitement is beginning to be felt. The pioneer wavelets of the coming tide begin to roll up upon the shore. There are always two contests for the President—the first for the nomination, and the second for the election. The contest for the first has already commenced, and there will be no more political calm until the election is finally over; unless men, warned by past extravagances, and consequent injuries and remorse, determine to maintain a calm within their bosoms; in which case, the excitement of the contest will not be a hurtful one. This self-possession—moderation and moral repose—is necessary to prevent one of the greatest blessings of republican government—the frequent choice of [illegible] by a downright curse to the country. Exciting and distracting as these elections have heretofore been, in consequence of the absence of due self-control, it would be better, if the evil cannot be abated, they should be at least ten years apart. If the funds of the United States were as sensitive as those of the Paris Bourse and the other European exchanges, our frequent Presidential elections, conducted as they have been, would be absolutely ruinous.

But moderation and self-possession are necessary, also, to personal dignity, and to the health of individual character. The extreme excitement of this partisan politics, if a man allow himself in it, is utterly subversive of sound personal culture, and of strong and harmonious mental and moral development. It degrades the tone and standard of manhood, destroys dignity and self-respect, blunts the keen edge of a magnanimous sense of honor, and makes him who should be a citizen and a gentleman, a mere demagogue and party tool.

To all the amenities and beneficial influences of social life, it is equally destructive. And to a meek-spirited and heavenly-minded piety, it is utterly ruinous. It is, therefore, to be carefully avoided by all patriotic, discreet, and pious men.

But we by no means agree with those who advise keeping entirely aloof from politics and elections. It is both a civil and christian duty for all good men to keep themselves well informed in politics, and to take an active part in all elections; for in these the destiny of the country, and consequently the welfare of the world, are involved. And it is a miserable folly and inconsistency for us to bewail the prevalent political demoralization of the country, while, at the same time, we keep ourselves aloof from the primary meetings and conventions, in which the men who are to represent and guide the nation are to be nominated, leaving them, and consequently, the springs of the machinery of the government, in the hands of the veriest rabble the country can afford. We should keep cool, possess our souls in patience, act prayerfully, and in the fear of God; and at the same time we should strive to attain to truthful and fixed political convictions, and do our utmost to have good men elected to offices of honor and trust.

THAT MISSIONARY DISPUTE.

It has been known to most of our readers that there has been, for several years, a dispute between Rev. Dr. Boring, and our Parent Missionary Board at Nashville, in reference to a claim which he makes for money spent in connection with the California Mission. In the Spring of 1856, we believe, it was argued at length before the Board, and decided, as we are compelled to believe from all we can learn, in rather an ambiguous manner. One representation of it is, that the decision was adverse to the claim, without qualification. That it was adverse to the payment of the claim, is certain. Another representation is, that payment was declined on account of constitutional grounds, without denying the equity of the claim—probably with a quasi admission of its equity. We do not vouch for the entire accuracy of this statement of the latter representation; we only give our impression, from what we have read and heard.

The Georgia Conference, at its last session, passed resolutions in favor of the claim, and appointed a delegation to prosecute a re-hearing before the Board at its next meeting in April. Bishop Andrew responds to the action of the Georgia Conference, in a letter to the Southern Advocate, setting forth that the Conference acted hastily in adjudging the justice of the claim, preparatory to a re-hearing, and after it had been decided against by the Board, thus reflecting on the latter. In the last Southern Advocate, Rev. Jas. E. Evans, and Rev. W. J. Parks, both distinguished men, reply to Bishop Andrew; the first defending the justice of the claim, and the propriety of the action of the Georgia Conference; the second, admitting the charge of Bishop Andrew, of haste in the Conference, but claiming that it was misled as to facts.

We know nothing of the merits of the case; we have published no discussions of the claim, favorable or unfavorable; nor do we intend to do so. It would only [illegible] counsel, besides giving undue publicity to the details of an unfortunate dispute. We soberly think the question is not appropriate for discussion in our Church Journals. No good can be accomplished, and harm is certain to result. We regret that it has been discussed as much as it has been, and diffidently beg leave to suggest a cessation of such discussion. Let it come again before the Board, and be settled, if possible, in such a manner as will both preserve confidence in our missionary management, and satisfy the claimant. As to an "appeal to Cæsar," the idea is intolerable.

Could it not be compromised? In cases of this kind, upon good men, of high standing before the Church and community, differ so widely in opinion, compelled, at the same time, to respect each other's judgment and piety, compromise is peculiarly appropriate, and should be sought on both sides. Could not the lay-friends of Dr. Boring, who manifested such noble generosity toward him recently, assist the Board in such a compromise?

NEW ORLEANS PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

It is probable that there are no Public Schools in the United States superior, if equal, to the public schools of this city. Every child in the city is educated free of charge, for books or tuition, whether their parents reside here or not; and that at schools of the very best character, providing the advantages of both primary and high-school education, for both boys and girls. Each District has its own School Board and government, and these Boards are provided with ample discretion for any necessary improvement. And, valuable as the schools now are, they are but in the infancy of their development and power for good. We have but little doubt that the time is coming when all the children, rich and poor, of this great and rapidly increasing city, will be blessed with as high a grade of education, gratis, as the Colleges of the country afford. Such advantages for the moral and intellectual development of the masses of the poor in a large commercial city, where they are generally neglected, and left to riot in ignorance and vice, and yet where their proper culture is more important to the public welfare than elsewhere, should be matter of rejoicing with the public at large.

In view of all the interests involved, we are sorry to [illegible] that some of the members of the Legislature from [illegible] are disposed to tinker with the present school government in the way of important changes and amendments. While it is not to be claimed that any system of human origin is perfect, and while it may be admitted that some modifications for the better might be made in the present school system, could those changes only be secured; yet, from the fact that it is not proposed to be content with such changes—from the fact that the present public school officers are loud in their denunciation of the proposed legislative action—and from the fact that there is danger of ruining the schools altogether; we are of opinion that it would be far better to let them alone as they are—to grow by a natural process—which is much better than any system of legislative forcing and pruning.

TOPICS OF THE TIME.

The Pacific Railroad question has been engaging the attention of the United States Senate for weeks past. But the discussion was brought to a close a few days since, by the adoption of Mr. Bell's substitute, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to advertise for separate proposals for the construction of a Northern, Central, and Southern railroad to the Pacific.

The United States Treasury deficiency, which has threatened the country with the increase of the rate of postage, and the adoption of a protective tariff, now occupies the attention of the House in the shape of a report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He says that the receipts of the first quarter of the recent fiscal year amount to nearly $25,250,000.

The receipts of the remaining three quarters are estimated at $38,500,000. Of this amount, it is estimated that $37,000,000 will be derived from customs. The Secretary believes that the quarter ending on the 31st December last, will yield $10,000,000; the one ending the 31st of March $15,000,000, and the quarter ending June 30th, $12,000,000. He reports that information received at the Treasury Department confirms these estimates. During the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1857, the importations were very heavy, amounting in the aggregate, in dutiable goods, exclusive of exportations, to over $294,000,000. The receipts of customs during that year, he says, were over $63,250,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1858, importations were very much reduced, amounting, in dutiable goods, exclusive of exportations, to $202,000,000. The Secretary thinks the imports of dutiable goods during the present fiscal year must reach $250,000,000, besides those exported, and for the next fiscal year, he estimates the imports at $280,000,000; therefore he conclude that the receipts will not be adequate to the public exigencies unless the expenditures of the Government be reduced considerably below the estimates.

But he does not anticipate such a result, and says that if the bills which have been passed by either House become laws, the expenditures of the Government would be very largely and permanently increased. The Pension bill alone, he says, adds several millions to the regular annual expenditures. He says the expenditures must be reduced to the estimated receipts, or other means of revenue must be provided. He considers the first of these remedies the most desirable. He further states that the plans will be submitted to Congress for codifying the revenue laws, and for regulating the collection districts. If these measures are adopted, he is confident it will greatly facilitate the operations of the Treasury Department, and largely reduce the expenses of the collection of the revenue. The Secretary recommends abolishing the franking privilege and raising the rate of letter postage, on all distances under three thousand miles, to five cents. He also advises a modification of the present tariff for the purpose of increasing the revenue.

The Paraguay Expedition, sent out to enforce redress from the Republic of Paraguay for firing into the U. S. war steamship "Water Witch," Lieut. Page, of the La Plata Exploring Expedition, on the 3rd of February, 1855, had not commenced operations at latest advices, but the different vessels were concentrating toward the mouth of the La Plata. Important results, favorable to American commerce, and to South American civilization, are expected to flow from this expedition, and the country anxiously awaits the news of its prosecution.

The Tehuantepec Route across the Isthmus to California, which has recently been opened, is exciting great interest in this city, and throughout the country. We are now within fourteen days travel of San Francisco, and when the railroad across the Isthmus is finished—and arrangements are being made to build it as soon as possible—this city will be within ten days of San Francisco, and New York within fourteen. This will bring the bulk of the travel and trade of the United States, and of the world, destined for the West, through New Orleans. We learned a few days since that such facilities will be afforded here to shippers of gold dust and bullion from California, via the Tehuantepec, to realize the proceeds without delay on its arrival, as must have a very favorable effect in inducing such shipments, and must soon divert to our shores more than half of the bullion which now seeks New York by the Panama route.

The Acquisition of Cuba, is now the great topic of the Government, and of the country. The report of the House Committee, in substance, we published last week in our news department. What action Congress will take remains to be seen. It is thought by some that there is nothing practical in the proposition, and that it is only part of the game for the next Presidency. There is no doubt considerable truth in this. But whatever Congress or the Administration may do, the proposition has excited such a spirit in the people at large that it is likely, ultimately, to necessitate some positive action. It is perfectly plain, we think, that the acquisition of Cuba is only a question of time.

To give some idea of the trade of the United States with Cuba, we give the following table of imports and exports for the last five years:

Year ending June 30.	Exports of Dom. Produce.	Total Exports.	Total Imports.
1854	8,228,116	8,551,752	17,124,339
1855	7,607,119	8,004,567	15,625,239
1856	9,199,033	7,966,263	24,435,693
1857	9,379,582	14,923,443	45,245,101
1858	11,673,167	14,433,191	27,214,846

For the fiscal year, ending June 30th, 1858, the exports to Cuba from the United States amounted, in value to $14,433,191. The articles of export are ranked as follows:

Lard	$1,779,323
Manufactures of Wood	1,489,725
Boards, Lumber, etc.	1,062,040
Hides	874,734
Rice	611,502
Tallow	535,640
	305,649

The excess of imports over exports, it will be seen, is $12,781,658, which is but a small fraction of the sum we pay, to sustain the power of Spain over the Island. If that power were overthrown, the exports and imports between Cuba and our States would balance. But as it is now, the large amount we pay the Cubans for their sugar, is absorbed by the Catalan trades and monopolists, from whom the barbarous policy of Spain compels the Cubans to buy nearly all their supplies and manufactures.

The Picayune meets the objections to the purchase of Cuba on the ground of the debt that will be incurred, by showing that the embarrassments of the American Treasury are mere temporary irregularities of finance—not the want of means or resources for any purpose needed by the interests of the country. The national income has fallen off from the force of transitory circumstances, or in consequence of a defect in the means provided for drawing what is necessary from the coffers of the people, where is the true treasury of the United States, always full. If there be any public purpose, touching the national honor and interest, which requires money, it is absurd to tell us that we must abstain from attempting to accomplish it for fear the people will not respond to the demand for it, when it is made.

It is not proposed, says the Delta, to take the money out of the Treasury to make this payment, but to issue bonds, which will be met, and far more than met, out of the profits to be realized on such a purchase. The Picayune then quotes largely from the report of Mr. Slidell, to show the enormous productiveness of the Island, and the amount of wealth it will add to our Union.

METHODIST PRESS.

Northern Methodist Tract Society.

The Christian Advocate and Journal gives an interesting and edifying account of the sixth anniversary of the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, recently held at Newark, New Jersy. Hon. Gabriel P. Disosway, in his address, gave the following striking facts:

He alluded to the vast responsibility of the Church growing out of her increased membership, amounting to two hundred thousand during the past year. He presented some interesting statistics showing the progress of the Church in the department of religious literature, showing that to supply the wants of the people in providing a religious and general literature the Book Concern at New York published annually 3,334,312 volumes: Its daily issues amounted to 11,147 volumes; its hourly, 1114 volumes; and 18 every minute. He referred to the fact that when he was a boy we had no Methodist literature, no colleges or seminaries of learning, but now we have a literature, and institutions of learning in every State of the Union. The circulation of religious periodicals every year, issued from New York and Cincinnati alone, amounted to 9,888,295 copies.

The interesting feature of the report, which was read by the Corresponding Secretary, Rev. Dr. Floy, was the statement, that the systematic distribution of tracts originated with Methodism, and has ever been identified with her history.

The "Holy Club" at Oxford spent an hour every day in visiting prisons, instructing the ignorant, and distributing tract publications among the poor. Wesley published the first English tracts. In 1782, seventeen years before the organization of the London Tract Society, Wesley and Coke organized a tract society, which was the first Christian tract society ever formed, and from that day to the present time it has formed an integral part of Wesleyan Methodism. Twelve years before the organization of the American Tract Society, Bishop Asbury commenced in this country the publication and circulation of tracts. The circulation of tracts the past year by the Society has been almost equal to that of the American Tract Society with its immense resources. (With the operations of the Southern Methodist Church included, therefore, Methodism is eminently superior, as a tract distributing agency, to the American Tract Society, notwithstanding the studied and the persistent effort to make the impression that the country is dependent upon it.—Ed. N. O. Ch. Ad.) Nor does the society confine its operations to the home field. During the past year it has sent money and tracts to France, Germany, India, China, South and Central America.

Sunday School Conventions.

The American Sunday-school Union, in connection with others, has made a call for a national Sunday-school convention at Philadelphia. In behalf of those Churches who choose to give up their Sunday-school work into the hands of the "Union," we wish the convention great success. We find, from the Southern Christian Advocate, that a Methodist Sunday-school Convention is to be held in the South Carolina Conference. The call for the convention says:

"The Quarterly Conference of Columbia, South Carolina, being deeply impressed with the importance of a well organized plan of Sunday-school operations, and seeing the apathy that rests upon the Church throughout the bounds of this Conference, have resolved to hold in this place a Methodist Sunday-school Convention during the first week in May next, and have respectfully invited two delegates from each Station and Circuit within the Conference. The Convention will bring into more active, deliberative service the laity of the Church, on whom must chiefly depend the success of Sunday-schools. Their interest in this institution will be quickened, their observation and counsel secured, and through them a spirit can be more generally diffused, to wake up the membership to a sense of responsibility in protecting the lambs of the flock. The duties of an itinerant pastor are too manifold and laborious, and his stay among the people too short, for him to assume the chief burden of sustaining the Sunday-school. This must be borne by the superintendent, who should be the pastor of the school. If the preacher assumes this office, the school will decline at his removal; but if the efficient and pastoral superintendent is a layman, the school becomes self-perpetuating through all the changes of the itinerancy. The Convention, therefore, more especially appeals to the laity of the Church.

"There is, too, a sad want of uniformity in the government and manner of conducting schools, in instructing the children, the text books used, the electing of officers, and in all the details of gathering, replenishing, and sustaining schools. A free discussion and exchange of opinions on these points, among a large and intelligent representation from the ministry and the laity, will probably result in the adoption of a systematic and uniform plan of conducting the schools. Whitefield observed, that his societies were held together only "by a rope of sand." They lacked the soul of unity, organization, a systematic law within each society, and a common bond making the whole a compact Church. This Wesley supplied; and Methodism framed by his rules, stands forth, at once beautiful in the adjustment of its parts, and solid in the grandeur of its structure. This is the genius of the Church, indeed of Christianity, and it demands that the Sunday-school should not only be a nicely balanced wheel with its thousand cogs working harmoniously in the Church, but that it possess a system of its own—that it be a complete part, capable of perpetuation and propagation. The Convention is designed to give this efficiency of system to our Sunday-school movements; and if every school is represented, and will adopt the plan suggested by its delegation, much will be accomplished in bringing about a well organized and uniform plan of Church education."

The editor of the Southern Advocate says:

We confidently look for a "great awakening" in the Methodist Church, on the subject of Sunday-school labor. Here is a field in which every one may do or get good—and we confidently believe, that if one of the services of each day, in our towns and cities, were wholly given up to this work, it would be better for the church, than having so many sermons as are now preached. But, with this idea, all the church should be brought into the work in one way or other, and be thus developed into laborers in the Lord's vineyard.

We desire to add a few words. Would it not be well to make this Convention a general one, for the whole Church South? Why not make the benefits intended for the South Carolina Conference extend to the whole Church? The same necessities, found in the South Carolina Conference, exist throughout our bounds. And there is plenty of time to make the call general, through our Church papers. And Columbia, South Carolina, is as good a place for such a convention as could be selected. We suggest that our brother editor, Dr. Myers, give his opinion as to this matter. If our Sunday-school interest be suffered to languish, our glory as a Church is gone. And just now there are peculiar antagonistic agencies at work; therefore there are peculiar reasons for such a convention.

The New Discipline.

The Nashville Christian Advocate has the following remarks:

We felicitate all the friends of Southern Methodism, says the editor of the Quarterly Review, on the removal of the general rule respecting slavery from the Discipline, by the concurrent action of large constitutional majorities in the General and Annual Conferences. The quiet and almost universal acquiescence in this measure is a suggestive fact, on which we might enlarge; but shall not do so at present. We will, however, take occasion to say that this is a most favorable opportunity to put forth efforts to secure the universal circulation of the book of Discipline throughout the Connection. Every one of the seven thousand traveling and local preachers ought of course to possess a copy; and there ought to be one in every Methodist family and Sunday-school; it would, moreover, greatly extend our influence if it were put into the hands of those who are not of us. Methodism—disciplinary Methodism—courts investigation, and will be promoted by it. The present edition is handsomely gotten up. It was carefully revised by the editor, and the revision was afterward attested by the Book Agent. An omission on page 56, after the word "discipline," of the clause, "and has given satisfactory evidence of his knowledge of the ordinary branches of an English education"—occasioned, perhaps, by the loss of a slip of "copy" in the office—was not detected by the proof-reader or editor, both of whom read the proofs "by copy," until the first edition was printed, but it has been inserted for future editions, of which we hope to issue many. The size and style of the present issue justify the Agent in putting it at 30 cents.

The Gateway of the West.

The Pacific Methodist has an Oregon correspondent, Rev. J. C. Stewart, who is traveling through that Territory, preaching, getting subscribers for the Methodist, and constituting lay-agencies for it, wherever he can. We are glad to learn that our people are pioneering in Oregon. Would that unemployed preachers in the older States would go out and work in that field. And we take occasion to commend the zeal for the paper manifested by Mr. Sewart, in getting all the subscribers he can, by personal effort, and then establishing lay-agencies. There are hundreds of young men, ladies, and others, who could do good work for our paper, if "employed" by the preacher in charge. The revival continues among our people in California. The Methodist says:

The barriers that have hitherto stood in the way of the introduction of Protestant Christianity into South and Central America, Mexico and Cuba, are being removed, and soon there will be a call for laborers to enter these opening fields.

"The Church should be ready to respond to this call promptly and effectually. "Manifest destiny" gives these people the promise of the blessings of civil liberty; it is the duty of the Church to carry them the more inestimable blessings of evangelical religion.

The Pacific Conference occupies a peculiar position, and will hold most intimate reintions to portions of this new missionary territory—especially Mexico and Central America. Great is our need of wisdom, fidelity and zeal. Interests of incalculable worth will be sacrificed should we exhibit rashness, irresolution, or indolence. Let us look around us, and ahead of us. A survey of these fields that we are to enter, will inspire enthusiasm and courage requisite to complete our peaceful conquest of the field in which we are working now. There is inspiration to be gathered by looking forward to the time, not far distant, when our itinerant bands will pour into Arizona, Chihuahua, Nicaragua and Tehuantepec, and the Eastern and Western wings of our beloved Church, stretching from the Alleghanies to the Sierra Nevadas, will meet and mingle in the tropics. An elevated order of men is needed for this work, and for these times.

Let the Church pray the Lord of the harvest to raise up and thrust out laborers into the work. Great things will be witnessed before this generation shall pass away.

Matters at Headquarters.

The Nashville correspondent of the Memphis Christian Advocate gives us the following items:

The Book Committee met day before yesterday at the Publishing House, and with the general Book Agent and the Financial Secretary, resolved that any person taking a share of stock in one of the Book and Tract Societies, if he does not desire the Bicentenological Family Bible, may receive, instead thereof, the prime cost of the Bible in books and tracts estimated at wholesale prices.

The Financial Secretary, Rev. B. Abbey, itinerates. Last week, he arrived from the South. This week he departed for the North—has gone to New York on business in his department.

The Missionary Secretary, Rev. Dr. Sehon, is absent, though looked for. Bishop Pierce has recommended the Rev. Young J. Allen, of the Georgia Conference, as a suitable person to be sent as a Missionary to China, and the recommendation has been approved by the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society. Bro. Allen is a graduate of Emory College, and is reported to be a very promising young man. It is cheering to hope that the Mission at Shanghai will be strengthened in a short time.

Yesterday I met a young preacher, who is well educated and has an aptness for acquiring languages, and who had visited the city to counsel with his elder brethren in reference to his ardent desire to give himself to the work of missions. We conversed about China; but, as he has some knowledge of Spanish, I directed his attention to the claims of Central America. That is our field. While we still care for China, let us chiefly look Southward.

The General Book Agent and the Editors are at home and at work. Business at the Publishing House is brisk, and will soon be brisker. The periodical clerk is very busy—recording new subscribers. The Advocate calls loudly for a list of 20,000 names, and ought to have it. And so ought the S. S. Visitor and the Home Circle. The latter, judging from the February number, needs only a large amount of original editorial and a more tasteful engraving for the cover, to make it one of the most attractive magazines in the country. Rev. Dr. Summers makes a capital editor of the Quarterly Review. It ought to be handsomely supported. Let us not shame the Conferences, Memphis and Tennessee, by publishing how few subscribers it has within their bounds. Come, brethren, let us sustain our Quarterly Review."

DEATH OF THE HISTORIAN PRESCOTT.

In our last issue, we briefly noticed the death of William H. Prescott, intelligence of which arrived just before going to press. The Buffalo Courier says:

There is no spot on this earth where the English language is spoken—indeed, no one in which letters are valued—in which this startling intelligence will not fall with a saddening weight upon the heart. He died suddenly, in the prime of life, with all his faculties about him, in the midst of unfinished labors and loving friends. We can hardly feel that we shall no longer see on earth that fine and cordial face, or again be cheered by his warm-hearted greeting.

About two years since he had a slight stroke of paralysis, which, however, soon yielded to medical treatment, and for many months past he seemed in excellent health and spirits; and his friends confidently predicted for him many more years of active literary exertion. But it was otherwise ordained by the All-Disposer. At twelve o'clock on Friday he was in his usual health; at half-past twelve he was stricken with apoplexy, and at two o'clock he breathed his last.

Mr. Prescott belonged to a New England family of high honor. His grandfather, Col. William Prescott, as is well known, commanded the American forces at the battle of Bunker Hill. His father, William Prescott, generally known and addressed in this community, during the latter years of his life, as Judge Prescott, was one of the best and wisest men who have ever lived and died among us. He was a lawyer, in a very large practice for a great many years, and a very acute, successful and learned jurist. His mother was a daughter of Thomas Hickling, who for a great many years was United States Consul at the Azores.

Mr. Prescott was born in Salem, Massachusetts, May 4th, 1796, and resided there until his father's removal to Boston, when he himself was twelve years old. He entered Harvard College in 1811, and was graduated in 1814. While in college he was deprived by an accident of the use of one eye, and the sight of the other was so impaired as to prevent him from engaging in any occupation in which the constant use of that organ should be necessary. Happily his father's circumstances were such as to preclude the necessity of his toiling for bread. He early determined to devote himself to a life of literature. Soon after leaving college, being advised to travel, he went to Europe and spent two years in an extended journey through England, France and Italy, and at the end of it returned home in excellent general health, but with no great improvement in the state of his eyes. His marriage soon after took place; and from this period his days flowed on in diligent and uneventful devotion to literary pursuits.

Mr. Prescott was never enabled to use his own eyes but for a short time in the day, but was constantly obliged to use the eyes of others for his studies and researches, as well as to record the results of them. His quiet perseverance and continuous industry enabled him to triumph over this difficulty, and to achieve an amount of literary production which is not merely most honorable to his intellectual powers, but conveys a noble and moral lesson to all who may be burdened with similar trials. The highest possible acknowledgments of literary distinction were liberally showered upon him. The University of Oxford in 1850, conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws. In 1845 he received the highest of all distinctions of its class in being elected a corresponding member of the class of Moral and Political Philosophy in the French Institute, succeeding Navarete, the Spanish Historian. Of most of the learned societies in Europe he was a member.

Mr. Prescott was as rich in the love of his friends as in the admiration of the literary world. His friend Mr. Ticknor, in his preface to his history of Spanish Literature said of him with perfect truth, that his "honors will always be dearest to those who have best known the discouragements under which they have been won, and the modesty and gentleness with which they are worn." His manners were most frank, simple and engaging; his social nature was strong and active; and his sympathies were ever ready and easily moved. His countenance was extremely fine and prepossessing, and retained to the last a youthful glow and animation which were the faithful expression of a sunny temper and an ever young heart. No man was ever more beloved; no man could show a better title to the affections of his friends. His honors and distinctions never impaired the simplicity and sweetness of his nature, or changed his countenance towards any one whom he had ever known and loved. No man so eminent was ever pursued with less of envy, detraction or ill-will. No man's honors were ever a subject of more hearty delight to his friends. Long will he be mourned; faithfully and affectionately will he be remembered; and many are there who will feel that something is taken away from the very sunshine of their lives now that he is gone.

A GOOD SIGN.

Subscribers, old and new, when they do not find it convenient to see an agent, are acting as agent for themselves. A large part of our letters are from individual subscribers, writing on business for themselves. That is right, and pleasant withal. We should be glad to have every subscriber who owes us anything open an immediate correspondence with us, burdened with valuable intelligence. And we should be glad to get a letter from every one who does not take the Advocate, requesting it sent. We should, indeed.

SHARON FEMALE COLLEGE.

Rev. John Mathews writes us that T. L. Gilmore Esq. has donated one Thousand Dollars as the commencement of the endowment of the above institution. It is hoped that others, interested in this growing school, will follow this praiseworthy example. It is the property of the Mississippi Conference, and has been in operation nearly twenty years; and this movement to endow it should be vigorously pushed forward.

NEW AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

Our readers will find, on our third page, if they have not already found it, a full statement of the character and value of this work. Read it carefully. We do not believe its worth is over-stated. The press throughout the United States, and the leading public and literary men of the country, speak of it in high terms of praise. We have received the fourth volume, which we will notice next week.

"The Churches of Scotland," on our first page, is not only a highly interesting, but really valuable article. We venture the opinion that not one in a thousand of our readers, had such a knowledge of this important branch of modern ecclesiastical history as this article imparts. The writer, we take the liberty of saying, is Rev. James McLennan, of the Mississippi Conference, who is not only a native of Scotland, but spent most of last summer in that country. His acquirements, and his accurate and perspicuous style, give him great advantages in such writing.

The Arkansas Baptist is the title of a new and neat paper published at Little Rock, Arkansas. Our Baptist brethren now have papers in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas. The Arkansas Baptist is edited by P. S. G. Watson, who, in keeping with the time-honored characteristics of his Church, commences the Baptistic controversy, and the Revision agitation, with his very first number. "Can the leopard change his spots?" Or, is it all in consequence of the necessitating "eternal decrees?"

The Mails treat us very badly sometimes, but we charitably hope it is unintentional—bear it as patiently as we can—and hope for better treatment in the future. Many of our subscribers get their papers very irregularly—some after long delay—and some lose them. Those immediately on the railroad, and near the city, complain most. Our friends, the postmasters, Col. Marks leading, will surely do what they can to facilitate the circulation of such a paper as the Advocate.

The Minutes of the Alabama and Louisiana Conferences will be noticed next week, and a synopsis of the contents given. We have it ready, but have no room. Would that we had the Minutes of the Mississippi Conference. The value of published Minutes of our annual Conferences cannot be exaggerated. The money expended in their publication is the best paying investment, in proportion to the amount, the Conferences can make.

That Good Suggestion.—That worthy brother, the local preacher, who made the suggestion of furnishing the Advocate, by donation, to the hotels and poor, sent us a draft; recently, for fifty dollars, for that purpose. A few Advocates will hereafter be found at the principal hotels; and we also send a few to the Orphan's Home in the Fourth District. We could do large good in this way, if we had the means.

The Pacific Methodist has commenced its third volume, and the editor announces that fact as synonymous with success. Thank God! We have agonized in spirit for the success of that paper ever since its commencement. The editor also says that they will build a Church in San Francisco this year. We hope so.

Rev. Thomas Nixon.—This veteran Methodist Preacher, who was a member of the first Mississippi Conference, and who was ordained by Bishop Asbury, gave us the pleasure of a call a few days since. His reminiscences of early times in the South-west are full of interest. We hope to favor our readers with some of them.

Rev. R. Abbey's notice of the arrangements of the Agents of the Mississippi Conference Book and Tract Society, should have been published some weeks since, but was overlooked. It will be found under the head of "special notices." "Montgomery is not the man to fail," writes a correspondent.

Rev. R. Abbey, in a note from New York, informs us that, notwithstanding delays from lithographing on parchment paper, a few copies of the Genealogical Bible will be out in about ten days—the first lot, still later, to be sent to the Mississippi Conference—afterwards the certificate will be left blank to be filled up for any Conference.

The True Witness says: We understand that Rev. Mr. Bolles, who has been pastor of the Church formerly Dr. Clapp's, in this city, tendered on last subbath his resignation, which has been accepted.

Miramon has marched into the city of Mexico, displaced Robles, and reinstated Zuloaga. Mexico has adopted the "itinerant system" of government. We shall hear of another change shortly.

Teacher on Governess Wanted.—See advertisement in another column. Those wanting such a situation would do well to open correspondence.

Correspondents and contributors will please be patient. We have much matter on hand that we have not had time to examine.

The New Orleans Depository speaks for itself, under "Special Notices." It is to be continued according to the original intention.

See Advertisement, in another column, of Agents Wanted for "Lossings Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution."

Rev. Dr. Chas. Taylor's Appointments will be found under "Special Notices."

Mrs. C. A. Tate's advertisement will be interesting to those having daughters to educate.

The London papers report that the Countess of Newry, who seceded to the Roman communion some seven or eight years since, has returned to the English Church, and been received again at St. Paul's Knightsbridge, The Bishop of Oxford is said to have been instrumental in bringing the wanderer home.

Solitude bears the same relation to the mind that sleep does to the body. It affords it the necessary opportunities for repose and recovery.

The Knoxville (Tenn.) Whig notices the death of Rev. Robertson Gannaway, of the Holston Conference, aged about 80 years.

The Cotton Supply.—The Cotton Supply Association of England, publish a Journal which is devoted to the cause of obtaining a supply of cotton from British Africa, and other countries elsewhere than the United States. A recent number affirms that fifty millions dollars are annually drained from England to America over and above what may be considered a fair remunerative price for cotton, and that these fifty millions would pay the whole wages of the working classes in the cotton manufacturing districts of England; or it would build roads and irrigate lands in India, sufficient to furnish all the cotton needed.

The Madrid Journals are indirectly making the [illegible] of wars against papal influence, for they are publishing the most atrocious crimes committed by the Inquisition. A few days ago one of the most influential papers published an account of the terrible auto da fe which was celebrated in the Plaza Mayor for the pleasure of King Charles II, under the title, "The King amuses himself."

PERSONAL.

Gen. Ethans Allen's Monument, forty-eight feet high, Burlington, Vermont, is completed. His statue is yet to be put on it.

Charles Dickens is asked to commence a series of readings this country on the first of March next. An agent has gone to London to secure him.

Mr. Kalloch is now one of the most popular clergymen Boston—his congregation about 2500.

Washington Irving has contributed $500 to the Mount non Fund.

Gen. Lamar, Minister to Nicaragua, is reported guilty gross official misconduct, but the report is discredited by Government.

Judge Roosevelt of New York, is thought, will be appointed Minister to England in place of Mr. Dallas.

Judge Irwin, United States Judge, Western District Pennsylvania, charged with corruption, has resigned, and [illegible] McCandless takes his place.

J. Glancy Jones, and President Buchanan, are charged with corruption in the Navy Department, in connection with elections in Pensylvania. The case is being investigated by a committee of the House.

Colonel Benton's property, when sold, will not be [illegible] to discharge his liabilities.

Vice President Breckinridge has gone to his home in Kentucky, in consequence of ill health.

Professor Agassiz.—Steps have been taken in Boston to secure the erection of a fire-proof building for the purpose of containing Professor Agassiz's collections of natural history. Professor has a large quantity of very valuable specimens in a wooden building, where they are liable to be destroyed by fire. The new edifice is proposed to be in Cambridge.

Rev. Mr. Leacock, Rector of Christ Church, Mobile, has resigned the charge of the parish, on account of the necessity of obtaining some repose, for the benefit of his impaired health.

General Thomas Flournoy, an esteemed citizen of Lowndes county, Alabama, died at his residence in Eufaula, the 20th ult., of congestive chills.

Dr. J. H. Eaton.—A committee has been appointed by the Board of Trustees of Union University, to solicit subscriptions and raise funds for the erection of a monument to the memory of Dr. J. H. Eaton, late President of the University.

Gov. Beckinridge has donated his year's salary as governor ($1100) to Yale College. His excellency doubtless finds rubber business elastic.

Alexander Duncan Esq., (of the house of Duncan, Flemman & Co.,) now in Scotland, has sent a donation of ten thousand six hundred dollars to the Butler Asylum for the Insane at Providence, R. I.

Herr Juel E. Goldsmith.—The King of Holland has recently appointed a Jew Professor of Ancient Jurisprudence in the Leyden University. The name of the new Professor is Joel E. Goldsmith, who is a son of the Rev. Emanuel Goldsmith, a resident of New York.

NEWS FROM THE INTERIOR.

ALABAMA.

Hon. James F. Dowdell declines a renomination for Congress.

Major Withers of Mobile earnestly recommends the completion of that city with the Alabama and Florida railroad, which will bring her within eight hours of Montgomery, and three days of New York. Also to connect, by the Selma and Tennessee road, and by the Mobile and Great Northern road, with the road through Tennessee, Virginia, and Kentucky, with the North.

Grave Yards.—The portion known as the "Old Graveyard," says the Advertiser which constitutes the Western end, was set apart and given to the city of Montgomery in 1819, for a burial ground by Andrew Dexter, the founder of our city. Until lately the entrance was at that end. In 1839, a gate was erected on the south side, about a hundred feet west of the present entrance. The oldest inscription upon any tombstone in our Cemetery is that of Mrs. Charlotte Dexter, consort of the founder of Montgomery. She died 17th August, 1819, and although not the first interment, was among the earliest. Her husband died also in 1837, and was interred at Mobile. If his graves can be identified his remains ought to be re-interred in our Cemetery, and a suitable monument erected to his memory.

The Mobile and Girard Railroad.—With the exception of about four miles of the Western end, this road is in excellent order, and the trains make quite as good time as those of the other roads of Georgia and Alabama. The portion alluded to, the Western end, will be put in good order as soon as the season and location will admit. Daily trains run regularly to and from Columbus.—[Union Springs Gazette.

MISSISSIPPI.

Col. J. F. H. Claiborne is collecting materials for writing a history of many of the old families of this State. He is a chaste and brilliant writer, and his book will be read with little interest.

On the 25th ult., in the city of Natchez, the Burns Association and their invited guests, numbering about one hundred, celebrated the centennial anniversary of the birth-day of Robert Burns, the poet.

Steamboat on Pearl River.—The steamboat Ranger arrived at Jackson, Miss., on the 20th ult., being the first boat which has ascended Pearl River in many years. She is intended to run during the season between Jackson and Carthage.

A Special Election is to be held on the 21st of March next, in the First Judicial District of Mississippi, for Circuit Judge, to fill Judge Posey, deceased. Meantime, Governor McWillie has appointed the Hon. Hiram Cassedy, of Franklin county, to fill the vacancy. Judge Cassedy, it is announced, will be a candidate for the Judgeship at the election.

TENNESSEE.

Memphis Railroad Convention.—The railroad meeting to be held in Memphis, says the Bulletin, is attracting considerable attention throughout the country, and promises to be a very large and intelligent gathering of the working men of the South. What will be its topics of discussion we suppose is generally understood by the country. They will embrace a wide range of questions, and be fruitful of information touching the railroad interest in the Southern States. Practical men, who have gathered their knowledge from actual experience and observation of years of hard work on railroads, are expected in part to compose this body.

The Coming Wheat Crop.—The Cleveland (Tenn.) Banner says: We hear a great deal of complaint among the farmers about the coming wheat crop. The prospect now is not at all flattering—the winter thus far has been very mild and the fly has injured it considerably.

A Bank Robbery.—Memphis, Feb. 4—The branch Union Bank, at Jackson, Tennessee, was robbed last night of a large amount of specie and paper, and one of the bank clerks was murdered by the robbers.

The Pensacola Observer notices the arrival at that port of the steamer Bloomer Capt. Brady, from this port. The Bloomer is designed for the Pensacola and Geneva cotton trade.

TEXAS.

A man was found eight miles from Lockport that through the breast. His carriage and horses were standing in the road. He grasped for water, and in a few moments expired. From papers found on his person, he was supposed to be a Mr. Wm. Callahan, of New Orleans, and that he came to his death from carelessness in handling his pistol, which was found near him.

Five miles of the Houston Central Railroad beyond Hempstead are finished.

Pacific Railroad.—The Committee of Arbitration, says the Marshall Republican, are still engaged in investigating the claims of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, preparatory to a final settlement of pending difficulties and embarrassments. The points insisted upon by Dr. Fowlkes were, first, that the debts must be examined to ascertain those properly coming under the award; and secondly, that a rigid scrutiny be instituted to determine the correctness of those decreed to be paid. The Republican states that the old company must pay all bona fide debts emerged in the stock of the new company. The committee must therefore determine what debts were so merged at the date of the award, and in order to test their bona fide character, they must, of course, scrutinize each claim. Dr. Fowlkes has maintained that, until these accounts are thus examined and passed, he cannot properly be called upon for payment. The Committee, as we understand, and as we think very properly, have gone into the investigation on this basis, and we may look, therefore, for a settlement of all differences within a few days. It is true that a considerable delay has been occasioned by this examination; but Dr. Fowlkes contends that this is no fault of his, or of the old Company.

Since the above was in type, we have received the following in an extra of the Marshall Flag, of the 31st ult., which tells a different story:

Second Award of the Committee of Arbitration.—Forfeiture declared against the sold-out Company.—The award which we publish below would, without explanation, be misunderstood by the public. We, therefore, give a few brief points, as the same have been stated to us, and partly from our own knowledge, with reference to this final award and ending of the controversy.

On the 13th inst., Messrs. Gorin, Morton and Richardson, having then recently arrived from New Orleans, assured the people here publicly, that they were prepared to pay the full claim as made by the new company, of $327,000. On the 15th, the day fixed by the award for the first payment, these gentlemen, on being notified by the Committee that the first payment was due, made the tender of $22,635 30 in cash and certificates of deposit, and $61,000 in three notes, at thirty, sixty and ninety days, which were not regarded as good negotiable paper. No objection was made as to the claims of the new Company. On the 16th, Dr. Fawlkes arrived, having, as he asserted, been detained by fogs on the river, etc. It is generally understood here that he purposely delayed leaving New Orleans in proper time to have reached Marshall on the 15th.

Desiring no advantage from accidental delay, the New Company offered to receive the payment on the 18th. This was promptly disregarded, and an examination of the claims insisted on. Quibbling on the expression in the award, "merged into stock," the claims on which stock certificates had not been issued previously to October 15th, was ruled out. Adopting this rule, and after much delay and discussion, owing to the interference of Dr. Fowlkes and his attorneys, the Committee made up the schedule of claims as coming strictly within the letter of the award, the amount being in round numbers $228,000. This schedule was submitted to both parties. The new Company pointed out sundry amounts in the schedule, in all about $16,000, that had been admitted through misapprehension of facts. This reduced the total to about $212,000. The schedule was made on the 28th. On the 29th, Dr. Fowlkes, we understand, filed objections to many items in the schedule, which he had before admitted to be just—the object being to clog, embarrass and procrastinate the action of the committee. The gentlemen composing the committee were worn out with fatigue and annoyance. For the purpose of reaching and stopping, at some definite point, as we understand, they struck out the amounts objected to by Dr. Fowlkes, reserving the same for future examination, and made their award on the sum not contested.

The following statement has been furnished us as the results of the investigations of the committee, at the time of making the award on the 29th:

Not objected to by Dr. Fowlkes	$148,981 40
Contested and laid over for hearing on the 7th Feb.	85,017 84
Amounts owned by New Company, but not merged into stock	56,919 17
Cash paid at sale, not merged into stock	20,000 00
Construction and repairs since 1st June, not merged into stock, about	20,000 00
Total	$330,721 41

THE AWARD.

COMMITTEE ROOM, MARSHALL, TEXAS.
January 29th, 1859.

Whereas, The undersigned have investigated the accounts between the 4th and New Southern Pacific Railroad Companies, and reported to the President of the Old Company, party of the first part, in their award of the 15th of October, 1858, that the sum of fifty-nine thousand six hundred and sixty-one dollars and thirty-six cents, as the amount due and owing under the terms and provisions of their award of the 15th October, 1858, on this day, 29th January, 1859.

And whereas, the said party of the first part, being notified that said sum of money was due and owing under said award, was requested to make payment thereof by the hour of 8 o'clock P. M. of this day; and whereas, the said party of the first part being so notified and required to make such payment, failed to make the same, but made default therein.

And whereas, the said party of the first part did fail to pay and satisfy the said sum of money, under the said award, on the 15th inst., or at any time since that date forward to this date.

Now therefore, it is awarded, by the undersigned, that the said party of the first part, as set forth in their award, on the 15th day of October, 1858, hath made default, and thereby forfeited all the rights and privileges secured to said party of the first part, under the terms and provisions of said award. And,

It is further awarded, that all the rights and privileges secured to the said party of the second part under the said award, by reason of the default of the said party of the first part, hath inured and accrued to the said party of the second part, as provided for under said award.

GEORGIA.

The Federal Union says, that heavy emigration is setting out from adjacent counties to Texas.

The Columbus Times says: We see by the LaGrange Reporter, of Thursday last, that the excitement in relation to a railroad between that place and this city, which our cotemporary has strivon with commendable zeal to keep alive, has at last resulted in a call for a meeting of the friends of that enterprise, at the Court House in LaGrange, on the first day of next month.

The State Road.—The Roma Courirr is informed by the chief engineer, Col. LeHardy, that during the past season there has not been a single failure on the State Road to make all its connections, no train has run off the track, neither has any accident whatever befallen any of the trains. We are informed also that Dr. Lewis expects to put $1,000 into the Treasury for every day in the year 1859.

The Wanderer.—Capt. Carrie filed his answer to the libel of the Wanderer, Saturday last, claiming her as his own, and resisting the ground of the libel. The United States District Attorney moved that the claim be dismissed, and a day is to be appointed for the argument.—Savannah Repub., 31st ult.

Efforts are being made in Southern Georgia to raise three or four hundred thousand dollars in aid of the Savannah, Albany and Gulf Railroad, and with the prospect of success.

A Noble Charity.—The Augusta Chronicle and Sentinal of a late date, says:—"The will of Dr. G. M. Newton, our late distinguished fellow-citizen, after making various bequests, amounting in all to $13,000, donates the remainder of his estate valued at about $150,000, and by many at a much larger figure, to the Augusta Orphan Asylum, thus at once placing that institution upon a firm and substantial footing, and securing to its managers the means of extending their charities and enlarging their usefulness.

Bank of Columbus.—On the 10th inst., says the Times, the Capital Stock of the above institution was increased to the amount authorized by the charter—$500,000. On that day the last dollar of this sum was paid in and the bank launched upon a career of wider usefulness, commensurate with its augmented resources.

Large Cotton Crop.—Mr. Joseph Rood, a planter of Baker county, South-Western Georgia, sold his cotton crop, a few days since, consisting of 2200 bales; to Mr. T. R. Bloom of Macon, for the sum of one hundred thousand dollars. This is, perhaps, the largest crop of cotton ever made in Georgia. The soil of the South-Western section of the State is well adapted for its growth; many farmers making nine and ten bags to the hand.

CALIFORNIA.

By the Quaker City, from Minatitlan, Isthmus of Tehuantepec, we have California papers to the 21st inst. The Legislature was in session. News from the mines favorable. The number of miners still on Frazer River, is estimated at 2000. Col. George Moody has been proclaimed Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia. The Supreme Court of the State has decided that the law passed by the Legislature last year, prohibiting the emigration of Chinese into the State is unconstitutional and void. By the Report of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, it appears that there are 40,530 children in California between the ages of four and eighteen years, and that 19,822 have been in attendance upon schools during the past year. The whole number of schools in the State was 432.

The Mortara Case.—An immense mass meeting of Israelites and others was held on Saturday evening, January 15th, to take into consideration the outrage upon the family of Mr. Mortara, in Bologna, Italy, in abducting his child to bring him up in the Catholic religion. Speeches were made by Judge Heydenfeldt, late of the Supreme Court, Rev. Dr. A. W. Scott, Rev. Dr. Peck, Rev. Dr. Eckman, Rev. Dr. Henry, Messrs. E. D. Baker, F. P. Tracy, M. M. Noah, and resolutions were passed to be sent to our Government at Washington, remonstrating against this attack upon religious liberty and freedom of conscience.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

ARRIVAL OF THE ASIA.

Great Britain.

The negotiations for the purchase of the Leviathan steamship Great Eastern have been concluded. She has been sold for £160,000. It is said that the British Government have resolved to take efficient measures to protect the interests of English subjects in Mexico, and will probably soon augment their West India fleet to a considerable extent. The widow of the celebrated poet Wordsworth is dead.

France, Austria and Italy.

The Austrian Government has issued a circulatory note upon the Serdian question, which, it is thought, will create a pacific turn of affairs in that direction. Accounts from Lombardy still speak of the disaffection of the people, and, notwithstanding the assurances of peace by Austria and France, the consolidation of the people in their being able to keep the peace is losing ground. The warlike preparations of France are steadily continued, and upon a scale that weakens public confidence in the peaceable intentions of the Emperor. It is reported that an offensive and defensive alliance has been formed between France and Sardinia. The King of Naples is reported to be in a dangerous gallopach sympton of his death, but it is dangerously ill. The garrison at Rome is to be reinforced by two regiments of the line. At Turin the belief in the probability of approaching war is increasing.

India.

Advices from Bombay to the 24th of December had been received in England. Nena Sahib, the great rebel leader, had fled to the Jungle, and quiet was being restored throughout the kingdom of Oude. Ismail Khan, a prominent rebel chief, had surrendered to the British.

Great Britain and Ireland.

Parliament has been prorogued until February 3, then to meet for the dispatch of business. The Gazette announces the appointment of Hon. Frederick Bruce, as Minister of China, and Horace Rumbold, Secretary of Legation. Rutherford Alcock is transferred from the Consulate at Canton to the Consul Generalship at Japan. The Gazette further states that the dignity of Knight has been conferred on Chief Justice James Buchanan Macaulay, of Canada. The London Times, in an editorial upon the Monroe Doctrine, points out the extraordinary liberties taken by America with that document, and says: "It is rather too much to say, that with half of North America in our lawful possession, we must abstain from meddling in North American affairs, and it still is a stranger measure to found such a doctrine on the simple principles of political fraternity propounded by Monroe." The Dublin correspondent of the London Times says that the Crown case against some of the members of the Phœnix Club is more complete than the public have been led to believe, and sufficient to satisfy the most hostile jury. The farming classes have stood aloof, and the members of the clubs are chiefly mechanics and shopmen. The clubs were rapidly increasing, and it was, therefore, necessary that some steps should be taken to put an end to the movement.

The steamship Arago left Southampton for New York on the 12th January. The Arago took out news that disquieting rumors still continued to prevail on the continent, causing increased depression in the funds in all the principal cities. Matters were aggravated by the speech of the King of Sardinia at the opening of the Chambers, which was construed into a warlike sense. The King says: "The political horizon is not clear, but the future must be awaited with firmness; the future can not fail to be fortunate, because the policy of the Government is based on justice and a love of its country's liberty." "Piedmont is small, but great in the councils of Europe on account of the principles it represents and the sympathies it inspires. It respects treaties, and is not insensible to Italy's cry of anguish." The King concluded with these words: "Let us resolutely await the decrees of Providence." Prolonged acclamations followed the conclusion of the speech.

France.

The French Legislature was convoked for February 7th. Among other authenticated rumors from Paris are the following: That orders have been given to prepare over 100 transports; that Gen. McMahon is to command the army of Italy, and that 30,000 of the African contingent are to cross over to Italy from the African coast. Prince Napoleon left Paris on the 13th inst., for Turin to espouse the Princess Clotilde, daughter of the King of Sardinia. The impression prevailed that the measure would secure the support of France to assist Victor Emanuel in becoming King of Italy. The Paris Presse, the organ of Prince Napoleon, continued to indulge in warlike articles.

Belgium.

The dissolution of the Belgian Cabinet is announced, caused, it is said by a difference on the question of obligatory instructions.

Italy.

The rumors of disaffection continue unabated. Many persons were leaving Milan every morning. The police had to efface from the walls of houses such inscriptions as "Death to the Germans." The troops quartered at Milan are exceedingly excited, and very strict discipline is necessary to prevent excesses. The official Piedmontese Gazette publishes the following note: The official Gazette of Vienna having announced the dispatch of reinforcements to Italy, the Piedmontese Government has thought it its duty to bring the distant garrisons near to the frontier of Lombardy, without, however, calling out the contingent. Three steamers with troops had arrived at Venice. The advance guard of the Austrian reinforcements entered Milan on the 16th inst., under Gen. Ramming. The Piedmontese Chamber of Deputies had elected its officers from the ranks of the Liberal party. Additional guns had been mounted on the citadel of Milan, all pointed against the city. A Milan letter of the 8th says that the chances of revolt were diminishing daily. The news of the alliance of Prince Napoleon with the Sardinian princess produced great excitement among the Italians, who regarded it as a pledge of the united action of France and Sardinia in the affairs of Italy. It was expected that Prince Napoleon's presence in Genoa and Turin would lead to demonstrations of an unmistakable character.

Austria.

The correspondent of the Times at Vienna says, the spirit of the people in Austria has been aroused by the bestering of Sardinia and the domineering of France, and that they are well pleased with the spirit displayed by the Emperor. No fewer than ten thousand men were sent by railway from Vienna on Saturday the 8th, and by Wednesday seventeen thousand more, including cavalry, were on their way to Italy. Eight batteries, with the horses to each battery, were sent off on Monday. The celerity and ease with which the troops moved from one extremity of the Empire to the other had excited general astonishment. The Austrian corps of observation on the Servian frontier, were not above 4000 strong, and will not be reinforced.

The speech of the King of Sardinia on the opening of the Chambers, had produced an unfavorable effect on the Bourse.

The German Press, leaving the Austrian journals out of the question, are mainly in favor of peace, but do not wish to see Austria abandoned. Many Prussian journals wish their Government to support Austria if she is attacked.

Prussia.

The Prince Regent opened the Chambers on the 12th inst. The speech opened with a lament for the King's protracted sufferings and an appeal to the Chambers to support the Regent.

Spain.

The Madrid journals are again agitating the question of the emigration of Chinese coolies into Cuba, owing to the continued diminution of the black population. A royal decree suspends the recruiting for the colonies.

Turkey.

Another rupture has occurred between the Turks and Montenegrins, in which it is reported that some lives were lost on both sides. A new loan of fifteen million Francs has been contracted by the Porte, in spite of English protests.

India and China.

Calcutta papers of December 8, and Hong Kong of November 30th, had reached England. They add few additional items to the telegraphic accounts. The Nuwab of Bundah had surrendered to the British. The sentence of transportation on the ex-King of Delhi had been carried into effect, and the steamship Ningara had conveyed him to the Cape of Good Hope, which is to be his destination. The dispersion of the rebels continued, but without any decisive blow being struck.

Havana.

The Queen of Spain has invested Professor Morse with the Royal American Order of Isabella Catholic, the insignia of which have been sent to him. Professor Morse is now in Puerto Rica, on a visit to his daughter, who is married to a rich proprietor of that island. The Governor of Puerto Rica, we learn by private advices, has granted him a concession to establish telegraph lines throughout the island. He is also associated in the new enterprise for laying a submarine telegraph between Cadiz and Cuba. The Diario continues to comment on the President's message, and the proceedings in relation to it in the Spanish Cortes. It republishes the two speeches of Gen. O'Donnel, delivered on the 31st of December and the 12th of January. A shark of an earthquake was felt at Santiago de Cuba, on the 28th of January. No damage was done. A correspondent of the Delta says: The French steamer Francois 1st, Lostalot, master, arrived yesterday from Macau, with 836 coolies, having lost upon the way some 45 subjects. We had part of a cargo of negroes seized the other day, but 380 had already been placed beyond the reach of power. Vessel burned, and part of the crew (Spaniards) made prisoners. The Francois 1st, which arrived on the 1st instant, with coolies from Macao, was 84 days on her voyage, having called at the Cape of Good Hope. This cargo brings up the coolie introduction to 30,520, delivered alive, and perished on the way, by disease and suicides, 5614—all in the cause of British philanthropy. In this year many contracts for coolie service will expire, and we can begin to calculate the proportion of mortality which pertains to this system of benevolence and labor. The press here has been quite liberal in the diffusion of knowledge by free publication of letters, reports, etc., from Northern journals, as it really solicitous to circulate the facts, for the due advisement of Cuban intelligence.

Hayti.

Progress of the Revolution.—The Havana Diario de la Marina, of the 28th ult., has received a copy of the St. Thomas Times of the 15th ult., in which it finds the following news from Hayti, brought to St. Thomas by the British steamer Derwent: "The last news is that Soulouque, having advanced with his army to within two leagues of St. Mark, was twice routed by the Republic forces under command of Geffrard, and was compelled to retire to Port-au-Prince, where he arrived on the 10th. The proclamation issued by him confirms this intelligence, and is couched in very despairing language. "From Jacmel, at the last dates, there was a report that Soulouque had resolved to abdicate, and desired to effect this object by means of a convention; but it was believed that the Republicans being masters, they would demand an unconditional surrender, and even take his life. The proclamation to which the St. Thomas paper refers, admits defeat: "The insurgents," it says, "twice fired on my troops, taking the offensive both times. After such an event, with my heart deeply wounded, and in accordance with the opinions of my generals, I have resolved in order to avoid bloodshed, to return to Port-au-Prince and there take the measures which circumstances may demand."

Saint Domingo.

We learn from the Havana Diario that President Santana, of Saint Domingo, has issued a decree prohibiting coasting trade by foreign vessels after the 1st of July next, except in the ports of difficult access, viz: Barbacoa, Paradis and Petit Trou, on the South coast; and Barbaro, Palmrete and Macoris, on the North. In these it will be permitted on payment of a charge of four dollars a ton.

Sandwich Islands.

Our dates from the Sandwich Islands are to 25th December. A destructive storm had visited the Islands on the 16th and 17th of December. Our person, and a number of bridges swept away, and other property destroyed—causing a loss of about $20,000. The whaling brig Emma, was wrecked near Honolulu on the 15th of December. Dr. Thomas Charles Hyde Roake, F. R. L. S., who had been for 35 years a resident of the Sandwich Islands, died at Kailua, Hawaii, on the 28th November; and on the 5th December, an old native missionary, named Cook or Kuke, aged 77, died at Honolulu. He had been Chaplain to the last King.

Mexico

Pronunciamento in Tampico.—The Spanish steamer Leon arrived at Havana on the 28th ult., from Tampico. There had been a pronunciamento to that town on the 11th. The garrison, it appears, was disaffected towards Gen. Garza, but he succeeded in suppressing the mutiny for the moment.

DOMESTIC.

Washington Items.—The difficulty between Messrs. Douglas and Fitch is, it is said, not ended yet. The publication of the correspondence by Mr. Benjamin has created a good deal of indignation on the part of Douglas' friends, who publicly denounce it. Hawkins and Pryor, it is expected, will come out in a day or two, in a card couched in strong terms, and calling Mr. Benjamin to account, not only for the publication, but increasing libel of italicising the correspondence different from the originals. The Postmaster General estimates that about one million of dollars will be necessary for the transportation of mails between the United States and foreign countries, and from New York to New Orleans and San Francisco and back, for the next fiscal year. The largest part of the service is to be paid with the sea and inland postages. No new lines are recommended. The Douglas sympathisers had a sort of informal caucus at the Judge's house, the other day, with reference to the Presidential programme of 1860. Fowler, Connelly, Thompson, Sanders, and others of New York, with several Southern members of Congress were in favor of Douglas remaining in the Democratic party until the Charleston Convention. Forney was opposed to this, and desired the Judge to make an independent party. He was ruled out and now stands alone, as a monument of bitter personal partizanship. Whatever may be the secret of the differences between the leaders of New York politics, they are not prepared to enter into the impracticable schemes of poor Forney, they look more keenly to the spoils of office. Forney is savage at this cavalier manner of treatment. He dies hard.

Senate, Jan. 5.—On motion of Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, the vote on the Mississippi 2½ per cent. land bill, by which the bill passed, was reconsidered. Mr. Clay, of Alabama, reported a substitute for the recommendation of the Secretary, as contained in the Secretary's reply to the resolutions of Congress. Mr. Clay's substitute proposes retrenchment and economy in the administration of the government in various ways. It proposes, among other things, to reduce the number of persons employed in the collection of the revenue to one thousand less than the present number employed. A large number of memorials from citizens of New York were presented, praying against any increase of postage, and in favor of the Homestead bill.

Monarch respect for our Laws.—St. Louis, Feb. 5.—The St. Louis Republican of this morning publishes advices from Salt Lake City of the 14th, to the effect that the judicial officers of Utah Territory have become thoroughly disgusted with the condition of things in Utah, as regards the administration of law. The Republican says, that Judge Sinclare and Judge Cradlaugh have determined to resign and leave the Territory in the Spring. The judges say that the Mormons pretend to respect the forms of the law, but utterly disregard its spirit. They say that neither murder, nor any other crime, has been, nor can be punished in Utah, if the perpetrator happens to be a follower of the Prophet. They say that under such circumstances their presence in the Territory, as judicial officers of the Federal Government, is entirely useless, and their attempt to administer justice under the present state of things a mere farce.

Extensive Canal Fraud discovered.—Over $200,000 embezzled.—LOUISVILLE, Feb. 5.—Telegraphic dispatches received in this city to-day from Springfield, Illinois, report that a large number of canal checks had been discovered, upon which money has been paid, and no account of it rendered to the Company by the collectors. The loss will fall upon the State. The loss thus far discovered by the fraudulent issue and subsequent concealment of these checks is $210,000. Mr. Masterson, whose connection with the Canal throws suspicions upon him, has asked for a trial before the Circuit Court.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Baltimore and Brazil.—The Baltimore Board of Trade have under consideration the project of a steam communication between Baltimore and Brazil. The trade between the United States and the principal ports of Brazil—Rio de Janeiro, Pernambuco and Bahia—many at a low estimate be put down at $20,000,000, says a Baltimore paper, and of this amount the trade of the Chesapeake Bay—say the ports of Baltimore and Richmond, amounts to about $5,000,000, or about one-quarter part of the whole, and employing a capacity of about 43,000 tons of shipping, or three-eighths of the whole tonnage engaged in the trade between the United States and those ports.

The Shipping of Liverpool and London.—As far as sea going vessels are concerned, Liverpool is now ahead of London; but the immense number of colliers arriving at London, swells the total there above the total at Liverpool. In 1858, the tonnage arriving at Liverpool was, in round numbers, 3,750,000 tons, against 5,000,000 tons at London; but of the latter, about 3,000,000 tons were coasters. Last year's return, if we mistake not, made considerable less difference. These facts we obtain from an article in the New York Journal of Commerce.

LOCAL.

The Bars at the mouth of the Mississippi river are in a miserable condition. Nearly a hundred vessels are detained there.

The City Census.—The second attempt to take the census of New Orleans is a miserable failure. Numerous instances, some of which have come under our personal observation, of gross neglect, have been reported. We do believe, from what little we have seen, that not more than three-fourths of the population have been taken. In our limited acquaintance, we have heard already of a number of large families that have not been visited by the census-takers. Our own family, not inconsiderable in numerical importance, has not been taken. What does all this mean? Who, or what, is at the bottom of this strange mystery, or repeated failures to take the census of this city? Is our city government worth any thing or not? We wait for an affirmative answer in a correct census. When we get it, we will publish it to the world.

Large Arrival of Coffee.—We learn from a commercial house that four vessels have arrived at the bar of the Southwest Pass from Rio de Janeiro, with over 25,000 bags coffee, and that they may be expected up in the course of the day.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, February 8, 1859.

The following, copied from the New Orleans Price Current, furnishes the annexed statement of the past week's business:—The operations of the market, with more favorable weather have generally exhibited a good degree of activity, though our leading staple, Cotton, has not recovered from the check given to the demand by the Arabia's arrivers, received at the close of last week. It will be seen that but a comparatively limited business has been done within the week, at irregular and lower prices. In Sugar and Molasses, however, the movement has been active at improving prices, and in several articles of Western Produce the operations have reached a fair extent, but the Tobacco market remains without any transactions of magnitude. On Monday the weather was favorable for business but with a large amount of previous purchases to be received only a few buyers came forward, and the sales barely reached 1500 bales at irregular prices. Under similar circumstances, and with private disputes arriving later and still more unfavorable particulars of the Arabia's arrivers, there did not appear to be any disposition on the part of buyers generally to operate. The sales of the three days amount to only 6700 bales, at irregular rates, but generally at a fall fr. decline from previous quotations. On Wednesday there was rather more inquiry and some 6000 bales were disposed of, prices being still irregular and depressed. On Thursday the market wore a very heavy appearance, and and the sales, which amounted to about 5000 bales, were generally ill rates still more in favor of buyers. On Friday, again, great dullness prevailed, and there seems little probability of any movement of importance towards relieving the market until parties are in receipt of later European advices, now about due. The sales for the past week amount 23,000 bales. Arrived in the same time 77,688 bales. Exports of the week 44,542 bales. Stock in presses and on shipboard not cleared on the 4th inst. 428,284 bales. With respect to prices, we have to remark that there can hardly be said to have been any settled and established market during the week, and with a comparatively limited business has been done, and with a heavy and accumulating stock, great irregularity has prevailed in the rates, with the advantage constantly on the side of purchasers. The decline within the week is fully ¼ to ⅜ cent in the Middling and better grades, with very few buyers at this reduction, and as for the low dusty descriptions, of which there is an unusually large and constantly increasing proportion, they are wholly unsaleable and unquotable.

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 10,000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 4¼ to 5⅜; Common to Good Common 5⅜ to 6¼; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 7¼; Prime to Choice 7¼ to 8¼; Centrifugal and Clarified 8 to 9¼; Refined 10 to — cents per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 17,000 bbls. The quotations are: For Inferior and Fermenting 29 to 31½; Prime to Choice 32 to 34 in bbls. and in half-bbls. 35 to 39½ cents per gallon.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs, plauters, 4½ to 5¼; Leaf, Inferior to common 5¼ to 6¾; fair 6¾ to 7; fine 7½ to 8¼; choice, heavy and light, 8¾ to 9 cents per pound.

FLOUR.—The sales of the week have reached 12,500 barrels, at a range of $4 75 to $5 00 for fine and unbranded; $5 40 to $5 75 for superfine; $6 00 to $6 75 for extra, and $7 00 for ordinary to choice extra.

GRAIN.—The demand for Corn has been fair and prices well maintained—prices ranging from 85 to 90 for good to prime mixed, up to 95 cents per bushel for prime to choice white and yellow. Oats sell at 75 to 80 cents per bushel. Bran has been selling at $1 00 to $1 10 cents per 100 lbs. Wheat—85 to 90 cents per bushel for inferior; $1 00 for prime red, and $1 10 to $1 20 for prime white.

PORK.—The sales for the past week ranged at about $13 00 to $20 00 per barrel for Mess; $18 50 to $19 00 for M. O., and $13 50 for Prime.

BEEF.—The market very dull. Prime at $8 50; Mess at $14 50 per barrel. Most of the transactions have been on private terms, for shipment.

BACON.—Shoulders 7¾; Hilded Sides 9¾ to 10¼; Clear Sides 11¼; Sugar-cured Hams 12¾ cents per pound.

LARD.—In barrels and tierces 11¼ to 12; kegs 13¼ to 13 cents per pound.

BUTTER.—Western has been selling at 9¾ to 12½; prime roll Butter at 18 to 20 cents per pound.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12 to 14 cents per yard; India Bagging at 13¼ to 13¾c. Bale Rope, machine made, at 7¾ cents per pound; hand made 8¾ to 8¾ cents.

CORN MEAL.—Have sold during the week at a range of 95 to 10 and 11¼ cents for heavy to extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote Sales at 10¾ to 11, good fair at 11¼, and prime at 11¾ cents per pound.

MONEY MARKET.—The supply of money in the hands of capitalists is very ample, and the amount of paper offering through the discount brokers not at all large for this time of the season. The applications for short loans at the Banks continue to be pretty heavy, sufficiently so, indeed, as to call into use all the resources of those institutions. The rates are 8 to 9 per ct. for good mortgage notes; 8 to 9 for first class long dated acceptances; second class ditto 9½ to 10, and for short commercial paper from 6 to 7 per cent. per annum.

LIVE STOCK.—Beef Cattle—in good demand and the better grades of Western beeves sold at 8 to 10c. per lb. net; extra at 10c. and Texas at $18 00 to $25 00 and $42 00 per head. Hogs at 7¾ to 8 cents per lb. net. Sheep $3 50 to $6 00 per head. Milch Cows, $40 to $70 and $95 per head. Veal Cattle, $7 00 to $13 00 per head.

Liverpool Cotton Market.—The Asia's advices came to hand yesterday, bringing dates from Liverpool to 22d ult, reporting but a moderate business in the cotton market, and prices in favor of the buyer, with sales for the week of 44,000 bales; Fair Orleans is quoted at 7¾d., Mobile, 7d; and Middling Orleans, 6¾d, Mobile, 6 11-16. The stock on hand was 346,980 bales, including 272,000 American. The London Money market is reported to be easy. An advance of ¼ is reported in Consols with quotations at 95¾ to 95¾.

Hunt's Cotton Market is reported dull, and experienced a decline, under the influence of a severe panic in the early part of the week. Orleans tres ordinaire is quoted at 9¼.

Havana Markets.—There has been some movement in Sugar, and contracts for 22,000 boxes of new crop at $25, $25 50 and $26 per box, with advances to the amount of $30,000 on all. No business done by the regular merchants holding the heaviest orders for Europe and the United States, as they deem the pretensions of planters altogether too high. The shipments of the past week are equal to 8000 boxes, hence and from Matanzas—for Nos. 11 and 12, 9¾ to 9¾ rials; and choice 12, one or two small lots, disposed of at 10 rials per arobe. The stock of old Sugar in the two ports remaining on hand is 50,000 boxes against 74,000 at same time 1858. Molasses, 3¼ rials. Sales of Lard at $17 25 to 18 00. Stock, 1000 bbls. and tcs. and 400 kegs. Tallow, 13¾ to 14. Pitch pine boards $20 to 26 50 per M. Freights have been more active, but without improvement in rates for United States ports. £2 to 2 10 to Cowes, Falmouth and Cork, for orders. Exchange is slightly declining. New Orleans, 4¼ to 5 per cent. prem; short sight; New York, 3 to 3½, sixty days; Boston, 2½ to 3, 10; London, 13 to 13½ do.

San Francisco Markets.—Owing to bad weather and other causes, trade was dull. Capital was abundant. From the States and from China over-shipments of goods were being made. Boots and shoes, coffee, coal, cordage, cornmeal, fish, beef, pork, nails and candles were rather dull. Fruits, sauces, molasses, choice butter and lard, are doing well.

Galveston Markets.—The Galveston News of the 30, says—Our last report closed upon an active week. On Thursday heavy rains set in, which lasted till Friday night, rendering out-of-door business almost impossible. Accounts of the rapid falling of Trinity river, and laying up of the steamers, caused much disappointment, which is however somewhat relieved by advices of a rise in the upper river. Receipts are kept small by bad condition of roads, and as the time is near at hand when planters cannot spare horses and hands from the field for hauling, it becomes probable that the delivery of produce will be delayed to a late season.

THE CHEAPEST AND BEST LIGHT YET—MADE from Kitchen-grease or common Lard.—

The justly celebrated FRANKLIN BROOKS SUMMER PORTABLE LAMP, made in this city. This lamp produces, from the poorest quality of Lard or Grease, as much light as a medium SOLAR, at one quarter the cost, looking less than a half pint and burns ten hours or more, producing a beautiful light, pleasant even to weak eyes, requiring but little cleaning, and only coarse cotton flannel for wicks.

Each line of her childhood's faded track.
Oh, hush the song! and let her tears
Flow to the dream of her early years!
Holy and pure are drops which fall,
When the young bride goes from her father's hall;
She goes unto love yet untried and new—
She parts with love which hath still been true."

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN NOTICES.

OUR OLD AND DISTINGUISHED PREACHERS should labor for the ADVOCATE as well as the young men. When they do not, it is a pity, for their influence would enable them to do of great advantage to the paper, and their example would encourage and train the young preachers in great usefulness in this way.

The Venerable Peter Cartwright is an instance on the other side. He recently sent TEN NEW subscribers, and the money for many old ones, to the Ladies Repository. Will our leading men lead in the effort to raise our list at once to ten thousand? Come, "most potent, grave and reverend Seniors," we all honor you; let us follow you in this path of usefulness.

The Proportion of ADVOCATES taken, to the white membership of the Church, ought to be as one to five, at least. Families do not average more than five white persons in number. The Alabama Conference has 45,040 white members. One ADVOCATE to five members would give us over 9000 subscribers in that Conference. If it be said, that other Advocates circulate there as well as ours, we reply—every family ought to take their own Advocate first, and then any other they wish. Again: the families in our congregations, not members of the Church, will take the ADVOCATE if applied to; and this will more than compensate for any loss on the other score. According to this rule, in the Mississippi Conference, which has near 20,000 members, we ought to have 4000 subscribers; and in the Louisiana Conference, which has near 10,000 white members, we now have 1803 subscribers. Just look at this, and think about it! It could be done this year. Brethren in the ministry, please state and enlarge upon this calculation before all your congregations. It would give us 15,000 subscribers.

TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS FROM EACH PREACHER is what we propose, and hope for during the present year, as the minimum standard. Many, of course, will procure a much larger number; but we hope no Preacher will fall below this. It is not a large number, and it will not be hard work to reach it. Brethren in the ministry; could you not obtain this number within the next month? What a life of success and encouragement for the paper—for you—for the Church—it would create!

An Example.—The Western Christian Advocate says—Monday, January 3, 1859, was the heaviest day's work in the periodical line ever experienced by the Cincinnati Book Concern. There were received and transferred to the books some 2250 subscribers to the Western Christian Advocate, and 1,200 to the Ladies' Repository. The same figures for each were entered Thursday, December 30th, making the total for the two days—3500 for the Western Christian Advocate, and 2400 for the Repository.

Are Southern Preachers so utterly behind Northern Preachers in approchation of, and labor for, religious periodicals? Let it be said no longer.

New Orleans Depository.

If any persons have presumed to doubt the permanency of our Depository at this point, we beg leave to state that we are a permanent reality; and that nothing is more unpleasant than to have one's existence questioned. To live is the very least of our purpose; we expect to thrive, and have no little comfort in the fact that we love to both. Talking of living, puts us in mind of one of the best autobiographies in the English language—not excepting that of Dr. Franklin—the Life of Bishop Capers—which we have at $1 25. All the Books published at our Publishing house at Nashville, for sale at Nashville prices, by KEENEN AND McTYEIRE.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

News for the Children.

Little Readers! You wish to hear the news, do you [illegible] why should you not have your share in your part of [illegible] The old folks have the news in their part, and you [illegible]

[illegible] begin? The world and the newspapers [illegible] tell you all, if we were to talk [illegible] Let us begin with [illegible] It is as dumb as a dead dog, [illegible] hope to make it work. We do not [illegible] until they lay down a new wire. But they [illegible] another cable, by another route. It is said, that [illegible] Steamer, during the coming Summer, with engineers [illegible] intends to travel over and examine the route, [illegible] Iceland and Faroe Isles, which, in his opinion, [illegible] only one practicable for a telegraph between Europe and [illegible] Get your Geography and Atlas, and find out where [illegible] route lies, or get your parents or friends to do it for you.

Now let us tell you about a strange thing—

An Arctic Newspaper.

Published at Tromsoe, a town of 4000 people, on the coast of Norway, three degrees [illegible] the Polar circle. The paper is called the Tromsoe Visitor. Wonder if it has a "Children's Column?" The Steamer has kindly looked in at the office window at midnight to see that the forms are properly set up. Ask [illegible] to explain this, and also the geography of [illegible] Tromsoe is a four-paged semi-weekly sheet, with only two columns on a page, and is about the size of a quarto book-cover. The style of the type is the Gothic, which has been discarded in Sweden, and to a considerable extent both in Germany and Denmark. The latter, are the only nations which retain the Gothic hand-writing. You know what the Gothic hand-writing is, of course. If not, ask some one.

Had you heard of the Great Filibuster Catholic?

The Mobile Tribune says that on Sunday before last, Gen. Walker of Nicaragua, made a public confession of faith at the Cathedral, and was received into the Roman Catholic Church. Father Chalon preached the sermon on the occasion. We are rather glad of it; we will tell you why one of these days. Do not ask us now. But we should not be glad if you were to turn [illegible] ; we should be very sorry.

On the 23d day of this month, they are going to have what they call [illegible]

A National Sunday School Convention.

A national convention of Sunday School teachers to be held in Philadelphia, to consider the best means of promoting the cause of Sunday Schools. Each Evangelical School in the Union is invited to send at least one delegate. We are sorry to say it, but we have no faith in this Convention. They always [illegible] in the North. They should hold some of them in the South. Then they did not give notice of it until so late, that but few Southern delegates can be there. And then it is gotten up by the American Sunday School Union in order to get their paper widely circulated, and thus break down our Sunday School Visitor. Let them have their Convention to themselves.

You have heard of the great Scotch Poet, Robert Burns, and have read some his poetry, have you not? If you have not, you must get Dallas' Poems, and read them, and get some of your friends to tell you all about him. He was a good fellow, but was unfortunately in the habit of drinking too much. One of his beautiful poems is called "Highland Mary," after a young Scotch "lassie," whom Burns praises in the poem. We will tell you something about Highland Mary's Nephew.

In Caledon, York county, Canada West, resides a Mr. Wm. Anderson, who is a nephew of Burns' Highland Mary. He is, perhaps, the nearest blood relation to her whose memory is so intimately blended [illegible] the Poet's history. Mr. Anderson is a respectable farmer, [illegible] the meridian of life, enjoying good health, and is the head of a numerous and interesting family. His eldest daughter, Mary, now emerging from her teens, is generally known as Highland Mary. When Mr. Anderson came to this [illegible] years ago, he had in his possession the Bible which Burns presented to Mary, and several other relics of interest, but these have been sent to the safe keeping of a society in Scotland.

Dr. Livingstone.

Gentlemen, as you have read in the newspapers, made a trip into the interior of Africa, where no white man had ever been before, and was gone several years, so that he was given up for lost; but he returned to England last year. He is now gone back on another trip. He writes from the Zambezi, Africa, September 14th, and speaks of that river as navigable for small-draught steamers ten months in the year, if not constantly. He also mentions a fact of great importance to the future of African commerce, that there is "an immense coal field" at Tete, on the Zambezi, were many of the seams crop out; and remarks that, "with coal and the best iron ore in abundance, surely Africa will not always be the trodden-down nation it has been."

Little California Hero.

All the little readers of The Pacific Methodist in California, have heard of Frazer river. This is the place where so many people went last Summer, all expecting to get rich very fast. But like a great many other things that look bright and hopeful, the Frazer river gold mines proved to be a failure—many of the gold seekers were drowned in going up the river, and the Indians killed some of them. They have nearly all come back disappointed and poorer than when they started. So it is very often, with those who seek the riches of this world; but all who really seek for the pearl of great price, the treasure in Heaven, will surely find it. Can you tell in what chapter of the New Testament something is said of this treasure?

One of the ships that brought the gold-hunters back from Frazer river was the Leone. She was not a steamship, but a sailing vessel. She sailed from Victoria about the first of November, with quite a number of passengers, men, women and children. She was bound to San Francisco. A thick fog came on [illegible] the fourth day; it was so heavy that nothing could be seen [illegible] short distance. The ship [illegible] her reckoning, and the Captain and mates could not tell just where they were. They kept hearing about for two days, hoping the fog would clear away. There are light-houses along the coast, put there to show the sailors on the coast where they are, and to let them know where the dangerous places are. You can see a light in the dark, but you cannot see it in a fog. As the ship was sailing along in the fog, suddenly a man cried out—

"Breakers ahead!"

Quick stood at the ship the breakers were roaring and dashing [illegible] the rocks.

"Put down the helm!" cried the Captain.

But it was too late, the ship could not be stopped, but went crashing upon the rocks! It was a terrible scene. The ship was [illegible] and sinking. The land was in sight, and some of the men threw themselves into the sea to swim ashore; some where getting the boats ready, some were crying, and all were in the greatest confusion.

Soon the boats were ready, and the men began to crowd into them, while the ship was fast sinking. There was a lady and [illegible] on the ship. One of the men took hold of the little [illegible] and put him into the boat. The noble little fellow was thinking [illegible] mother, and cried out—

"[illegible] my mother, if you let me drown!"

[illegible] a little hero, and had a true, brave, loving heart. The [illegible] loving hearts are the bravest. Remember that, boys. The sailors [illegible] the little boy and took his mother, and put her into the boat, and he tried to get on another boat that belonged to some fishermen, but they tore his little hands away and pushed him into the sea. The great waves tossed him like a feather, and he thought he must be drowned or dashed to pieces upon the rocks.

O, what agony [illegible] her little boy sinking in the [illegible] man in the other [illegible] all their might towards [illegible] struggling in the water. They reached him just in time, and pulled him into the boat and gave him to his mother, who wept for joy. And so they were both saved.

Methodism in Ireland.

The Christian Intelligencer, on the subject of Protestantism in Ireland, thus speaks of the Methodists: "The Irish Methodist Conference has long operated with wonderful success among the most popular portions of the community. [illegible] missionary band has been set apart entirely for aggressive action, with a view to Protestantize popish Ireland; and in this moral campaign, their victories have been particularly during the past two or three years, [illegible] few nor small. The success had been so encouraging that the expenditure and the agents are to be largely augmented."

Gen. Handerson, the highest officer in the Marine Corps died in Washington, on the 16th of January. He was a native of Virginia, and had been in the service of the country since 1806, during the greater of his life a resident of Washington City.

The Paris Concurrency has received on prosecuting M. [illegible] of the Paris Univers, for having accused the Jews [illegible]—constantly troublesome or lunching [illegible]

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

RUTH.

Where in the whole range of English poetry, can be found a better description of an infant, than the following lines afford? They are by Dr. Holland, author of the "Titcomb Letters."

[Keeping and rocking the cradle.]

What is the little one thinking about?
Very wonderful things, no doubt;
Unwritten history!
Unfathomable mystery!
Yet he laughs and cries, and eats and drinks,
And chuckles and crows, and nods and winks,
As if his head were as full of kinks
And curious riddles as any sphinx!
Warped by colic, and wet by tears,
Puncture by pins, and tortured by fears,
Our little nephew will lose two years;
And he'll never know
Where the Summers go;
He need not laugh, for he'll find it so!
Who can tell what a baby thinks?
Who can follow the gossamer links
By which the mannikin feels his way
Out from the shore of the great unknown,
Blind, and wailing, and alone,
Into the light of day?
Out from the shore of the unknown sea,
Tossing in pitiful agony,
Of the unknown sea that reels and rolls,
Speckled with the barks of little souls—
Barks that were launched on the other side,
And slipped from heaven on an ebbing tide!
What does he think of his mother's eyes?
What does he think of his mother's hair?
What of the cradle roof that flies
Forward and backward through the air?
What does he think of his mother's breast?
Rare and beautiful, smooth and white,
Seeking it ever with fresh delight—
Cup of his life and couch of his rest?
What does he think when her quick embrace
Presses his hands and buries his face
Deep where the heart-throbs sink and swell
With a tenderness she can never tell,
Though she murmur the words
Of all the birds—
Words she has learned to murmur well!
Now he thinks he'll go to sleep!
I can see the shadow creep,
Over his eyes, in soft eclipse,
Over his brow, and over his lips,
Out to his little finger tips!
Softly sinking, down he goes!
Down he goes! Down he goes!

[Rising and carefully retreating to her seat.]

See! He is hushed in sweet repose.

THE DETROIT ELOPEMENT.

A Black Honeymoon.—The Detroit Press has some account of the manner in which Miss Judson, who eloped with the negro, spent the time among her new friends. It says:

The style of living which the young woman was introduced to on the first day of the honeymoon is worth noticing. Her sable lover, in pursuance of an intention to set up housekeeping, bought some dishes and old furniture, and the two moved into a board shanty in the back part of Windsor. This was in the negro quarter, which it is needless to say, comprises several quarters of the whole town, and was surrounded by about fifty more shanties. The occupants of these, quite taken by surprise, turned out en masse, and the bridal calls of the young wife consisted of an indiscriminate rush of darkies of all ages, sexes, colors and varieties. The only room she had was filled with these odorous visitors, from morning till night, who gazed at her with open mouths, while little ebonies climbed on the roof, peeped in the windows, and stole her corn bread.

It is estimated by competent Windsor authorities that she received a thousand calls the first day. How she got through with her receptions is unknown, but considering the fact that she had been brought up in decency, it is natural to suppose that her stomach must have rebelled occasionally, notwithstanding the incalcations of her father, who believed them good enough for her until they actually got her. The story which the parent circulated, to the effect that she was insane, and that he should put her in an asylum, is all bosh. No insane asylum will admit he, as she has given not the slightest sign of insanity.

TOO TRUE.

An editor whose vocation requires him to travel all over this great country, has been amusing himself by gathering statistics of politeness and boorishness among men and women traveling by cars and steamboats. Of twenty-three men whom he helped to a cigar-light, or loaned them a newspaper, twenty said: "Thank you, sir." Of nineteen women to whom he paid a courtesy—such as giving up his seat, picking up a dropped veil, shawl, or the like, only seven said, "Thank you," and two of those were "foreigners."

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

On the 6th day of January, 1759; George Washington was married to Mrs. Custis. Washington Irving, in his life of Washington, thus refers to the marriage, which took place shortly after the taking of Fort Duquesne and Washington's return to his home: "His marriage with Mrs. Custis took place shortly after his return. It was celebrated on the 6th of January, 1759, at the White House, the residence of the bride, in the good old hospitable style of Virginia, amid a joyous assemblage of relatives and friends."—Savannah News.

WHISPER TO THE MARRIED.

Two persons who have chosen each other out of all the species, with the design to be each other's mutual comfort and entertainment, have in that very action, bound themselves to be good humored, affable, joyful, forgiving and patient, with respect to each others frailties and imperfections, to the end of their lives.

HEREDITARY FEATURES.

A peculiar thickness of the under lip has been hereditary in the Imperial House of Hapsburg ever since the marriage, some centuries ago, with the Polish family of Jaggellon, whence it came. A certain fullness in the lower and lateral parts of the face is conspicuous in the portraits of the whole series of sovereigns, from George I. to Victoria, and has been equally marked in other members of the family. The females of the ducal house of Gordon have long been remarkable for a peculiarly elegant conformation of the neck. The Clackmannanshire Bruces, who are descended from a common stock with the famous Robert Bruce, of Scotland, are said to have that strongly marked form of the cheek bones and jaws which appear on the coins of that heroic monarch, as it did in his actual face when his bones were disinterred at Dunfermaline, about thirty years ago.

The prevalent tallness of the inhabitants of Potsdam, many of whom are descended from the guards of Frederick I; the Spanish features observable in the people of the county of Galway, in which, some centuries ago, several Spanish settlements were made; and the hereditary beauty of the women of Prague—are well known facts which have frequently attracted the attention of chronologists. The burgesses of Rome (the most invariable portion of every population) exhibit at the present day precisely the same type of face and form as their ancestors, whose busts may be seen carved in relief on the ancient sarcophagi; and the Jewish physiognomies, portrayed upon the sepulchral monuments of Egypt, are identical with those which may be observed among modern Jews in the streets of any of our great cities.

Humorous.

Just Look at Those Clothes.

A few weeks ago an accident occurred on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. A passenger car was thrown off and smashed. Among the passengers was the venerable ex-Governor Matthews. Now he had provided himself with a bran new suit of clothes, especially for Christmas, which everybody knows is remarkable. The "copperas breeches," wool hat, etc., were left at home, and the Governor that morning was rigged op in real prim style. But the clothes came out of the crash looking decidedly worse for the wear. "I congratulate you, Governor, upon not being hurt," said a friend. "Hurt, thunder, just took all these new clothes!" [Prairie News.

The Satisfied not Satisfied.

An advocate of a French provincial town was waited on by a sausage-dealer, who said, "Sir, I want to consult you. If a dog devours sausages placed in my window, can I make his owner pay the damage?" "Certainly." "In that case please to pay me twelve francs, for your dog has just eaten sausages of mine to that extent." The advocate paid the money. An hour after the advocate's clerk called on the sausage-dealer, and claimed twenty francs for "a consultation about sausages; and the tradesman, to his intense mortification, had to hand over the sum claimed.

Elected on The First Ballot.

An exchange says that during the recent election for United States Senators in South Carolina, one for the long term and the other for the unexpired term of Judge Evans, there was many ballotings and much excitement. A gay, dashing young widow, of great personal attractions, was in Columbia at the time, and the nephew of one of the contestants became so confused between the calls of love and the lobby, that he actually declared himself to the lady as "a candidate for the unexpired term of her late husband!" He was elected to the vacancy on the first ballot. [Boston Post.

The Philadelphian's Opinion of Gas.

The Press re-publishes a remonstrance against lighting Philadelphia with gas, which was submitted to the Council of that city, in November, 1833, and bears the signatures of many of the leading citizens, among others that of John C. Cresson, now Engineer and Superintendent of the public gas works. The remonstrants allege that gas is as ignitible and consequently as dangerous as gunpowder, and that it will ruin the waters of the Delaware and Schuylkill.

Unexpected Result of Eloquance.

A German clergyman by way of giving point to a eulogy of a dead man at a funeral, declared that his own experience would prove that the defunct was the most generous of men, as he had long ago borrowed forty dollars of him, of which to his dying day he had never asked the payment. Of the debt thus acknowledged before witnesses, however, the heirs the next day, demanded the payment with interest.

"Buckwheat Cakes, and the Measles."

W. H. Fry, Esq., discoursing at the New York Typographical Society dinner upon the wonderful brevity of expression brought about by the use of the telegraph, says a friend of his went to St. Louis, and familiarly telegraphed to his wife in New York—"What have you for breakfast, and how is the baby?" She telegraphed back "Buckwheat cakes, and the measles."

Smoking.

A lady was declaring she could not understand how gentlemen could smoke. "It certainly shortens their lives," said she. "I don't know that," replied a gentleman. "There is my father, who smokes every blessed day, and he is now seventy years old." "Well, if he had never smoked he might have been eighty."

Where's the Pig?

A newly imported "help," after being established in a Fifth avenue palace as maid of all work, was seen shortly after with a pail full of slops from the kitchen, carefully exploring the parlors, the drawing-room, the library, the boudoir, the missle-room, and other places, as if in search of something which she could not find. At last, meeting the lady of the house she inquired seriously, "If you plaze, mistress, where's the pig?"

Erskine,

To all letters soliciting subscription to anything, had a regular form of reply, viz: "Sir, I feel much honored by your application to me, and I beg to subscribe"—here the reader had to turn over the leaf—"myself your very obedient servant, etc." Another is excellent: "When Lord Erskine heard that somebody had died worth two hundred thousand pounds, he observed, "Well, that's a very pretty sum to begin the next world with."

A Gentlemanly Bridegroom.

The young Queen of Portugal lately asked her husband at dinner what wine he preferred. "Port-you-gal" was the reply.

A Tar and a Tar-tar.

A sailor being asked how he liked his bride, is reported to have remarked—"Why, d'ye see, t took her to be only half of me, as the parson says, but dash me, if she isn't twice as much as I. I'm only a tar—she's a tar-tar."

Garden, Farm and Plantation.

Fruit Culture.

Every year brings additional proof that the apple can be cultivated advantageously here. Mr. Graham, of Portersville, Ala., has a tree of apples which he calls the "Monstrous Pippin," specimens of which he exhibited, of such extraordinary size that some Northern captain engaged trees of him to take home.

The culture of the apple is easy. The best to set out are year old grafts of from four to six feet high. They should be planted no deeper than they originally grew. It is still better, unless the soil be very porous, to raise the ground where each should stand, and set the tree a couple of inches higher than it grew. To form a good head, the top should be cut back to the hight of three feet, just above a plump healthy bud. The first year after planting, the top bud will shoot out and a number of side ones. Of the side shoots only two or three should be allowed to grow near the top, and all the others rubbed off when tender. The second year the top shoot should be again cut down to one-half of the preceding year's growth. The side shoots, or limbs, should be cut to twelve or fourteen inches of the trunk, and the two terminal buds on each be alone allowed to grow so as to form a fork. After this no trimming will be required, except to suppress badly placed shoots, which is best done by rubbing them off when tender. The tree will form a fine head, and the fourth year begin to yield fruit.

The cultivation required is merely to keep the ground around the trees scrupulously clear of grass, to loosen the soil by forking in the fall and spring, and to supply some food to the roots by turning under with the fork some ashes, old plaster, or refuse lime, well-rotted chip manure, or the like. Long manure spread around the tree as a mulch is excellent, and far better than applied to the roots directly.

The enemies of the apple tree are the "wooly aphis," a small insect like a white powder, and the "borer," a grub which cuts into the body near the roots. The former must be well scrubbed off with a brush and soap-suds, lye or tobacco water, as soon as they appear. The borer, which manifests its presence by the discoloration of the bark and the oozing of the sap at the orifice of his hole, must be cut out with a sharp knife; if he has succeeded in lodging himself deeply in the wood of the tree, a flexible wire inserted in his hole will put an end to his ravages.

There are so many sorts of apples which succeed admirably here, that one can hardly go amiss. However, the "Red June," "Bevan's Favorite," "Red Astrachan," "Horse" and "Cheese" apples are all excellent for family use. Amateurs desiring an extra large apple, and hy-the-by, a very good one, will find their taste gratified by the "Monstrous Pippin" or "Ox Apple."

SYLVANUS.

SOUTHERN BOOKS.

We refer attention, says the Advocate and Journal, to the advertisement of Books by Rev. Dr. M'Ferrin, of the Southern Book concern. Among them are some new and important volumes, as "The Headlands of Faith," by Rev. Dr. Cross, an admirable work; "The Platform of Methodism," "Analysis of Church Government," etc., valuable to Methodists, North as well as South. The peculiar publications of each section, so far as they are of general adaptation, should circulate in both, and we are glad to see that the respective publishing houses are endeavoring to accommodate the reading public in this way.

The Southern Publishing House is showing noteworthy energy; its publications are of an excellent style of execution, and its influence on the South must be vast and invaluable.

The New Cent.—The new cent ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury is now in process of coinage at Philadelphia, and will be distributed in January or February. The obverse presents an ideal head of America; and the drooping plumes of the North American Indian give it the character of North America. The head is intended as an illustration of "Liberty." The reverse is a plain laurel wreath enclosing the words ONE CENT; weight seventy-two grains, or three-twentieths of a troy ounce—eighty-eight per cent. copper and twelve per cent. nickel.

The Italian newspaper published in New York, L'Eco d'Italia, has just entered upon the tenth year of its existence, and makes its appearance in a larger sheet and more elegant type. In its issue of the first of January it contains an address of considerable length, adopted and issued at Turin by the Central Committee of Italian patriots, on the 14th of November. This committee acts in the name of the National Italian Society, consisting of political exiles from all parts of Italy who have found shelter at Turin. The address insists that the success of the cause of liberty in Italy must depend upon the aid it receives from the Piedmontese government. This point is elaborated at much length.

In Mexico, since the fall of Zuluoga, and the assumption of the Government by Gen. Robles, a Jnuta-Popnlaire has been formed, of Conservatores and Clergy, which elected Gen. Miramon President by 52 votes, against 46 for Robles. Telegraphic dispatches have been published announcing the complete defeat of Degrelado by Miramon, but the same was doubted.

The Jaurez Government remain firm. The Liberals have taken Jalapa, Cordova, and are now attacking Orizaba.

A New Enterprise.—Col. Daniel P. Sparks, owner of one of the wharvee at Indianola, and Judge Hugh W. Hawes, both men of means, experience and energy, have determined to get up a line of steamers, to run direct from New Orleans to Matagorda Bay, to be denominated "The Western Texas and New Orleans Steamship Company." Upon this line freights are not to exceed 60 cents per barrel, cotton $1 50 per halo, nor passage $15 00.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. ALICE T. SURATT, wife of Rev. S. B. Suratt of the Louisiana Conference, died January 2d, 1859. Sister S. was born in Limestone county, Alabama, October 24, 1830. A few years since, she emigrated to Shelby county, Tennessee; she married December 22, 1857, and immediately bade adieu to fond parents and friends, to share with her husband the labors of an itinerant life in the Louisiana Conference, who, at that time was stationed at Baton Rouge. In 1858, they were sent to the Mansfield and Pleasant Hill Circuit. Here we first became acquainted with her—except that we had known her as "Nellie," in the various periodicals to which she contributed. She was truly a co-laborer with her husband in doing good. In the class-meetings, prayer-meetings and revival-meetings, she was ever present and an efficient laborer. We recollect well the first time we called on her to pray in a revival meeting. How earnest—how devout. The whole soul was poured forth into the ears of the Almighty, while, apparently, everything else was lost sight of; and the prayer ended, as her's usually did, in imtelinliahs and praises to God; while all around caught the spirit, and united in the song of praise. To show the sweet union which constantly existed between her soul and the Savior, we will give a short extract from one of her private letters to a friend:—"How are you getting along with your prayer-meetings? The last time I have been out to church, was to our prayer-meeting a few weeks ago. I walked into church alone—sat down at the alter alone—read my bible alone—kneeled in prayer, not alone, for God was with me—and I had a happy little meeting; left the church, feeling that it was good to be there." The meetings, referred to, were female prayer-meetings. It is easy to anticipate how one died, who thus lived. In her sickness, she was resigned; but still hoped, till into in her sickness, that she would recover. With her husband she conversed freely on the subject of religion, to whom she gave the most satisfactory evidence of her title to eternal life. The evening before she died, she requested that beautiful hymn to be sung, "Jesus, lover of my soul." One hour before her death she was informed that she must die. Said she, "must I die? Well, sing for me, 'O, sing home of heaven.'" Entering into the spirit of it, she shouted and praised God while her strength would permit. Her friends proposed to sing, "I would not live always;" "No," said she, "sing 'A charge to keep, I have;'" and when she came to the verse, "O, thy servant, Lord, prepare, a strict account to give;" she said, "That will do." Her husband asked, If she had any word to leave him? She said, "Preach the Gospel!" She leaves an infant, a few weeks old, a husband deeply afflicted, but resolved to take the advice, "preach the Gospel!" as a precious legacy bequeathed to him—and to be more abundant in labor.

J. PIPES.

RUFUS E. CASE, Esq., died at his plantation, near Madison parish, Louisiana, on the 29th Nov. 1858, in the 35th year of his age. The deceased had been for ten years favorably known in this city. He was a native of Kentucky; was a classical scholar and educated for the law, which for a short time he practiced. His refined and elegant manners, his quick perception of the courtesies of life, and the ease with which he accommodated himself to any circle in which he was thrown, were the least remarkable features of his character. Culture had given breadth and vigor to a mind of no ordinary mould. His reading was extensive, his taste refined, his information was varied and accurate, his conversation fluent and instructive and the occasional productions of his pen were marked with an ease and sprightliness seldom excelled. Generous in his nature, impulsive in temperament, passionately fond of the beautiful, he was eminently fitted for social life. In his family, he was thoughtful, tender, affectionate and forbearing; his servants were part of his household; and his wife and children were loved with a fondness little short of idolatry. His domestic training had made familiar and easy many of the great duties of religion; and, in his most forgetful season, the doctrines of the Bible were profoundly believed. Reared by Methodist parents, he in early life attached himself to that Church. A deep conviction that the work of the ministry was his proper calling; and a shrinking back, whether from conscious unfitness or from an ambition to become otherwise distinguished, made his religious life an unsteady one. His struggles and his repose, his victories and his defeats, were known only to those who knew him well, and enjoyed his confidence fully. At the time of his death he was a member of the Church; and although, for some weeks previous he had endured one of those conflicts which often resulted in his overthrow, there is ground for belief that he died the death of the righteous. Thus has fallen, ere he reached the mid-day of life, a man, towards whom the eyes of the Church were turned with steady hope, that the talent God had given would be employed in preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ. Had this hope been realized, he might have lived to-day, a polished shaft in his master's hands; or, if fallen, he might have worn many stars in the crown of his rejoicing. Who shall draw back when the Master bids, go; or, who shall receive grace like Him, in a dying hour, when faltering and doubt have marked the whole career of life. But he is gone—admonished of life's fearful uncertainty, and charged with his high duty, let us seek to be ready to say, "Come, Lord Jesus! and come quickly."—W.

MRS. ANN ELIZA BARLOW, wife of Rev. A. D. Barlow, departed this life on the 13th inst. in joyful hope of a blessed immortality. The deceased was born in Lawrence county, Mississippi, Sept. 29, 1816; in September, 1837, she embraced the religion of our blessed Savior, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. From that time to the day of her death she maintained an exemplary and consistent Christian walk. Humble quiet and unobtrusive, though earnest in her religious character; her deep piety shone with brightest lustre in the family circle, where she endeavored to "point to heaven, and lead the way." She had been the child of affliction for a number of years previous to her death, often being brought by severe sickness to the very brink of the grave. On such occasions, there was no shrinking back to earth, but a calm waiting for the summons to the better land—a desire to depart and be with Christ. On one of these occasions in particular, when she seemed not only to be trembling on the verge of time the other spirit, as all thought, had actually taken its flight, culmination for a season being suspended—while the family and friends were weeping around her couch, she revived—her countenance radiant, with a heavenly smile she exclaimed, almost in a tone of disappointment, "O! I thought I was in the midst of beautiful angels, bathing in the river of life." The time of her release had not then come. A further dispensation of affliction and suffering was appointed; but her freed spirit has at last gone to bathe in the River of Life, and to mingle in that blessed angel throng. Our sister leaves a devoted husband and seven children, three sons and four daughters.

Why should we wish thee back, to suffer still Beneath affliction's painful, chastening rod?
Since thy release is by thy Father's will;
And thy departure is, to be with God.

Canton, Mississippi, Jan. 24, 1859. W. M. C.

NANCY ELIZABETH, youngest child of our brother and sister William and Susan Brack, of Caddo parish, La. Born on the 12th of March, 1842, in Talladega county, Ala., died on the 23d of November, 1858. Her sojourn on earth was just 16 years, 7 months and 11 days.

"How deep the pathos, and how short the date."

For the last three years, this dear lamented young lady had been (and was at the time of her departure) a pupil of our College here, and from her quiet and amiable demeanor, studious habits, uniform and cheerful observance of rule and order, as well also as from her remarkably kind, gentle and peaceable disposition, associated with becoming modesty, prudence and general propriety of goodnct, she had secured, not only the esteem and approbation of her teachers, but likewise the respect, love and confidence of all her schoolmates.

In her character there were exhibited the dutiful and devoted daughter, the tender and affectionate sister, the warmly attached and steadfast friend, the meek, sincere and consistent christian. If the tears and prayers of fond and pious parents (who from an early hour, to the last, watched with trembling anxiety over the sweet pale sufferer)—if the physician's skill, joined to the unremitting care and sympathy of numerous kind friends in attendance, could, with the united supplications of the Church, have availed, then would our beloved one have still been with us.

Dear bereaved friends! weeping parents! sorrowing sisters! we heartily sympathize with you, enter into your spirit and take a part in your heaviness and deep distress. But of what avail is our sympathy in comparison with His, who is not only touched with a feeling of our infirmities, but can effectually touch our hearts with a feeling of His divine and heavenly consolations. Oh! may this, our glorious High Priest, make you to feel His tenderness in a holy, quieting way—telling you, by His Spirit, that you are not alone—that He is with you and will never leave nor forsake you.

From the time she first gave her heart to God and her hand to the Church, till she ascended to the bosom of her Father and her God, she abided in faithfulness to her "high calling in Christ Jesus." Two or three days previous to her death, whilst visited by her kind and much esteemed pastor, Rev. S. B. Suratt, she was greatly comforted, and indeed "rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory." The closing scene was one of peculiar interest and deepest sublimity. The last words which fell from her lips thrilled with indescribable emotion every heart present—not simply the words, for they were mere monosyllables—but the tone of voice, look of intelligence, and the eye illumined with unearthly brightness and vigor. "Bettie," asked her Pastor, "is Jesus still with you?" "Yes." "Are you afraid to die?" "No!" Eternity alone can reveal the full import of such a response, and its grand attending triumphs.

OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

But our leeway is now made up, and we shall henceforth have plain sailing.

In Dublin I went to Stephen's Green, on Sunday morning, to hear Dr. Appelbe; but was disappointed. Mr. Oliver, however, preached a sound Methodist sermon from "Ye must be born again." He went through the whole episcopal service before sermon, and was fully responded to by the congregation. He was also about to administer the sacrament when I left—the service having already lasted nearly two hours and a half. I attended the lower Abbey Street Church at night and heard Mr. McMillen. Here they had no Episcopal service, but in lieu thereof, a full toned organ. The preacher gave out two lines of the hymn—the organ and congregation then played and sang them, and—stopped. The preacher again gave out two lines more, and so on ad libitum. It sounded quite strange in my ears, both as to Methodist and organ church-music; but they sang well. This was a warm-hearted, capital sermon. I made the acquaintance of the preacher, who regretted exceedingly that my departure next morning would deprive him of an opportunity of hearing a good deal about America.

Next morning I took the cars for Galway, on the north-western coast of Ireland, (Dublin is in the south,) and passed Maynooth, Athlone, Mullingar, Ballinasloe, etc. The Police were at all the stations along the route, and were armed with short rifles and bayonets. The country, most of the way, is very poor and bleak in appearance—the railway, in several places, passes through extensive bogs, from which they obtain peat for fuel. We passed many a thatch-covered, mud cabin, with a pig or hole in the middle of the top for the egress of the smoke. I was constantly told that the cow and the pig dwelt in one end of the cabin and the old folks and children in the other, without any useless division or distinction between the parties. But I did not have time to stop anywhere to ascertain this fact by personal inspection. The hand of improvement, however, seems to be abroad even here; and the mud cabin, mud fence and small potato-patch are all fast giving way to the large farm-steading, stone fence and large flowing field of grain. To all of which, and much more, I can heartily wish—may innovation continue its inroads in this and every other respect, until from one end of the Emerald Isle to the other, the heartfelt and truthful shout shall be heard: "Erin mavourneen, Erin go bragh."

Galway is a considerable city, and admirably adapted as a shipping port for the Far West, being a day and a half nearer to our destination than from Glasgow or Liverpool. But the new "Galway and New York Steamship Co's" line we found to be a humbug. They advertised their vessels as of the largest class, and for $90, $50, or $35 offered to take up passengers in any town of the United Kingdom, pay railway and steamboat fare to Galway, and thence to New York, via St. Johns, in one of their powerful steamers—making a shorter passage across the Atlantic than by any other route! They took us up, it is true—they lauded us in Galway—they also took us across the Atlantic in eight days—gave us two days to examine the harbour and city of St. Johns—and they finally landed us in New York. But they nevertheless, also, took us in. The Pacific, instead of being 3000 tons burthen, we found to be just 930—a good sized coasting steamer—and the calling at St. Johns proved to be a necessity and not from choice—to obtain a fresh supply of coal before the vessel could proceed to her destination. We certainly crossed the Atlantic in less than the usual time, but the whole voyage occupied fourteen days in its accomplishment. Our money had been paid in advance to agents to secure a berth. We were at an inconvenient point to help ourselves, and the season of the year (12th October) was too far advanced to admit of more delay, or we never would have started from Galway in that craft. But we, at least, obtained another slice of that wisdom which is so expensive, and yet so soon squandered, which teaches that all is not true which appears in print—and we had to console ourselves with that soothing reflection.

The first four days of the passage to St. Johns were exceedingly rough, and for two days we doubted if we should ever again behold land. But the Lord rode above the storm, and we were in safety. We had, as usual, a mixed multitude of passengers—not many emigrants, except in the steerage—mostly travelers returning to the United States and Canada. We had a live lord and lady among the number—Lord Viscount Bury and the Viscountess. The lord M. P. for Norfolk. He is a director in this new steamship company, and was going out on a visit to his father-in-law, Sir Allan McNab, of Canada. He was a very pleasant, intelligent, social gentleman of from thirty to thirty-five years old, without any of the airs of aristocracy about him. He was very inquisitive to know all he could about the United States. We had on board two Episcopalian ministers, one U. S. and one Irish; two Roman Catholic priests, one Irish, the other U. S. (my room-mate); two Methodist preachers, one U. S. and one Irish (a young man), and a Congregationalist. The vessel being British, the Irish Episcopalian usurped the right of all the preaching in the cabin. Father Curley led their devotions in the steerage, and our young Irish Methodist gave one sermon between decks. Father Curley was also declared to be the best card player in the cabin, and my room-mate—an excellent companion—said his prayers and consulted his brandy jug regularly, first one and then the other. The ship fed us and drank us highly during the last week of the voyage—no doubt to make us forget our woes and disappointments. But it would not all do, for the passengers, I believe, all dispersed in New York muttering individually: "I shall never be caught in such a trap again." There were about 280 in all on board—50 in each cabin and 180 in the steerage.

St. Johns is on the east side of the Island of Newfoundland, 50 miles north of Cape Race, and is a considerable city of from 25 to 30,000 inhabitants, with one of the finest harbors I ever beheld. You enter the latter from the ocean, in a north-westerly direction, through a very narrow defile, between two high mountains, and then the harbor lies east and west—completely land-locked by high mountains on every side, protecting the shipping from every wave of the temp st-tossed ocean, and even from the fierceness of the land winds. The entrance to the harbor is protected by forts that would defy the approach of any fleet. The Governor, Sir A. Bannerman, has his residence here, and there is a garrison of 200 men. The city lies at the base of the northern hill, on the most conspicuous part of which the Roman Catholics have a new, large cathedral, with Bishop's house and College adjoining—the stones for the building of which, (at least, the Cathedral,) notwithstanding the abundance of that material all around the spot, were brought in ships from Galway. It is a great thing to be religious, but sometimes it is a little too expensive. I saw the Bishop, also, and he seemed in such excellent condition of body, that I was tempted to surmise he must have eat something more oleaginous than fish during lent, and other periods of fasting. The Wesleyans are also here in good force, having several churches, schools, etc., but I did not make the acquaintance of any of their ministers. This city is the great entrepot for the codfish trade. The country around is a bleak, barren waste, without even timber. The houses smell of the great staple—the whole place seems tainted with fish, and the people look fishy. So we will hasten on board, get up steam and be off for New York.

This done, in four days more we are, on the morning of the 27th inst., again on shore, in the land of the free and the home of the brave—having been twelve days at sea and two in St. Johns, since leaving Galway. In twelve hours more I am once again in the Federal city, where the readers of the Advocate first took me up, and where I again bid them farewell. And so endeth this chapter, and the labors of your Occasional Correspondent.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI—No. IX.

Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Editor: That form of Evangelical Christianity, known as Methodism, was first introduced into the city of New York in 1766. Previous to the Revolutionary war it had spread extensively through the Colonies; during the war it was surprisingly maintained; and after the close of the war its spread became general in the United States.

Towards the close of the last century, the ever-watchful eye of Bishop Ashury rested with increasing interest on the far-famed "Natchez country," which was evidently designed to be speedily settled by an American population. At the Conference held in Charleston, South Carolina, January 1st, 1799, he fixed on the man, in the person of Rev. Tobias Gibson, who should be the first to explore this country, as the standard bearer of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Gibson had been eight years in the pastoral work, and was every way worthy and well qualified for such an important trust. He was unmarried and possessed a handsome estate for the times; in addition to which, his failing health required a more Southern climate. He also had an intelligent, wealthy and influential family connection already settled in the vicinity of Natchez; by whom he would be cordially received and hospitably entertained.

His name appears in the printed minutes, as preacher in charge of Little Pee Dee and Anson circuit in 1799, with Britain Capel and Lewis Myers as his colleagues; but this appointment was doubtless made with the understanding that he was to leave his circuit in the hands of his co-laborers; and, on the opening of Spring, proceed as a missionary to the Natchez country.

On the 10th of October, 1799, he celebrated the rites of matrimony between my parents, about twelve miles from Natchez; and it is well established fact in the family that he first visited them the preceding April. He was continued here in 1800, and his name so appears in the printed minutes.

He entered on the objects of his mission immediately on his arrival; and, within the next three years, succeeded in forming churches in nearly all the important settlements in the western portion of the Territory, between Fort Adams and the Walnut Hills, near the present site of Vicksburg. His first church was organized in Washington, the territorial seat of government, six miles from Natchez.

Soon after, he visited Kingston to look after the remains of the Congregational Church, formed there in 1773 by Rev. Samuel Swayze—which, since his death in in 1784, had been "as sheep without a shepherd."

Here he found a people already prepared of the Lord, and ready to receive him; for, notwithstanding their Calvinistic proclivities, but few of this extensive connection seemed inclined to unite with the Baptists. They had been accustomed to an educated ministry—and the elevated talents, polished manners, and overflowing affection of Mr. Gibson, corresponded with their previous training and mode of thinking. He found also a considerable branch of the "Swayze connection" settled near Selsertown, where he collected a church at an early day.

In 1803, Moses Floyd volunteered to come to the assistance of Mr. Gibson. And, in 1804 he was further recruited by Hezekiah Harriman and Abraham Amos.

Tobias Gibson died April 5th, 1804, in what is now Warren county; the place of his interment may be seen about six miles from Vicksburg, a little to the left of the road leading to Warrenton—where long cherished affection has placed a suitable monument, to mark his resting-place.

These numbers being intended merely, as the running title imports, to give a history of the introduction of Protestantism into Mississippi, I may here close; only adding another number to exhibit some of its first fruits.

I have said but little about the rapid and constant progress of the Methodist Episcopal Church in our country because we have the printed minutes from the beginning, furnishing statistics for reference whenever necessary.

I have no materials at hand to furnish me with any thing very reliable to say about the introduction of either the Presbyterian or Protestant Episcopal Churches into Mississippi. I may say, however, that very early in the present century, Rev. John Buller and Rev. William Montgomery, of the Presbyterian Church, came as missionaries to the Mississippi Territory; and labored long and usefully in their Master's cause. They were subsequently followed by other ministers of the same denomination.

Rev. Adam Cloud, who for several years previous to 1788 had been a traveling Methodist preacher in the North, but, about that time withdrew from our Church and subsequently took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church, also came as a missionary to the Territory early in the present century.

The Methodist and Baptist have always been, and still are, by large majorities, the leading denominations in Mississippi.

ST. PATRICK NOT A PAPIST.

The oldest piece of writing in the Irish tongue is called "St. Patrick's Armour or Breastplate." It is a prayer, or hymn, written when St. Patrick was going to Tara, to preach before the king and nobles of Ireland; and at that time all the great people in Ireland were pagans, and he greatly feared he should be killed at Tara. Now it is remarkable that St. Patrick should have written such a prayer at a time of such great trouble, and not once mention the name of the Virgin Mary in it! Yet we find there is not one word in the whole prayer addressed to any but to God alone. He does not once ask the help of the Virgin Mary. Hear the prayer of St. Patrick: "At Tara, to-day, the strength of God pilot me—the power of God preserve me—may the wisdom of God instruct me—the eye of God watch over me—the ear of God hear me—the word of God give me sweet talk—the hand of God defend me—the way of God guide me. Christ be with me—Christ before me—Christ after me—Christ in me—Christ under me—Christ over me—Christ on my right hand—Christ on my left hand—Christ on this side—Christ on that side—Christ at my back—Christ in the heart of every person to whom I speak—Christ in the mouth of every person who speaks to me—Christ in the eye of every person who looks upon me,—Christ in the ear of every person who hears me at Tara to-day." Now this is the doctrine and faith of St. Patrick, and not one word is there in it about the Virgin Mary. This is the faith of Protestants—therefore St. Patrick and Protestants agree.

HEARERS WEARING OUT.

The least possible amount of originality is the aim of the writer of this paper. He hopes therefore to be held to account, only, for interjections, Italics, and a few conjunctions. So much of what you call "original" as grows out of the necessities and weakness of our language one may deplore but must admit.

The writer's grandfather's cousin was much impressed by an instance of the "original"—a recollection of his youth—it was in the case of an Englishman, a foreigner, by the name of Smith, who presently went mad. All that was remembered is, one powerful idea which Smith occasionally repeated—of a bird, name forgotten; began with a P, thinks of an extinct species; it was not an Eagle or a Spread Eagle, nor a Dodo, nor an Ibis; it ate ashes and breathed flame. Smith's description of that bird was the most awful thing he ever wished to hear, and never failed to raise the hair of the audience.

In truth, the fate of even those "original" orators and writers, who survive themselves, should be a warning to the ambitious young. Physically and piscatorially the greater swallows the less, or not at all; but psychically the less always swallows the greater. Trench swallows Olshausen, and almost anybody swallows Trench. This is most patent among the Poets; Spenser and Cowley, together afford a good newspaper breakfast-table poet scarcely more than a meal. "Why do you Americans pirate so much upon our English Authors?" an English wife of an English publisher asked a young gentleman in London. "Because it's a short way of stealing from the Germans, Madam."

The want of the times has come to be, a little *un*original writing and talking. Nothing disturbs more than a sermon made up of original corals and pearls; strung on a greasy unoriginal string. Why separate the string and clasp of the neck-lace from its pearls and coral? You settle back to hear; the preacher moves off. "Delightful, delightful! What gifts! What's that; what is the matter? All right—fine—smooth as oil; great power of statement. Shocking! shocking! What does he mean! Only momentary—I see; what a bright-tinted imagination; reasonable too, very; really strong." And so the "dear hearer" goes five miles on a T rail, then a couple of miles or so on a canebrake-corduroy, and then back again on the rail. Preaching such as that is wearing out this generation of hearers. They are wonderfully worn since the olden time, when a man could sit and listen to two Baptist sermons, one after another—or one Baptist and one Methodist—without lunching.

A judicious friend insists that the hope of reproducing the pure "original," as distinguished from the mixed, lies in our institutions of learning. The perfect training afforded in every one of our Male and Female colleges at the present hour must tell upon the mental faculties of the oncoming age. Even now, one hears at the annual commencements and examinations of our country a large amount of highly original matter.

He may be right; he has however upon his side youth, and the power of endurance which belongs to youth. Not so the writer, who is worn; whose ears, nerves, and mental frame have been shattered by a badly proportioned and undue amount of original utterances." O for a reproduction of the unmixed commonplaces of Milton and Addison, of Bacon and Johnson, of Calvin and Wesley, of South and Hall!

BIRTH-DAY OF DANIEL WEBSTER.

It is fit that the memory of the great character and commanding eloquence of this mighty son of a mighty country, should be kept green by anniversary festivities, songs and orations.

Would that the Methodists in Europe and America annually celebrated the birth-days of their two greatest men—Wesley and Asbury! The recent celebration was at the Revere House, Boston. Gen. Caleb Cushing presided. Hon. Rufus Choate, Lord Cavendish, Profs. Felton, Peirce and Horsford, Gov. Gardner, and many other distinguished gentlemen were present. The speeches overflowed with an appropriate eloquence. Gen. Cushing, among other things, said:

Yes: we, friends, associates, admirers of Webster, assemble on his birth-day, not to mourn him dead in the silent grave where his mortal body lies interred, but to rejoice in the immortality of his glory, to honor him as living still, with all his native majesty and strength of lineament and proportion, in our hearts—in the veneration of his countrymen—in the respect and honor of the world.

I rise, therefore, to introduce you to that which remains of our festival, and which you all now expect and await, namely,

"The feast of reason and the flow of soul."

Not, of course, to produce this myself, save as mine shall be the hand to touch the rock of Horeb, and unlock the wells of its gushing waters—mine the humble voice to usher in the luminaries of Speech and of Thought, as Phosphor in the eastern sky precedes the winged horses of Apollo.

How it would startle and move us if Demosthenes were to step out from behind the curtained shadows of history, to rouse the fierce democracy of another Greece against the ambition of another Philip; or a Cicero, in his ample robe and purple-bordered tunics, hurling his consular anathemas at Cataline, or pouring forth his senatorial lovecrives on the head of Mark Anthony. Yet, have we not all heard and seen this? Aye, but we may have heard it as though hearing it not, and seen it as though seeing it not. Just as the infinite and eternal God is with us always, though invisible but in his works, so God's vicegerents on earth to whom he has vouchsafed the gift of genius, of wisdom and of eloquence, and whom he has thus delegated and sent to be the world's leaders, are with us; and then we see—them we elbow in the streets—them we hear of carelessly in the senate, the council chamber or the field—them we come at length to know, as one of them leaves the earth to its fate, and ascends to his congenial heaven, and we then see, perchance too late, by the long train of light which illumines his upward path, that a demi-god and not a man had been with us the while, working out with strong will the inscrutable providences of the Almighty.

Gen. Cushing's introduction of Mr. Choate is one of the most beautifully happy things in its way we have ever seen. We give an extract or two:

The President then said: Gentlemen—You are all aware that there is here present with us one who, whilst honored by all of us for his own personal qualities, is especially dear to this assembly as the friend of Daniel Webster (applause); I may say as the friend—for there were times in the eventful career of Webster, in his superior, federal functions, in which a friend could be valued and dear. In such times there was none nearer and dearer than Rufus Choate. (Great applause.) Gentlemen, I would most gladly embrace this occasion to bear witness to those sentiments of admiration and of attachment to that person which the experience of a whole life has stamped into my bosom. (Applause.) I cannot do so, however, gentlemen, without detaining you from that which you most of all desire, and that is, those eloquent accents which have echoed in tones worthy of the best days of Athens or of Rome, in the halls of Congress of the United States, which are so familiar to you in the administration of the higher justice of this Commonwealth; a man in whom the qualities of a jurist and a statesman are so admirably compounded that you know not which to admire, the elevation of his sentiments of devotion to the Union, or those high traits of eloquence and of genius which crop out on every side whensoever he has occasion to utter his voice.

But, gentlemen, I am standing in the way of that top-sparkle of the goblet of champagne which is streaming over before your eyes. (Applause.) And I will take my seat after introducing to you Rufus Choate, (great applause)—and his name is his honor and all sufficient praise. (Hearty and repeated cheers, the company rising as Mr. Choate rose, and giving cheer on cheer.)

Mr. Choate's speech was beautifully, sometimes grandly eloquent. With his words quaintly transposed from their usual order of English sentences—with a touch of quaintness running through all his discourse—with an exuberant spring up at every step of a whole spring-time of beautiful words—now pictorial with comparisons as gentle as violets and daisies, and then as grand as Olympian thunder—he makes us think of Jeremy Taylor, Wordsworth, and Bishop Capers all at the same time. Among other things he said:

I would not have it supposed for a moment that I design to make any eulogy, or any speech concerning the great man whose birth-day we have met to observe.

I hasten to assure you that I shall attempt to do no such thing.

There is no longer need of it, or fitness for it, for any purpose.

Times have been when such a thing might have been done with propriety.

While he was yet personally among us; while he was yet walking in his strength in the paths, or ascending the heights of active public life; or standing upon them, and so many of the good and wise—so many of the wisest and best of our country from all parts of it, thought he had title to the great office of our system, and would have had him formally presented for it, it was fit that those who loved and honored him should publicly, with effort, with passion, with argument, with contention, recall the series of his services; his life of elevated labors, finished and furnished to display his large qualities of character and mind, and compare him somewhat in all these things with the great men his competitors for the great prize.

Then was there a battle to be fought and it was needful to fight it.

And so again, in a later day, while our hearts were yet bleeding with the sense of recent loss, and he lay newly dead in his chamber, and the bells were tolling, and his grave was open, and the sunlight of an autumn day was falling on that long funeral train, I do not say it was fit only, it was unavoidable, that we all, in some choked utterance, and some imperfect sincere expression, should, if we could not praise the patriot, lament the man.

But these times have gone by. The race of honor and duty is for him all run. The high endeavor is made and it is finished. The monument is builded. He is entered into his glory. The day of hope, of pride, of grief—has been followed by the long rest; and the sentiments of grief, pride and hope are all merged in the sentiment of calm and implicit veneration. We have buried him in our hearts. That is enough to say. Our estimation of him is part of our creed. We have no argument to make or hear upon it. We enter into no dispute about him. We permit no longer any man to question us as to what he was; what he had done; how much we loved him, how much the country loved him, and how well he deserved it. We admire, we love, and we are still. Be this enough for us to say.

Is it not enough that we just stand silent on the deck of the bark fast flying from the shore, and turn and see how, as the line of coast disappears, and the headlands and hills and all the load go down, and the islands are swallowed up, there the great mountain, standing in its strength and majesty, supreme and still—to see how it swells away up from the subject and fading vale—to see that though clouds, and tempests, and the noise of waves, and the yelping of curs may be at its feet, eternal sunshine has settled upon its head!

Although I have seen him act, and heard him speak and give counsel in very high and very sharp and difficult crises, I always felt that if more had been needed, more would have been done; and that half his strength he put not forth. I never saw him make what is called an effort without feeling that, let the occasion be what it would, he would have swelled out to its limits. There was always a reservoir of power of which you never sounded the depths, certainly never saw the bottom; and I cannot well imagine any great historical and civil occasion to which he would not have brought, and to which he would not be acknowledged to have brought, an adequate ability. He had wisdom to have guided the councils of Austria as Metternich did, if he had loved absolutism as well—skill enough and eloquence enough to have saved the life of Louis the Sixteenth, if skill and eloquence could have done it; learning, services, character and dignity for a Lord Chancellor of England, if wisdom in counsel and eloquence in debate would have been titles to so proud a distinction.

In this class, then, let me say further of the foremost of our great American statesmen, I say there was never one, of any one of our periods—I shall not except the highest of the first period—of a more ardent love of our America and of the whole of it—of a truer, deeper, broader sense of what the Farewell Address calls the Unity of Government—its nature, spring, necessity and the means of securing it—or who said more and did more to sink it deep in the American heart. Of the relations of the States to our system, of their powers, their rights, their quasi sovereignty, he said less—not because he thought less or knew less, but because he saw there was less necessity for it. Set the Union—the Constitution—the national federal life—the American—E Pluribus Unum—these filled his heart—these dwelt in his habitual speech.

Some aged clergyman is reported to have said, that the sermon—whatever the theology, whatever the ability—was essentially defective, if it did not leave on the hearer the impression that the preacher loved his soul, and that God and the Saviour loved it. I never heard him make a speech, a great speech, whatever were the topic, or the time, that did not leave the impression that he loved nothing, desired nothing so much as the good and glory of America. That he knew no North and no South—that he did not seem to summon around him the whole brotherhood of States and men, and hold them all to his heart! This gave freshness and energy to all his speech—this set the tone to the universal harmony!

Prof. Felton also delivered a speech. We select the following anecdote:

I had the good fortune (when abroad) to breakfast one morning with the distinguished poet, Samuel Rogers, and knowing that I had the honor of being a friend of Mr. Webster, he spoke of him on that occasion. Mr. Rogers sat at the head of the table, surrounded by the most illustrious lights of English science and literature. There he sat, over 90 years of age, pale as a corpse and almost as silent, while the conversation upon topics of letters and science was passing around him. But when the name of Webster was mentioned, he started up; a new life seemed to course through his veins—the color came to his cheek. He rose and said: "Mr. Webster was a friend and correspondent of mine. Edmund, bring me Mr. Webster's letters." Edmund brought them. "Sir," said he, "Mr. Webster was not only the greatest man of his age, but (taking his knife in his hand and bringing it down on the table) he was the greatest man of any age." Webster was the last word I heard from that distinguished poet, that most hospitable of entertainers, that great man who connected our age with the age of Johnson and Burke. That was the last word I had the pleasure of hearing from that illustrious Englishman about the still more illustrious American.

Mr. Harvey said:

I will tell you an interesting anecdote of Mr. Webster, in the year 1846, during Gen. Taylor's administration. I was in Washington at that time, living in Mr. Webster's house. It was during the recess of Congress after the inauguration of General Taylor. It was on a Sunday in June. We went to Georgetown to church. After church we drove across the bridge into Virginia. As we were riding along in Alexandria, he told the coachman to pause before a certain house, with a dilapidated and broken gate. "That house," said he, "is the house where I first came to board when a young man, a member of Congress from New Hampshire. That was the Federal headquarters. There boarded the great Federal leaders, Governor Gore, Chief Justice Marshall and Rufus King—great men, gone to their reward. We never shall look upon their like again. I shall soon follow them; I care very little how soon." Tears came to his eyes. I said, "Allow me to say that when you are dead and gone, the places which you have immortalized by your presence and speech, when visited by future generations, will call up reminiscences, the interest of which will be as much deeper than that connected with the reminiscences of the great men you have mentioned, as theirs are superior to those of your coachman." Placing his hand upon my shoulder, he said, "That is rather a partial and friendly sort of a speech. But," said he, "I am not unaware that I have a posthumous fame to live. I am not so modest as to doubt that I have a reputation and fame which will live after me; but it has been hardly earned. Let me say to you, my friend, that politics is a hard road. Keep out of it. I have succeeded, but if I had my life to live over again, I should pursue my profession and be more at peace. Those public acts of my life that have been the most sincere and honest, and the most for the honor and good of the country, have been those which have been most traduced. Political life is a hard one. Sell your iron, my friend. Get an honest living, support your family, and let politics alone." "I have had," said he, "many pleasant reminiscences connected with politics. If it were not so, a man could never live. If I were not conscious of having received the support of the intelligent portion of my fellow citizens, I should sink under it. I know that a large portion of the people of the United States appreciate my labors; but," said he, "it is a hard road, keep clear of it, sell your iron and let politics alone." He then spoke of some personal matters connected with a request the bad made of the Administration. "I have been traduced," said he, "and slandered, and my motives vilified, but the shaft that has sunk deepest here [laying his hand upon his breast] is the refusal of this Administration to grant the trifling request I made. They said that I had had my share; but the whole thing," said he, "is too contemptible to think of. John, drive on, let us go home to dinner."

TOBACCO.

Mr. Editor: Do you use tobacco? If so, I am a little afraid of you. Not that you will gainsay what I am about to write, but that you may consign me to the rubbish, where many, very many youthful hopefuls lie buried already; for we authors, you know, have very serious objections to such uncerembonious treatment.

I am not going to discuss the morals and conscience of tobacco; this has been done by my friend J. T. of Montgomery, Alabama, already; and done too, in such a manner as to produce a mighty fluttering among the feathered tribe; so much so, that they are hardly quiet yet in certain quarters. And what is more, I have some intimations that another blandesbuss is about to be turned loose among them, even more fatal than the past. But what I have to say is in defence of the rights of others.

Now, that tobacco chewers and smokers have rights, I pretend not to deny; but insist upon it, they have not all the rights. The matter in plainly this, tobacco is an offence, a serious offence to very many well behaved citizens; and now, the question is, have those who use it a right to indulge in its use to the utter annoyance and discomfiture of all the rest of mankind? Whether there is anything in the use of tobacco which makes men forget all the common proprieties of life or not, I pretend not to say; but one thing I do know, and that is, they smoke everywhere—on the high-way, on steamboats, on stage-coaches, on rail-cars, in ball-rooms, in private parlors, in the presence of ladies, in Churches, in Conference-rooms, on committees; and I am afraid, we shall hardly find a place this side of heaven where we shall not be annoyed with these disgusting exhibitions of self-indulgence—these terrible inflictions upon our olfactories, our stomachs, and our eyes.

Really, Mr. Editor, I am alarmed at these encroachments. Why, sir, if you will believe me, at our last Conference I had to sit in committee with men with cigars in their mouths; and I heard a dignified Christian minister say that he had, under similar circumstances, been sickened almost to vomiting by the filthy fumes from a Right Reverend father in the Church. That is a righteous law, in some cities, which forbids smoking in the streets and public places.

One other point; I want to put tobacco-smokers in possession of a small item of information, which I have no idea they possess, or if they do, never think of it—and that is, the offensive odor that attaches to the clothes and person of a man given to smoking. The fumes of tobacco are nothing compared to these. Why I can scent such a man twenty feet. Now, just imagine that you have to sit down by his side, or stand and let him talk to you; or, rather imagine that the victim is not yourself, but a fair lady, with delicate nerves and strong sensibilities. Such men have no idea of the terrible infliction. Why, I would risk my olfactories every time among a flock of filthy goats rather than expose them to such a mass. And now I solemnly protest, that while a man may have a right to smoke he has no right to make a skunk of himself; and, if men will smoke, let them do it in private; and then change their clothes before they come into decent company.

FACTS ABOUT THE MISSISSIPPI.

From Hewson's new book on leveeing, we condense the following interesting facts:

The average fall of the Mississippi river, for the whole distance from the Gulf of Mexico to the confluence of the Ohio at Cairo, during low water, is very nearly three inches to the mile.

During a flood, the Mississippi rises at Cairo fifty feet; at Friar's Point, forty-two and a half feet; at New Orleans, twelve feet. The average fall per mile is, then, three and a half inches.

At Cairo the Mississippi is upwards of a mile wide; at New Orleans its width is but half a mile. This narrowing of the down stream is accompanied by a corresponding rapidity and deepening.

The observations of engineers have established the fact that inferior streams, running into a main river, neither widen nor raise it; they quicken the current and deepen the channel. The retention of flood water within the ordinary channel by levees, will have similar effects—the depth of the river will be increased, the velocity of the stream will be more rapid, but there will not be, as a direct consequence, any elevation of the level.

The Mississippi is shown, by the estimate of Sir C. Lyell, to carry earth below New Orleans to the amount, each year, of a hundred and thirty-seven millions of cubic yards.

As a consequence of the above, new land is continually forming at the mouth of the Mississippi. Mr. Rogers, in his report on the geology of North America, says that, as an example of the rate at which this formation is proceeding, the old Balize, erected at the month of the river about 1774, was, in 1834, two miles above it. There was not at that time the smallest appearance of the island on which, forty-two years after, Ulloa caused barracks to be raised for pilots, and now known as the new Balize. The rate of advance has been ninety-six feet a year. Leveeing is known, especially by the example of the Po, to forward the rate of this advance.

Every three inches of elevation of the water at New Orleans, represents an elevation at Cairo of twelve and a half inches. The rate of fall from New Orleans to the sea is about an inch and a half per mile; therefore, an advance of the month at a quicker rate, in consequence of leveeing, would give, judging by the facts in relation to the river Po, an advance, in a hundred years, of the mouth into the Gulf of Mexico, of four and a third miles. This would cause an additional elevation of six and a half inches to the flood level at New Orleans, of twenty-three inches at Friar's Point, and of twenty-seven inches at Cairo.

The elevation of the surface of the bed of river from mud upwards, when visited by future generations, will call up reminiscences, the interest of which will be as much deeper than that connected with the reminiscences of the great men you have mentioned, as theirs are superior to those of your coachman." Placing his hand upon my shoulder, he said, "That is rather a partial and friendly sort of a speech. But," said he, "I am not unaware that I have a posthumous fame to live. I am not so modest as to doubt that I have a reputation and fame which will live after me; but it has been hardly earned. Let me say to you, my friend, that politics is a hard road. Keep out of it. I have succeeded, but if I had my life to live over again, I should pursue my profession and be more at peace. Those public acts of my life that have been the most sincere and honest, and the most for the honor and good of the country, have been those which have been most traduced. Political life is a hard one. Sell your iron, my friend. Get an honest living, support your family, and let politics alone." "I have had," said he, "many pleasant reminiscences connected with politics. If it were not so, a man could never live. If I were not conscious of having received the support of the intelligent portion of my fellow citizens, I should sink under it. I know that a large portion of the people of the United States appreciate my labors; but," said he, "it is a hard road, keep clear of it, sell your iron and let politics alone." He then spoke

THE THREE SENATORS.

Vice President [illegible], in the chair, the Senate, on [illegible] upon the [illegible] of [illegible] taking leave of the Senate Chamber, there being the following [illegible] of the three great men whose names, in a pre-eminent degree, are associated with the recollections of the place:

"Hereafter, the American and the stranger, as they wander through the Capitol, will turn with instinctive reverence to view the spot on which so many and great materials have accumulated for history. They will recall the images of the great and the good, whose renown is the common property of the Union; and chiefly, perhaps, they will linger around the seats once occupied by the Mighty Three, whose names and fame—associated in life—death has not been able to sever; illustrious men, who in their generation, sometimes divided, sometimes led, and sometimes resisted, public opinion—for they were of that higher class of statesmen who seek the right and follow their convictions.

"There sat Calhoun, the Senator—inflexible, austere, oppressed, but not overwhelmed, by his deep sense of the importance of his public functions—seeking the truth, then fearlessly following it; a man whose unsparing intellect compelled all his emotions to harmonise with the deductions of his rigorous logic, and whose noble countenance habitually wore the expression of one engaged in the performance of high public duties.

"This was Webster's seat. He, too, was every inch a Senator. Conscious of his own vast powers, he reposed with confidence on himself, and scorning the contrivances of smaller men, he stood among his peers all the greater for the simple dignity of his senatorial demeanor. Type of his Northern home, he rises before the imagination in the grand and granite outline of his form and intellect, like a great New England rock, repelling a New England wave. As a writer, his productions will be cherished by statesmen and scholars while the English tongue is spoken. As a senatorial orator his great efforts are historically associated with this chamber, whose very air seems yet to vibrate beneath the strokes of his deep tones and his weighty words.

"On the outer circle sat Henry Clay, with his impetuous and ardent nature untamed by age, and exhibiting the same vehement patriotism and passionate eloquence that, of yore, electrified the House of Representatives and the country. His extraordinary personal endowments, his courage—all his noble qualities, invested him with an individuality and a charm of character which, in any age, would have made him a favorite of history. He loved his country above all earthly objects. He loved liberty in all countries. Illustrious man!—orator, patriot, philanthropist—whose light, at its meridian, was seen and felt in the remotest parts of the civilized world; and whose declining sun, as it hastened down the West, threw back its level beams in hues of mellowed splendor to illuminate and to cheer the land he loved and served so well."

"CIRCUIT RIDING."

Mr. Editor: He who said, "the world is my parish," really meant, if actions speak louder than words, that it was his Circuit; and, in his long and eventful life, hardly failed to go around as much of it as lay in the bounds of the British Empire, once a year at least.

Dr. Adam Clarke, in a ministry of fifty years, was never any thing better nor worse than a Circuit Rider; and I suppose the same is true of Benson, Watson, Bunting and Newton, of the Wesleyan Conference; and true also of Asbury and McKendree, both famous on this side the water.

And what of all this? Verily, nothing more needless than a rebuke upon the foolish vanity of some people, who turn up their noses at "Circuit Riders;" and, consequently, some of our devoted Itinerants are in the horrors at the idea of riding a Circuit!

This being so, we may profitably inquire, why has this "fine gold become dim?" Or, in other words, why has this original feature of our Itinerancy lost caste among its own friends? To say, it is pride, is to accuse the brethren of a great sin, which would be unkind; and, to say it is selfishness or a love of ease and self-indulgence, would not be much of an improvement. And, yet if the fact exists, that some men have entered the Conferences, pledging and promising to go willingly, of a glad mind, to such work as the Bishop may select, nevertheless, having a mental reservation—"Circuits and Colored Missions" excepted—there must be a cause, and that cause is either in the man or in the Circuits, or, in both. Of the cause why, in the man, I will say no more; but, for the benefit of the Circuits, I have a word. Dear brethren and sisters of the circuits, did it never occur to you that your preacher—your pastor—must feel badly, when he contrasts his condition with that of his brother preacher, filling a neighboring Station. See, there he is in a good parsonage well furnished—a salary, adequate to all reasonable demands—with plenty of books and leisure to read them; while your preacher is in some shanty and on a small allowance, doled out complainingly. And your minister, to serve you, must encounter all roads and weather; find a book, and time to read it when he can. Look at it, and answer, if a preacher is allowed to express a preference, would not all say, give me a station, Mr. Bishop, if you please?

What, then, is the conclusion of the whole matter? Simply this, that if the Circuits provided as well for their pastors as the Stations do, there are reasons—not given in this writing—why multitudes of our most distinguished men would say, "give me a Circuit."

Have the Circuits the ability to do so? Generally, from two to five times the numerical and financial ability!! What, then, is the matter?—Ah! Echo says, what?

Well, Mr. Editor, I set down to tell you something about my Circuit, that is to say, it is large in membership, appointments and territorial extent; and, I guess, the brethren annually make ten thousand bags of Cotton. I have been around once, preached wherever there were as many as half a dozen or more, and either read the Rules or held Class—and we enjoyed some union with God.

I am in pretty good spirits, and the people seem to be—the end is not yet. We all hope for the best.

Nor have I forgotten our periodicals. I carry specimen numbers of most of our Advocates, the Quarterly and the Home Circle. The result, so far, is as follows, in the way of getting subscribers:—Quarterly, none; Home Circle, five; New Orleans Advocate, four; Charleston do. three; Nashville do. two.

I have done my best; but you must know that there have been good men in the field before me, and of course the material is pretty well used up. Still on the alert, however—hope to find more.

And now, Mr. Editor, having perpetrated this homily, for the benefit of your readers, on Circuits especially, and proud preachers particularly, if such there be, I hope you will exhort after me, and extend the discourse; and, that it may have full force and effect, do not hint my name or locality. As ever, in earnest to do good, and good only, I remain, your friend and Brother.

HOMER AND HOUMA.

Mr. Editor: Under this heading I wish to say that Homer and Houma are both little towns or villages, in the State of Louisiana. And though they are spelled differently and are situated, the one in the Southern and the other in the Northern extreme of the State, they are often pronounced in the same way, and too often blended in the notice of one and the same place.

Homer, as most of us know, is the name of a celebrated Grecian poet. But Houma is an Indian word, used among the Choctaws to denote a particular color

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1859.

TO THE NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

Be it known to MINISTERS that the Louisiana Conference appointed the following Executive, to-wit:

Resolved, That the Publishing Agent be informed that the Trustees of the New Orleans Depository of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, have purchased a large and convenient Depository building; and, that they hold the same for use of the Publishing Agent, and that he be requested to use the same, and establish therein a permanent agency for the sale of all the books published by the Southern Church:"

Which was forwarded to the Agent at Nashville. He replies to the resolution, that it is his intention to carry out the original design in the establishment of the New Orleans Depository.

Of the whole amount originally subscribed for the purchase of a house for the Advocate, and Depository, in this city, some nine or ten thousand dollars have been realized; and the Trustees wait upon the prompt payment of notes already in hand and due, to close up the contract into which they had entered.

J. B. WALKER, PRESIDENT.

METHODISM IN ALABAMA.

MINUTES OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE, held in Marion, Ala., Nov. 24—Dec. 2, 1858. We notice a few of the most important items to be derived from this carefully prepared record, which has been politely sent us by the time-honored and efficient Secretary of the Alabama Conference, Rev. T. W. Dorman, D. D.

There are now in connection with the Conference, as members and probationers, two hundred and fifteen ministers and preachers. Their names are all recorded in a separate list in the Minutes, divided into elders, deacons, preachers of the second year, and preachers of first year. The last embraces those received on trial at the last session, twenty in number—a very large class, though not equal to the famous class of 1852-3, which numbered thirty-two. Thirteen are superannuated. Twenty-eight places are left to be supplied by local preachers, which, if the supplies are obtained, will make two hundred and forty-three pastors in the care of souls in the bounds of the Conference. Should each preacher, in his field, exert all the ability God has given him, in behalf of every interest of the Church and cause of God, and have the divine blessing—which all may have—what an aggregate of results would appear at the next session. May God inspire each one with this thought, and inspire every Methodist preacher, every where, with the same thought! There were fifteen itinerant deacons ordained, and thirteen local—twenty-eight in all. There were thirteen itinerant elders ordained, and two local—fifteen in all.

The amount of Missionary money collected during the past year, was $33,719,68. The largest amount, we believe, ever collected in any annual Conference of the Methodist Church. Their success in this is largely attributable to the systematic manner in which they work. At the Conference anniversary they resolve, by vote, to raise a given amount during the ensuing year. This is then apportioned out to the several Presiding Elders' Districts, according to their estimated ability, and then the amount for each district is assessed to each station, circuit, mission, in its bounds. Each Presiding Elder, of course, is watchful that his District do not fall in the discharge of the duty assigned it—so is each pastor of a charge. At the end of the year, at the anniversary meeting, the Treasurer reads a carefully prepared report—we published the last one lately—in which each District is called in order, the original apportionment, the amount raised, and the deficit or surplus, all stated. Then comes the amounts from stations, circuits, and missions, in detail, and the assessment, amount raised, deficit or surplus the highest and lowest of each are stated. There is great desire, of course, to be highest, and considerable struggle not to be lowest. The Treasurer's report, by Rev. R. J. Hamill, has much to do in the training of the Conference in this regard. Then comes the Secretarys' report, in which, first of all, we have the name, condition, and prospects of each mission in the Conference, in order. This is but introductory, each year, to those masterly missionary essays of Dr. Summers, which are more popular than speeches, have done honor to the Conference throughout the Methodist connection in the United States, and would do no discredit to the name of Dr. John Harris of England. The amount which the Conference has resolved to raise during the present year is $35,000. They can easily make it $40,000, and we hope they will.

"The amount necessary for the superannuated preachers, and the widows and orphans of preachers, and to make up the deficiencies of those who have not obtained their regular allowance," was $12,063,84. The amount raised to meet these claims was $6,905,15; leaving a deficiency of $5,175,69. They have a Joint Board of Finance, which, at the Conference, estimates the amount necessary to be raised for these purposes during the ensuing year, and it is likewise apportioned to the Districts, and also to each charge in each District, and the amount for a charge goes into the assessment of the stewards. Thus they endeavor to avoid the Conference collection, as it is called. The plan is a good one, but the Louisiana plan, of each preacher paying a fixed per cent on his receipts, is infinitely better. The proof is, that this comparatively new Conference has, by this plan, been enabled to do what the old ones have not done—pay the claimants their full allowance. The assessment for this year, for this purpose, in the Alabama Conference, is $6,8,50. We suppose they have, by more rigid construction, lessened the number and amount of claims.

We were sorry to hear, at the Conference, of undue claims. Such things should be unknown. Indeed, a preacher should train himself from the time of his entrance into the Conference, to do his work, obtain his support, and never depend for a dollar upon Conference funds. A preacher should gradually and imperceptibly be led to give up principle in reference to these claims, he is about as pitiable a moral bankrupt as can be imagined. There are many cases of providential affliction and embarrassment, and these should be just claims upon Conference funds, and it is an honor and blessing for it thus to feed God's servants and its worn-out or afflicted benefactors. The [illegible] always ready, with the [illegible] cases. But an unjust claim! Think of it! To pay everything "out of course."

The Conference also has in it a "Preachers' Aid Society," with a capital of over $12,000, always well invested, the interest of which is appropriated annually to necessitous cases, according to the judgment of the Directors. It is a noble provision against those sad sufferings which, in some Conferences, shake the faith and integrity of the itinerancy. Let it be remembered that Rev. O. R. Bird, Auburn, Alabama, is Treasurer, and Alabama Methodists may increase the fund by remitting to him.

The Conference has a "Ministerial Education Society," the object of which is to provide for the board and tuition of young men who intend to enter the itinerant ministry, but who are not able to educate themselves. They have now ten promising young men at school under the care of their Executive Committee. This is one of the most important enterprises ever initiated by a [illegible]. Every Methodist in the Alabama Conference who is able, should, in the beginning of the year send a contribution to the Treasurer, Rev. T. W. [illegible], Marion, Alabama.

We have not room, at present, to say more. The Southern University at Greensboro, the East Alabama Male College at Auburn, and the Female Institutions of the Conference, have already been spoken of fully, and will be again. We propose other remarks hereafter upon the Minutes.

WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT.

THE Salem, Mass., Register says: We have heard that the accident which deprived Prescott of the use of one eye, and subsequently so impaired the power of vision in the other, was occasioned by a blow from a crust of bread thrown across the room by a fellow student in Commons Hall, near the close of his college career. This seeming calamity changed the whole current of his life, which he intended to devote to legal pursuits, and finally led him into that brilliant career as a historian, in which he has achieved a world-renowned honor for himself and his country.

His grandfather was General Prescott, of Revolutionary fame, who commanded at Bunker Hill. Another member of his family was high in command in the British navy at the same battle. The swords of both of these officers were suspended crosswise in the historian's library, a fact which Thackeray notices in the "Virginians," as follows:

On the library wall of one of the most famous writers of America there hang two crossed swords, which his relatives wore in the great War of Independence. The one sword was gallantly drawn in the service of the King; the other was the weapon of a brave and honored republican soldier. The possessor of the harmless trophy, has earned for himself a name alike honored in his ancestor's country and his own, where genius such as his has always a peaceful welcome.

Mr. Prescott's father was eminent as a lawyer and a judge. The family removing to Boston when Mr. Prescott was eleven years old, he was placed under the charge of the late Dr. Gardiner of the Trinity Church. He was among the earliest of American authors who have achieved a European reputation within the last twenty-five years. For nearly twenty years he pursued his researches among the Spanish archives, procuring from Madrid copies of such manuscripts as he desired. Besides the great histories of Ferdinand and Isabella, the Conquest of Mexico, the Conquest of Peru, and the now incomplete Phillip II, Mr. Prescott published a volume of miscellany which added to his reputation. Of the work on which Mr. Prescott was engaged, Phillip II.—six volumes were designed, three of which have been published; part of the fourth is now written, and the other two will probably fall to the hands of some other masters of Spanish history to complete—but the touch of the great painter cannot but be missed and the line clearly defined where he finished and another began. Hon. George Bancroft, recently, before the New York Historical Society, made an eloquent address upon the life and character of Mr. Prescott, in the course of which he said:

His habits were methodically exact; retiring early and ever at the same hour, he rose early alike in Winter and in Summer at the appointed moment, rousing himself instantly, through in the soundest sleep, at the first note of his alarm bell; never giving indulgence to lassitude or delay. To the hours which he gave to his pursuits he adhered as scrupulously as possible, never lightly suffering them to be interfered with—now listening to his reader, now dictating what was to be written, now using his own eyes sparingly for reading, now writing by the aid of simple machinery devised for those who are in darkness, now passing time in thoughtfully revolving his great theme.

For this reason, at the period of his life when he rode much on horse-back—and he was an excellent and fearless rider—it was his choice and his habit to go out alone; and in his stated exercise on foot, you might be sure that, when by himself, his mind was shaping out work for the rest of the day. In this way, systematic in his mode of life, he proceeded onward and still onward, till the eyes of the world were turned with admiration on the genial scholar, who with placid calmness courageously trampled appalling difficulty under foot, and gained the first place among his countrymen as the historic instructor of mankind.

There is, says the Independent, something of sublimity as well as pathos in the thought of the difficulties which he surmounted in the arduous studies to which his life, from an early period, was devoted. Miltou composed his greatest poems in blindness; but his blindess did not overtake him till he had become renowned and had explored the whole range of what then was learning. But Prescott's "plague of darkness" kept company with him from his nineteenth year. Sometimes indeed the clond was lifted, and he could behold the face of nature and the more cheering face of human love, and could even enjoy again, in some sort, the silent company of books. But with what difficulty, even in his most favored years, could that one weak eye of his run over the dim pages, or decipher the antique manuscripts, in which the sonrces of history are found! Milton's blindness—

"The drop serene
That quenched his visual orbs,"

may have been painless, being only a gradnal paralysis of the optio nerves. But who, for all the honors that wreathed the head of the historian with their laurels, would willingly endnre the pain which for more than forty years was part of Prescott's infirmity, and under which he performed his chosen tasks with a higher sort of heroism than that which faced the British volleys at Bunker Hill!

Prescott's first work, the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella," was published in 1838. It was followed by the "Conquest of Mexico" in 1843, and the "Conquest of Peru" in 1847. Translations of these works, and nnmerous editions, have appeared not only in the Spanish language, but in the Italian and the German. Other of our American historians may have more of the faculty of philosophic generalisation and of philosophic insight into the remotest causes and tendencies of events, and more, perhaps, of poetic glow and vividness in description; hnt no other is more distinguished by classic simplicity of diction and narration, or more free from mannerisms and appearances of affectation in style, or has attained so high a mark of ecumenical celebrity.

NOBLE TESTIMONIAL TO A NOBLE MAN.

REV. Nathan Bangs D. D., now a very old man, who has been fifty-eight years in the itinerant ministry, and is well known and much venerated by all Methodists, European and American, was visited by a surprise party of three hundred, led by Bishop Janes and lady, Rev. Dr. McClintock, Rev. T. Carlton and presented with a "loaded cane"—loaded with two thousand dollars—as a testimonial of their appreciation of his worth.

Bishop Janes made a most impressive address to the veteran of the Cross, sitting in the front parlor, truly surprised at the unexpected call of such a host of friends. The Bishop touched on the leading points in the career of this eminent servant of the Church—his early labors in Canada, his ministerial work in by-gone days in the East, his long to be remembered contests with Calvinism. The Bishop well recollected the text of a sermon delivered by the Doctor, to which the speaker listened when young, in his native town. The Docter's services as Book Agent, editor of the Christian Advocate, and as an author, were felicitously dwelt npon, the Bishop remarking that in his episcopal visitations, from Maine to Texas, he found Dr. Bangs' books in nearly every Methodist library. The speaker alluded to the great age attained by the worthy subject of the evening's gathering, its serenity, and the many blessings with which Providence surrounded it. Dr. Bangs was an exception to a peculiar characteristic of old men; they frequently were the fault-finders with progress, dwelling on the good days that were gone. Not so with the addressed; he favored progress. A head white with the snows of many winters, but a young heart, were Dr. Bangs'.

REV. DR. CHAS. TAYLOR, Sunday School Secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will preach at the McGhee Church next Sunday morning, deliver an address to the children and their friends at the same place at 4 o'clock, P. M., and preach at Felicity-street Church in the evening.

THE PERPETUITY OF THE ITINERANT SYSTEM.

It [illegible] urged by the opponents of Meth[illegible]rant system was not adapted to the [illegible]oral work where Churches are already [illegible] admit its efficiency as a pioneer system. [illegible] this acknowledgement. Bnt now, it is said, its work is done; and the Church that retains this, as a peculiar [illegible] must decline. From this sentiment I differ, and believe, that every element of success that pertains to it as an evangelist, pertains to it as a pastor. There are circumstances connected with it, in its evangelising operations, incompatible it may be with more especial pastoral dntles. Bnt when the cause for these circumstances ceases of course thoy will cease, without effecting in the least the vitality of our system.

To retain large circuits and week-day preaching, and neglect pastoral visiting, where we have large and wealthy congregations, singly capable of supporting a pastor and family, and other denominations have Sabbath preaching and visiting pastors, is, to say the least of it, to invite the downfall of Methodism in such places. Bnt we have seen in a former article, that these things—large circuits, long rides, week-day preaching and neglect of pastoral visiting—are not essential peculiarities of this system. By no means. There was a time when these were—there may yet be places where they are—proper. But when the condition of things is so changed as to require the labors of a preacher to a single congregation, and the devotion of his week-days to visiting, the essential principles of this system are not in the least infracted by such an arrangement. And every element of humanity and of grace that contributes to its success as a pastor—the diversity of talent—the entire devotion to the work, the relief from the embarrassments of former errors, the zeal and activity inspired by new associations—all conspire to give success to this system, in its pastoral no less than in its evangelizing relation. Let us not force upon it under all circumstances what appertains to it only under peculiar circumstances. Let us retain and guard its essential principles with unslumbering care. And when the great duty of our ministry becomes pastoral, let us still reap the benefits of this important element of success. ANNOTATOR.

Smithville, Mississippi, Jan., 1858.

JOHN C. CALHOUN AND RICH. K. CRALLE.

Some person calling himself Richard K. Cralle, without sufficient personal merit or force of character to get his name, to his satisfaction, before the country in a virtuous and honorable way, has recently undertaken the enterprise of making himself notorious by acting the part of Nero toward the colossal temple of the memory of John C. Calhoun. In a letter published in the Richmond Examiner, professedly designed to set the public right with regard to the religious views of the great South Carolinian, he has exhibited himself (and Mr. Calhoun too, if this man Cralle were entitled to the confidence of the pnblic,) as the most pitiable and disgusting specimen of coarse irreligion, anti-christian hate, and crude, bald infidelity that has challenged our attention in many a month.

Were it not that he presumes to associate his henceforth unenviable name with that of Mr. Calhoun, and assumes to represent that great statesman as the most piteously drivelling Tom Paiulte we have ever seen described, it would not be fit to mention him, in this connection, in these columns. But it is not to be allowed that he should, after Mr. Calhoun's death, sacrilegiously use his great name as the rallying-cry of a miserable infidel opposition to the Christian religion. Mr. Calhoun, we are sorry to say, was not a Christian; hut we are certain that he was neither a fool, nor a vulgar, coarse-monthed infidel. Whatever his religions opinions, he was a gentleman of the highest tone and most refined character; and his reverence for the Bible, and his respect for the Christian religion and Church, were manifest throughout his whole life. But this man Cralle represents him as follows:

He was never connected with, or (to use the vulgar phraseology,) "belonged" to any of the denominations of the so-called Christian Church. His understanding was too exalted, too clear and truthfully trained to yield a blind obedience to the miserable dogmas of the prevaleut popular creeds. He looked to his Maker, and not to weak, and perheps, wicked men for his faith. Nor did he trust the mighty interests of the future to the preposterous, yet pleasant inventions of councils, conventions, and other religious caucuses. He thought for himself—determined for himself—acted for himself; and doubtless never dreamed—in life or in death—of shunning responsibility, by seeking shelter behind any mental intercessor. He certainly never confided in the salvatory virtues of Priests' prayers purchased at two cents a piece—nor on the imputed righteousness of his Lord and Master—in itself, infinite—nor on original election and predestination to heaven—nor on "justification by faith only"—the most awful delusion that ever took possession of the human mind—nor on "irresistible grace," and the final perseverance of the Saints, viz: ourselves—that sweet, yet deadly morsel in the mouth of sinners—nor yet in the moral invulnerability resulting from being soused, heels over head, in a horse-pond, somewhat after the manner adopted by the mother of Paris, the pest of Troy. To all these inventions—inventions that have sowed iniquity broadcast throughout the Christian orb—he bowed in silence; but his head and his heart were far from them.

And yet this man Cralle, it is said, is to write the Life of John C. Calhoun! May the honor of the country, and the self-respect of South Carolina forbid it! If he should, we suggest that Theodore Parker be employed to write an introdnction to it, and that it be dedicated to the memory of Tom Paine. No work of the kind would be more desirable, if properly written, than the Life of John C. Calhoun; hut, under the proposed auspices, it is certain to be a failure.

NEW ORLEANS ORPHAN'S HOME.

FROM all the information we can gather, we are led to believe that the Orphan's Home, in the Fourth District, Corner of Constance and Seventh streets, is one of the most worthy charities of this city. It had its origin in the necessities and distresses occasioned by the epidemic of 1853, and has now been in operation for five years. It is entirely nnder the management of ladies—the Board of Managers meeting once a week. A Matron, with assistants and nurses, conducts the institution nnder the control of the Managers. The building is large and commodious, having spacious and pleasant garden and grounds attached, and every thing is kept in perfect order. Between one hundred and fifty and two hnndred children are in the "Home," upon an average. The amount of distress relieved in this way is incalculable. Poor little innocents, diseased and well, with or without parents, outcasts from birth, have here a home, and mothers, and friends. The State has appropriated, annually, from $2000 to $3000—a most niggardly amount for such a praise-worthy work. While the Romanists can get almost any amount from the State, for charity, and then appropriate it to Church-building, let private liberality pour into the well-managed treasury of the Orphan's Home.

WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE, Va., the oldest in America except Harvard, was destroyed by fire on the morning of the ninth of February. In 1692 a charter was obtained from England, through the agency of the Rev. James Blair, and the assistance of Lord Nicholson, then Lieutenant Governor of the Colony. The Institution took its name from the Royal Grantor, who appropriated funds, land, and ordered a revenue on tobacco for its support. The buildings were erected with all possible dispatch, (the bricks coming from England,) and the Rev. James Blair became its President. The building was 156 feet front, four stories high, and insured for $22,000. The library contained about 20,000 volumes.

THE MEETING OF THE PUBLISHING COMMITTEE of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, it will be remembered, is on Wednesday the 9th of March.

A NICE QUESTION.

THE Presbyterian and Independent are discussing the nice question, whether there is more incongruity in the doctrine that the atonement was general, hut the application was limited by Decree, or the doctrine that the atonement was limited, hut the offer of salvation general. The Independent thinks it absurd to teach that Christ did not die for all, if he is to be preached to all. The Presbyterian thinks that this is not absured at all, hut is puzzled to understand how any reasonable beiug can believe that Christ died for all, hut that the benefit of his death is limited hy a decree of special application. We are perfectly neutral in this conflict between our Calvinistic friends, inasmnch as a Decree has so limited our faculties, that we can comprehend neither the one doctrine nor the other. We can understand, however, says the Baltimore Advocate, that "He breaks the power of cancelled sin,

He sets prisoners free;
His blood can make the foulest clean,
His blood availed for me."

There is not a man who hears the Gospel, who does not know that he can avail himself of its offers if he will—that if he remains a sinner it is because he chooses to remain so. This consciousness is so instinctive to the nnderstanding, that it is not hlinded hy any amount of metaphysical fog. Let a man theoretically believe what schemes of theology he may, he does not get rid of the inward sense that he is a man—a being of independent will to choose good or evil—and that God has secured for him a good whinh he may choose.

PRIMITIVE METHODIST SINGING.

THE Richmond Advocate says: We have long entertained the belief, that the mode of interlining our hymns in public worship, is the best that can be adopted. No one can estimate the effect of this method. Hundreds hear the words nnnounced, catch the spirit and doctrine of them, and all can then unite in the praise: So the Wesleys did. Thousands had no hymn-book, and the preacher answered in the place. Thus, Chas. Wesley put every doctrine of the Bible, practical and experimental, in sweet, poetical measure, and the multitude learned the Gospel while they sung, and learning, they took fire, and sung "with the spirit and the understanding." Probably Charles Wesley's hymns have done more, in this, than John Wesley's preaching, to advance Methodism in England and America."

We fully agree with the Richmond Advocate, and we are grieved to see this time-honored practice going out of fashion. We know that the music is impaired hy the interruption of lining, but we cannot afford to lose the advantage of teaching our hymns to our people for this. Our doctrines learned in our hymns and preserved in them, immutably—our hymns are the creed the catechism of our people. [Baltimore Advocate.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN FRANCE.

At the last quarterly meeting of the French branch of the Evangelical Alliance, which was held at Paris on November 8, and largely attended, it was stated by Mr. Mettelat, a Lutheran pastor, that in a village near Paris where two years ago no more than fifty Protestants could be found, now a flourishing Protestant school exists with several hundred children. M. Dez, a Baptist clergyman, spoke of the success of the Baptists. Their labors, which are almost exclusively confined to the Roman Catholic population, have been so blessed that during the last fifteen years they have made more than 400 converts, and even three of their pastors are converts from the Catholic Church. According to the Almanac Protestant for 1859, the nnmber of Baptist clergymen amounts to six, and the number of Chnrches to ten, besides a large nnmber of stations. The progress of the Methodists is still greater. They count at present 152 Chapels, or places of worship, 29 ministers, 6 colporteurs, 72 local preachers, 1446 members, 65 on trial, 4 week schools, 41 Sunday schools. 203 teachers, 1891 pupils in the Sundsy schools.

THE NEW CONTROVERSY.

Brethren who wish us to admit the discussion of Rev. Mr. Mercein's views of infant regeneration, says the Christian Advocate and Journal, must excuse us for several reasons:

First: There would be no limit to the controversy.

Second: Our theology, as a Church, is sufficiently definite and settled on the questlon. We hold it expedient to notice deviations from that theology, but not to admit opposition to it. We allow free discussion, as freely as any paper in the land, on all practical, open questions, hut certainly do not include opposition to our settled theory.

Third: Our readers do not, we are sure, wish the paper crammed with such discussions.

Fourth: We do not think newspapers the proper organs for such elaborate controversies; they may do in quarterlies, pamphlets, or books, but they are not the material for weekly sheets.

EDITORIAL MANIFESTO.

The Bible, read without comments, will always lead honest and unbiassed converts into the water, after the example of Christ.—Texas Baptist.

How did it happen that, from the beginning, before there were any "comments," the whole body of converts, honest and unbiassed, of course, did not go "into the water?" Who is it that assumes that the great majority of the converts to the faith of Jesus Christ, from the beginning of the Christian Church nntil now, have been biassed and dishonest? "Judge not that ye be not judged; for with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." According to Christ's own rule, the necessary judgment to be measured ont to the editor of the Texas Baptist is precisely what he impliedly asserts of those who do not go "into the water." Dogmatic bigotry is philosophically and necessarily the same every where, and in all ages, whether in the Romish Church, or elsewhere.

RANDALL'S LIFE OF JEFFERSON.

WE have received from Derby and Jackson a copy of the above work, in three large and elegant volumes. The life of Jefferson is next in importance and worth to that of Washington. And from all we can learn, Dr. Randall has done for him what Irving has done for Washington. Not having had time, hitherto, to read it thoroughly, we qnote from the Delta.

We are pleased to learn that this valuable book is receiving the favor among our people which it deserves. Every citizen of our State, which was brought into the confederacy by the admirable statesmanship of Thomas Jefferson, ought to regard it a duty to add this valuable work to his library. He will find no other disposition which he can make of the small sum asked for it, that will so amply repay him. He will find a most elegant, graphic, faithful and vigorous sketch of this great man—the author of the Declaration of Independence, and of the great Republican doctrines that lie at the base of our Government. It is interesting, too, for the admirable pictures it gives of some of the most interesting scenes and characters in the early days of the Republic—of the domestic and social life of those times, of the patriotism, heroism and virtne of 1770. Mr. Jefferson, who experienced more than his share of the contumely which attend conspicious place and services, has never had full justice done his private virtues, until Mr. Randall undertook the task. His pride would never suffer him to stoop to the vindication of his character from even the grossest imputations; and even many vile slanders which political rivalry and malice hetched against him, have long had currency.

Mr. Randall disposes of these very summarily, and shows the great statesman and philosopher in his true character, as no less faithful and estimable in all his private and social relations, than great and brilliant in statesmanship and letters. Those who desire to be satisfied on these points, who wish to see a great man most faithfully and interestingly photographed, should not delay to procure a copy of Mr. Randall's [illegible]. They will find it the best reading of the day.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

Our Alabama readers, particularly, will be interested in the letter of Dr. Hamilton below, giving reliable information that Dr. Wightman accepts the Presidency of the Southern University at Greensboro. The Conference and the Trustees have determined, from the beginning, that nothing connected with the institution should be of an inferior character; and this principle they have carried out in the selection of their President. Dr. Wightman will be welcomed to Alabama by all classes, and with enthusiasm. We trust that both President and University may prosper abundantly.

MR. EDITOR: It will afford all the friends of the Southern University pleasure to learn that Dr. WIGHTMAN definitively accepts the presidency of that Institution, and will (D. V.) be in Greensboro, ready for service, by the first of October next. And, as he will be assisted by able Professors in the different departments, our friends every where may prepare to send on students. It is intended that they shall enjoy opportunities for improvement not inferior to those furnished by any institution in the South, or the country. We trust that the University will open with a number of students worthy of the noble efforts which have been made to furnish a high order of education.

February 8, 1859. J. HAMILTON.

MORE ROMAN CATHOLIC MISSIONARIES TO CHINA.—M. Perny, a French missionary to China, is at present traveling in France, in order to induce some of the monastic order to increase the missionary band in China. Two orders, which have hitherto not sent out foreign missionaries, have already responded to this appeal, and are fitting out several of their members for the departure to China. The one is the Societe des Freres de Marie, founded in the present century at Bordeaux, by M. Chaminad; the other is a female order, called Scurs de la Providence, (Sisters of Providence,) whose principal house is at Gap. The Univers remarks that the nuns sent out by the latter society will be the first female missionaries of France who penetrate into the interior of China.

FAIRBANKS PLATFORM SCALES, advertised in another column, are undoubtedly the best in the United States. They have that reputation, at least. One of the proprietors resides in New Orleans, and therefore the purchaser loses nothing in commissions to Agents. Sales of the scales amounting to about a million of dollars were made last year.

WANT OF ROOM necessitates delay of notice of the Minutes of the Louisiana Conference until next week. Many communications are delayed from the same cause.

SOUTHERN PUBLISHING INTEREST.

Since our Conference action, our agents, Drs. Hamilton and Neely, have spent part of their time here in the presentation of the claims of endowing the publishing house at Nashville, and in establishing our Conference Depository. Since the subject has been discussed and understood, there is a deep and widening interest felt by the Church and citizens generally. Subscriptions, amounting to between $25,000 and $30,000 in all have been received; and the balance of the Conference yet unoccupied. Many here, not members of our Church, took stock. At least forty shares have and will be taken by them. The one hundred thousand dollars proposed to be raised by our Conference will be done with ease, and no mistake. Our people here would double the amount if necessary.

Why, I would ask, should there be misgivings by any as to the importance or success of an enterprise that promises so much to the Church and the South? Is it less important to have a religious literature in unison with Southern sympathies than to have a Southern ministry, by which we are protected from insult and injury? I hold that true Southern men will not estimate by dollars and cents a work so important to our peace and prosperity. The South has the heart and the money, and by the grace of God, she can—yes, will—place herself above the position of menials in this glorious work. Alabama is true to herself in all that ennobles and adorns Southern character. The time was, that our people had to send their sons and daughters abroad, and many of them to the North, to be educated. That day has passed. In the last few years she has established and endowed a University and a Male and Female College, that will compare with any North or South, at a cost to the Church of over half a million of dollars. Yet her worth and moral power are increasing with every new enterprise.

I confess I was a little amused to hear of a distinguished minister, in a sister Conference, in a labored speech, opposing our Southern publishing enterprise, and who accounted for its having passed the Alabama Conference by outside pressure. I presume he alluded to a few laymen present, who asked the privilege of paying their money to this good work. If this is called outside pressure, let us have more of it in all our benevolent enterprises. This same Conference has been laboring by her agents for years to get an endowment of $50,000 for one of her Colleges, and to perfect this undertaking, two agents are put in the field this year. Since this effort commenced, Alabama has raised, at least, half a million for educational purposes. When I look from another stand point and see what has been done in the bounds of that Conference by the worldly enterprise of her citizens to develope her resources and enrich her people, and then turn to Alabama and see how little she has done in State development, I feel deeply humbled. So you see in a Conference abounding in wealth and with a large intelligent membership, it may be truly said, the children of this generation are wiser in their day than the children of light.

A brighter day is dawning on us, and if the whole South will unitedly do their part in perfecting the action of the late General Conference, we will have done a work for good unknown in our past history as a Church. The fears of the doubting should be given to the winds, and all unite to push forward to completion the work begun. Then future generations will rise up and call us blessed. HAYMAN.

THE BURNS CENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY.

The extraordinary honors that have been paid, during the past week, to the memory of Burns, while they have been noticeable in a historic point of view, says the Independent, are still more important in a Christian. There is reasonable ground of fear that the influence upon some minds will be disastrous, for there has mingled with the celebration one injustice, which is a wrong alike to the dead and the living. It is a perversion to rank Burns among the apostles of irreligion, and his life, properly read, is an emphatic commentary upon the supreme value of religion. He lived but ten years after he first went to Edinburgh, and died at the early age of thirty-seven, a victim to the drinking usages of society! Alas! for those cruel usages. The friends that gathered round him, embraced to betray him, welcomed him to the convivial board only to quench the light of his genius, and consign him to an early grave. Surely, at this day, after so many like examples have united Christians and philanthropists in the great temperance reformation, it was most unbecoming this commemoration to lit nigh the intoxicating bowl and sing peans to the destroyer of Burns! This convivial drinking is the stronghold of intemperance, as indeed it ever has been, for solitary drunkenness is rare, except as the first degenerates into it, when pride and honor are lost, and sensual appetite only survives. Nor has the destroyer ever invented a more conning and effective device. It has made hospitality and friendship do the work of deadliest enmity; it has hid the serpent amid flowers; it has made genius and wit, poetry and song, speed the work of madness and death; and this device has maintained itself from generation to generation, although every year the sons of genius and favorites of society have ascended this worse than funeral pyre, to burn in hotter flames and expire in wilder delirium. Shall this dangerous usage pass through our willing hands to our children, to repeat its holocausts to the Moloch of a false festivity? As if it were not enough for men to tempt one another, and make the tie of good fellowship the bond of death, woman, not sufficiently taught by her sister's wrongs, is still adding her ministry; the hand of beauty is putting to the young men's lips the flashing but deceiving cup! It is very much to be feared that the mistakes and excesses of some more aggressive friends of temperance, will embolden the retreating enemy, and that these destructive habits are reappearing under the sanction of fashion, and in the very sanctuary of Christian homes, and in forms the more deadly because of the temporary banishment.

But temperance is not the only lesson connected with the life of the Scottish poet. Burns was not one of those who have left no lines which "dying they would wish to blot." In a conversation held with a lady, when death, to her eye, was stamped upon his face, he lamented many things he had written, and regretted his inability to alter and amend.

BISHOP WHATCOAT.—Eliza Jinkins, a pioneer Methodist lady, writes to one of our Southern exchanges as follows about Bishop Whatcoat: "Of the earlier bishops, Whatcoat was in my mother's house a favorite. He filled their idea of John, the beloved disciple, and seemed ever to lean on the Saviour's breast. One sermon I have heard quoted from infancy, on, 'Thy Maker is thy husband.' A favorite song of his, which he often sung, and always with tears of rapture, was,

"How happy is the pilgrim's lot."

SWEDISH LUTHERAN CHURCHES.—The Swedish churches on the Delaware, in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, coming Anglicized before the Lutheran Church was able to supply them with English preachers, were taken into the Episcopal Church. A different fate undoubtedly awaits the Swedish churches of the North-west, who are already beginning to create their ministers in this country at Springfield, Ill. It is nine years since the first Swedish Lutheran Church was organized at Andover, Ill., by Pastor Ehljorn (new Scandinavian Professor at Springfield.) Now there are about thirty churches organized, of which ten are in Illinois, five in Minnesota, five in Indiana, and one in Pensylvania. These churches have fifteen pastors and missionaries laboring among them, and about seven young men preparing for the ministry. The number of their communicants is about 3000, and their character decidedly evangelical.

MISSIONARY MEETINGS.—The Rev. Dr. Durbin, corresponding secretary of the M. E. Missionary Society, has been holding missionary meetings in the Trinity and Green street Methodist Churches, in Philadelphia, with extraordinary success. Sermons were preached by eminent ministers and addresses made. The result was at Trinity a collection of $5000, constituting fifty patrons, five hundred dollars each; several life directorships of one hundred and fifty dollars each, and many life members. At Green street over $1000 were collected, and it is believed that future subscriptions will increase it to $1500.

LITERARY.

FUNERAL DISCOURSES ON DR. BUNTING.—A correspondent of Zion's Herald says, that in connection with the decease of Jabez Bunting, some surprise has been expressed that of all the funeral sermons delivered at the time, only one should have been published, the one by the Rev. Thos. Jackson. Another forthright since, however, Dr. F. J. Jobson, by the urgent request of his friends, sent forth from the press a most elaborate discourse, occupying about 140 pages, on his great departed friend, Dr. Bunting. The production is a perfect model of what a memorial should be. Methodism, indeed, has produced nothing like it. The nearest approach to it in Dr. Bunting's own discriminating sermonic eulogy on Richard Watson. Hereafter Hall on Ryland, Foster on Robert Hall, Pratt on Cecil, Bunting on Watsen, and Jobson on Bunting, must fill the same category.

HON. J. F. H. CLAIBORNE has a volume ready for the press entitled "The War Path of Sam Dale;" being the autobiography of one of the most prominent pertizans of his day.

We understand, says the Vicksburg Sun, that a new paper will be launched upon the broad sea of journalism, in this place very shortly, under the auspices of a talented member of the Catholic Church, the tenets of which it will advocate and expound.

THE BRITISH AMERICAN PRESS.—The press of Canada numbers 20 daily newspapers, 156 weekly, and 33 issued weekly and semi-weekly, making a total of 200. The papers of New Brunswick, Nove Scotia, Newfoundland and Prince Edward's Island, not included in the above, number 40 to 50, and are chiefly weekly publications.

A "Biographical Study on the Life and Works of Daniel Webster, the American orator," has been published in Russia by Professor Ketchenevsky, of the University of Kharkoff.

Mr. Tennyson's new poem of "King Arthur" is said to abound in lines and passages of uncommon beauty. It is shortly be published.

It is announced that the second volume of M. Guizot's Memoirs is in the press and will shortly appear.

It is stated that Mr. Forsyth, our late Minister to Mexico, and Roger Pryor, one of the editors of the Washington States, about to take charge of a new national Democratic journal which is soon to be started in New York city, with a capital of $100,000.

The Turkish Government has formed a commission at Constantinople to draw up a new Ottoman Dictionary.

BIOGRAPHY OF MR. CALHOUN.—It is understood that R. K. Cralle, Esq. of Lynchburg, Va., the confidential friend of John C. Calhoun while living and the editor of his works after his death, has in preparation an elaborate biography of the great statesmen.

THE FIRST COPY OF BURNS'S POEMS. — The first copy of Burns's Poems issued from the press was presented by the bard himself to Hugh Morton, who was his fellow ploughman on the farm of Lochlie. Burns handed the book to Morton while standing at the publisher's door in Kilmarnock, on the morning when the poems were ready to be issued. This interesting copy of the poet's works is now in the possession of Mr. John Morton, Riccarton, son of the above named, Hugh Morton. Advertiser.

The fourth and last volume of Hengstenberg's Christology (translated) has been published in Edinburg, and is received in this country. It will be recollected that an edition of the work, in its first form, was translated by Dr. Keith, of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary, of Virginia, and published at Washington, D. C. This has long been out of print. The new edition is almost a new work.

The first volume of Professor Masson's Life and Times of Milton, has been published in London, and will soon appear from the press of Gould & Lincoln, of N. York. The Athenæum devotes several columns to a notice of this instalment of the Professor's work, and says it is full of interest, but thinks the author has erred in making his book so full and inclusive. This is an error, however, which we think readers will be ready to pardon.

OLDEST RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.—The claim to this honor is set up for the New York Observer (1822)—the Boston Recorder (1816)—the Weekly Recorder, Chillicothe, Ohio, now Banner and Advocate, Pittsburgh, (1814)—the Religious Remembrancer, Philadelphia, (1813)—the Herald of Gospel Liberty, Portsmouth, New Hampshire (1808)—the Christian History, Boston, (1743.)

MR. JOHN L. MOTLEY is passing the winter at Rome. The first volume of his "History of the Dutch Republic" has been translated into French, and published at Brussels, where it has met with marked success.

THE HON. GEORGE P. MARSH, in a recent lecture on the English language, says that the English words found in use by good writers hardly fall short of 100,000. Each individual has but a small vocabulary of his own, however. Few scholars use as many as 10,000 English

PERSONAL.

MILOSCH OBENOWITSCH, the new Prince-Elect of Servia, since the abdication of the reigning Prince, was born in 1780, the son of a poor farmer. The Servians revolted against the Turks early in the century; and young Milosch, remarkable for gigantic statnre and strength, became conspicuous amoag the insurgent troops. He was appointed to direct the defense of Belgravani, the siege of which villnge he sustained with credit. In 1815 he headed a second revolt, and became so noted and important that on the conclusion of a second peace he was created hereditary Prince of Servia, trihntary to the Porte. He reigned tyrannically, and in 1839 was forced to abdicate in favor of the present Prince just deposed. Since 1839 he has lived chiefly at Vienna, where, in the words of an Austrian journal, "his lofty stature, his Serrian costume, his passion for the theatres, and his judiciously distrihuted ducats have obtained for him a kind of popularity." He has been walled upon by a deputation of the Servian Senate, and consents to resume his former dignities. His son and heir-apparent is the husband of a noble and wealthy lady of Hangary.

VICTOR EMMANUEL II., the patriotic and heroic King of Sardinia, the head of the only liberal European government besides Great Brilian, and the hope of Italy, has made a speech at the opening of his Chambers which is felt throughout the civilized world. With much earnestness and feeling, and amid great applause, he said, among other things: The horizon in which the new year rises is not perfectly serone—nevertheless, you will resume your parliamentary labors with your accustomed alacrity. Relying upon the experience of the past, we shall meet the eventualities of the futuro with resolution. Our country, though small in extenl, has acquired credit in the councils of Europe. Because it is great with regard to the ideas it represents and the sympethy it inspires. Thi s condition is not free from danger, since, while we respect treaties, we are not insensible to the cry of grief which renches us from so many parts of Italy. Strong in concord, and confiding in our rights, we shall nwait the decrees of Divine Providence with prudence and resolution.

The Pensacola Observer says the exports of lumber from that port for the last month add up 4,941,338 feet, besides those of timber, laths, cotton, bricks, etc. In December, they amounted to 3,058,108. This shows a large increase of business. In 1854 the exports of lumber amounted to only 15,041,632 feet for the whole year.

ARKANSAS,

Hon. Christopher C. Scott, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Arkansas, died at Little Rock, on the 10th inst.

State Aid to Arkansas Railroads.—A gentleman direct from Little Rock informs the Memphis Appeal that the bill to appropriate $5000 per mile to all the railroads of the State, had failed. that as a substitute, the Legislature has appropriated $50,000 to the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad, and $40,000 to the Gaines's Landing road. A charter had been granted to the Des Arc and Fort Smith Railroad. It was supposed the Legislature would bring their labors to a close about the 1st of March. The decision of the Commissioner of the Land Office, declaring the Rock Island Reservation in Illinois subject to pre-emption, has been reversed, and the land will be sold under appraisement to the highest bidder. It is estimated that $300,000 are saved to the Government by stopping the course of this speculation.

VIRGINIA.

It is stated that Mr. Hunter, positively refuses to be a candidate for nomination for the Presidency.

MISSOURI.

A bill has been introduced in the Senato to tax agents of foreign insurance companies about $2000 per annum.

A bill prohibiting the emancipation of slaves in Missouri has been introduced in the lower House of the State Legislature.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

No franking privilege exists in England. Even the Queen is obliged to pay her penny postage. A company has been organized with a capital of $200,000, all subscribed, to run a daily line of coaches from Leavenworth City to the gold region in Kansas, to commence operations about the 1st of April. Miss Amelie Ross, aged 117 years, died last month in England. She lived in the reigns of five sovereigns of Great Britain. One hundred years ago her parents settled with her in the town of Newtownlimavady, and she lived there until the day of her death.

Under the heading, "Let us make a River to the Mountains," the St. Louis Democrot broaches a magnificent enterprise, which is nothing less than to unite the waters of the Upper Arkansas, the South Platte, and the Kansas rivers into one stream to lill the bed of the latter, and make from the three inconsiderable and almost useless streams, one broad, deep, navigable river, that would open the far west country clear to the base of the mountains, and into the new auriferous regions, whither emigration and civilization is now powerfully attracted. The river thus created would be equal to the Missouri in magnitede. The cost of constriction and eqnipment of the railroads in the United States amounts to $1,050,655,870, or enough to break down any other country in the world. Brazil sends yearly into the trade about 30,000 karats weight of uncut diamonds. During the two years after the discovery of the diamond mine at Sincora in Bahin, 600,000 karats were sent to Europe; but in 1852 the quantity had fallen to 130,000. It will be interesting to learn that Easter, which will be on the 24th of April this year, last fell on that day in 1701, and will not fill on the same date again till 2011. Since the introduction of the Gregorian Almanac this has only been the case in the years 1639, 1707 and 1797. The period in which Easter can fall, reeches from 22d of March (earliest date) to the 25th of April (letest date,) leaving thirty-five different days for the celebration of this festival. In this century Easter will fall only once (1886) on the latest date, the 25th of April. The ceded lands of the new Territory of Dacotah, lying along the big Sioux river, are already organized into five counties. The Territory also includes the Pemhina settlements on the tied river of the North. The Commissioners for the Great Exhibition of 1851 have at length paid off the Government advances, and the estate at Kensington is now their own property. A sum of £120,000 has been repaid in money. The piece of land, about ten acres in extent, on which the Museum and its buildings stand, is to remain in the hands of Government. It is stated that the ship Abbott Lawrence sailed from Calcutta on the 13th of August last, for New York, since which time nothing has been heard of her. Mr. Phillip Jesse, eged 120 years, died in New Garden, Russell county, Va., on the 1st of December. It is stated that u short time before his death he was able to attend to his household affairs, and that while in his hundredth year he cut and split one hundred rails.

The National debt of Great Britian consists, as we all know, of sums borrowed by Government to make up deficiencies of revenue. But all do not know that Charles II—"old Rowley," the pensioner of Louis XIV—"the Merry Monarch"—was the first king of Great Britain who borrowed money on the national credit; this began in 1660. At the abdication of James II, in 1688 the amount of the debt was $600,000. But it was his successor who established the system—a system which has unfortunately taken deep root in our finance, for the ill-weed has systematically increased until it has now reached the fearful amount of eight hundred millions sterling! "How we are governed!"

A gas-illuminated car came through from New York by the midnight train last night, over the Worcester route. During the nine hours occupied by the trip, only ten cents worth of gas was consumed, and the car was lighted up as brilliantly as a parlor. It was deemed by the passengers to be a luxurious improvement, altogether worthy of general adoption for the benefit of the travelling public. The gas metre, holding the required quantity of the subtle fluid, is placed underneath the car, from which pipes supply a jet at either end of the interior. [Boston Transcript, Feb. 3.

The Reading Railroad Company is placing gas fixtures in the passenger cars. The trains will in a short time, be lighted in this way, as a substitute for oil lamps.

Most of the vessels which left Cleveland, Detroit, etc., for Liverpool, laden with various products, have returned, and their owners are so satisfied with their ventures, that the trade is to be continued.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

Mexico

In Yucatan, a war of extermination between the whites and Indians seems to be the only alternative. Miramon has restored his father-in-law, Zuloga, to the Presidency—thus assumed it himself—then left it for an attack on Vera Cruz. The Juarez party are successful in many places. The result of the civil war is as uncertain as ever.

Hayti.

The latest advices say that the revolution is successful—that Soulouque is dethroned, and that Geffrard is President.

Great Britain.

The English Government, it is reported, is exerting its influence for a peaceful solution of the difficulty between Anstria and France. It is believed that upon the attitude assumed by England, the question of peace or war depends. The British Governmeat has given out large contracts for cannon and gunpowder, which has caused some uneasiness to the public.

France.

Paris correspondents of the London papers speak of the activity displayed in every part of France by the Government in war-like preparations, and state that it is the general impression that a momentous crisis is approaching. The French Government has forbidden the recruiting of emigrants from the Eastern Coast of Africa, and also from the Island of Madagascar.

China.

Later advices from China had reached England. The China Mail confirms the previous report of the short supply of tea. Mr. Reed, our Commissioner to China, has concluded his mission and sailed in the steam frigate Minnesota for home, intending to touch at Calcutta on his way.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14.—Two important treaties have been negotiated by our minister, Mr. Reed, with the Chinese Government. They were received by the State Department from China to-day. One embraces a satisfactory adjustment of the claims of our Government against that of China; the other establishes commercial relations of a more liberal character than have heretofore been granted to our commerce. Both treaties are entirely satisfactory to the administration.

THE CARGO of the ship Ocean Monarch, Capt. Page, for Liverpool, cleared at the Custom-house by Mecker, Knox & Co. is the largest cargo of cotton ever cleared from this or any other port. It consists of 7069 bales cotton, weighing 3,339,220 pounds, and valued at $384,012 00.

DEATH OF THE OLDEST MAN.—We have received, says the Delta, the following communication from a correspondent at Covington, in this State: "The oldest man in the United States, and probably in the whole globe, is dead. We have to announce the death of "Cæsar," an old negro man, not less than 130 to 140 years of age, who died in Covington, on the 8th of this month. It is said that he was, over 100 years ago, King of a tribe of negroes in his native land, Africa. He has been confined to his bed for upwrods of twenty-five years, and although not able to walk a step for that period, he retained the full possession of his senses up to the last minute of his life.

CANAL-STREET.—We learn that the plan for improving Canal street, has been agreed upon, and proposals are about to be advertised for the work. The plan will include a widening of the banquette seven feet, the road forty feet, with a walk in the centre of the street, which will be enclosed on the sides with iron chains, the walks to be shelled or graveled. This will, when completed, render it the most beautiful aveane in the United States. A conspicuous object of interest and ornament of this street will be the statue of Henry Clay, by Hart, which is probably finished by this time, and will, we hope, be inaugurated in the course of the present year.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, February 15, 1859.

The following, copied from the New Orleans Price-Current, furnishes the annexed statement of the past week's business, ending Friday evening, the 12th instant:—The market has been rather heavy for most of our leading commodities. It will be seen that Cotton has been depressed by the tenor of the European advices brought by the Asia; and that Sugar and Molasses have yielded somewhat, under ample receipts and a less animated demand. In Tobacco, the transactions have continued limited and only a moderate business has been done in the various articles of Western Produce. The weather, generally, has been clear and pleasant. The river is about five feet below high-water mark.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	—@—	Good Middling	11¾@—
Ordinary	—@—	Middling Fair	12¾@12¾
Good Ordinary	0¾@10	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¼@10¾	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10¾@11	Good and Fine	—@—

COTTON.—The European advices, which came to hand on Tuesday, tended still further to unsettle and depress prices. Under these circumstances holders were compelled to meet the reduced offers of buyers, and about 13,500 bales were disposed of on Wednesday. On Thursday the enquiry was less active, but a fair amount of business was transacted, the sales being about 11,500 bales. On Friday, with later Europeau advices fully duo, the demnnd was again very fair, sales reaching about 14,000 bales. The sales for the past week nmount to 50,500 bales. Arrived in the same time 63,421 bales; and the Exports of the week to 36,675 bales. Stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 11th inst. 525,030 bales. With respect to prices, we have to report a decline of fully ¼ to ⅛ in the Middling and lower grades, with some sales, in the irregularity of the market, that would indicate a still greater reduction. The better qualities however, being comparatively scarce, are held with much confidence, and in these there is no very marked change in the rates; thus leaving an unusually wide difference in price between them and the Middling and lower grades. The enquiry, as has been the case throughout tha season, has continued to be confined almost exclusively to clean Cottons, and we have again to remark that the unusually great and constantly accumulating proportion of the low dusty and sandy descriptions remains a dead weight upon the market, consting in stock but repudiated by purchasers as comparatively valueless.

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 13,500 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3¾ to 5; Common to Good Common 5¼ to 6; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 6¾; Prime to Choice 6¾ to 7¾; Centrifugal and Clarified 7¾ to 9¼; Prime to Choice 10 to — cents per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 15,000 hhls. The quotations are:—For Inferior and Fermenting 29 to 31½; Prime to Choice 32 to 33 in hhds. and in half-hhls. 35 to 37 cents per gallon.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs, planters, 4¾ to 5¼; Leaf, inferior to common 5¾ to 6¼; fair 6¾ to 7; fine 7¾ to 8½; choice, heavy and light, 8¾ to 9 cents per pound.

FLOUR.—The sales of this week have reached 14,500 barrels, at a range of $4 75 to $5 00 for the nnd unbranded; $5 25 to $5 50 for superfine; $5 70 to $6 00 for extra, and $7 00 for choice extra.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 13,000 sacks—prices ranging from 85 to 90 for good to prime mixed, up to 95 cents per bushel for prime to choice white and yellow. Oats sell at 75 to 80 cents per bushel. Grau has been selling at $1 00 to $1 10 cents per 100 lbs.

PORK.—The sales for the past week ranged at about $10 00 to $20 50 per barrel for Mess, and $13 50 for Prime.

BEEF.—With no transactions, we are unable to give reliable quotations.

BACON.—Shoulders 8 to 8¼; Ribbed Sides 10¼ to 10¾; Sugar-cured Hams 12½ cents per pound.

LARD.—In barrels and tierces 11¾ to 12¼; kegs 13 to 13¾ cents per pound.

BUTTER.—Western has been selling at 9½ to 12½; prime roll Butter at 18 to 20 cents per pound.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 11¾ to 14 cents per yard; India Bagging at 13¾ to 13¾c. Bale Rope, machine made, at 7¾ to 8 cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Have sold during the week at a range of 9¾ to 10 cents for light bud medium, and 10¾ to 11¾ for heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote ordinary to low fair at 10¾ to 10¾, fair to good fair at 11, and prime at 11¼ to 11¾ cents per pound.

MONEY MARKET.—There has been a further slight increase in the quantity of paper offering out-doors, but does not appear to have produced any material change in the market, capitalists being well supplied with funds and disposed to take all the good paper offering, at about previous rates. The Banks are working pretty well up to the applications for temporary accommodation, being still quite large. The rates are 8 to 9 per cent. for good mortgage notes and first-class long dated acceptances, second class ditto 9½ to 10, and for short commercial paper from 6 to 7 per cent. per annum.

LIVE-STOCK.—Beef Cattle—Western, we quote at 11¼c. per pound, net, and good Texas at 10c, ordinary at 8c. 11ogs, 9c. per lb. net. Sheep $3 50 to $6 00 perhead. Milch Cows, $40 to 05 per head. Veal Cattle, $12 00 to $14 00 per head.

Liverpool Cotton Morket.—Jan. 28.—The sales of cotton during the week amounted to 50,000 bales. All qualities of cotton, except Fair Orleans and Fair Mobile, have slightly declined. The advices from the United States, together with the large arrivals at this port from America, are the chief causes of the decline. A decline of ¼ is quoted on Middling Orleans. Middling Mobile has declined 1-16 and Middling Uplands have declined ⅛. The sales on Friday, the 28th, were 6000 bales. The market closed dull, at the following quotations: Fair Orleans, 7¼; Middling Orleans, 6¾; Fair Mobile, 7; Middling Mobile, 6¾; Fair Uplands, 6 11-16; Middling Uplands, 6 7-16. The stock of cotton at Liverpool is 495,000 bales, of which 305,000 are American.

Manchester Trade—The latest advices from Manchester are of an unfavorable character. The market for manufactured goods was dull, except for the India trade, and spinners are accepting easier sales.

Havre Cotton Market.—Jan. 28.—The Cotton market opened at an advance of one franc during the early part of the week Orleans tres ordinaire was quoted at 98 francs. The market closed at a slight decline on all qualities, though with considerable animation. The sales for the week foot up 10,000 bales. The stock of cotton at Havre is; 185,000.

Havana Morkets.—From the correspondence of the Delta, dated Feb. 9th, we learn the following: Sugar—for No. 12 10¼ to 10¾ rials; whites through, embracing our last goods from plantation; 30¾ to 33¾ yellows 25¼ to 26; muscovado 23 to 23¾ per 100 lbs. The stocks remaining at the close of last week of old and new Sugars, 65,000 here and at Matanzas, against 88,000 boxes in 1858. Of hhds. Sugars—6000 hhds. on hand. Molasses, very little done, prices remain above the general views of buyers, at 4 rials per keg of 5½ gallons. Coffee, second and third qualities, $12¼ to $12¾. Lard, $18 per 100 lb. Stock small, and all in hands except 600 packages, which will probably sell for $18, if not more—for small parcels and of the best quality. Dry salt Fork $15. A cargo of Pitch-pine Lumber, from Georgetown, South Carolina, sold at $28 per 1000 feet. In other products, nothing of interest for the South-west. Freights—there has continued some movement—but at no advance in rates. Vessels taken for Cienfuegos, New York, Trinidad, and Boslen, 35, 38 and 40 cents per 100 lb. Boxes hence for Boston and New York 80 to 85 cents per box; $3 to $3 50 per hhd. sugar; at Sagua La Grande for New York $4 50. Molasses taken at outports for Portland, Boston and New York at $2 00 to $2 50 per 110 gallons g. g. c. A limber freight at Cienfuegos for London $3 50—50 enble feet, taken by a British brig. Exchenges, have been heavy. London 12 to 12½ premium; New York par to ¼ premium; Boston, etc., par; New Orleans 2½ to 4 premium, at short sight.

New York Markets.—Feb. 14.—The sales of cotton to-day were 1200 bales. The market closed dull—quotations nominal. Flour has an advancing tendency. The sales to-dey were 15,500 bbls. at a slight advance on Saturday's qdotations. Corn firm and active—sales to-day of 28,000 bushels, at 83c. for white. Eastern mess pork dall at $17 75 to $18 37½. Sugar firm, prices ranging from 7 to 8c. Bacon firm, shoulders 7 to 7¼c.

Cincinnati Morkets.—Feb. 14.—Flour firm; sales to-day; 3100 bbls. at $5 50 to $5 60. Bacon steady; sales to-day of 245 hhds. shoulders 7½, sides 9½c.

On the 10th inst. near Raymond, Mississippi, by Rev. John T. Dew, Mr. JOHN D. FONOREN to Miss SALLIE A. JAMES both of Hinds county, Mississippi.

On the 30th ult. by Rev. J. D. Adams, Mr. HENRY LIGGITT, to Miss E. HENDERSON, all of Waterproof, Louisiana.

DIED:

JAMES KING was born on 6th November, 1856, and died December 24th, 1858, at Pleasant Hill, Alabama. I was absent at the time of my son's death. If you have not experienced such a trial, you have but a faint idea of my feelings when I returned and found that my child had been buried. J. L. SAMPEY.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN NOTICES.

The Proportion of Advocates taken, to the white member ship of the Church, ought to be as one to five, at least. Families do not average more than five white persons in number. The Alabama Conference has 45,640 white members. One ADVOCATE to five members would give us over 9000 subscribers to that Conference. If it be said, that other Advocates circulate there as well as ours, we reply—every family ought to take their own Advocate first, and then any other they wish. Again: the families in our congregations, not members of the Church, will take the ADVOCATE if applied to; and this will more than compensate for any loss on the other score. According to this rule, in the Mississippi Conference, which has near 20,000 members, we ought to have 4000 subscribers; and in the Louisiana Conference, which has near 10,000 white members, we now have 1800 subscribers. Just look at this, and think about it! It could be done this year. Brethren in the ministry, please state and enlarge upon this calculation before all your congregations. It would give us 15,000 subscribers.

TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS FROM EACH PREACHER is what we propose, and hope for during the present year, as the minimum standard. Many, of course, will procure a much larger number; but we hope no Preacher will fall below this. It is not a large number, and it will not be hard work to reach it. Brethren in the ministry, could you not obtain this number within the next month? What a tide of success and encouragement for the paper—for you—for the Church—it would create!

THEOPHILUS WALTON—Price, $1. In order to test the readableness of this book we lent it to a young lady of fifteen, who was much given to stories founded on fact. She ran through it with great speed notwithstanding its frequent patches of Greek letter. In fact, the author has succeeded in making the satire controversy of dupto, duno and topto, quite palatable, and treats you to a very pleasant dish of Baptists and milk.

The Preachers of the Mississippi Conference will please remember the resolution adopted at our late session, to collect at least $5 from each charge for that Church, and forward to me at Vicksburg, in the early part of the Conference year—in the month of February, if possible.

Washington, D. C. H. H. MONTGOMERY.

To the Preachers of the Mississippi Conference.

At the Depository at Vicksburg we have a large stock of books waiting your orders to leave for the country and towns in the interior. I hope you will soon give the orders to march. They have a good mission to fill, at your command. As inactivity is not conducive to health and the accomplishment of good, it will be well for you to issue orders soon. The vital truth possessed by the books is very much needed by several families in each of your Charges. As these truths are antidotes to errors now rife, the sooner the remedy is administered the sooner the cure may be expected. Let us have your calls soon. Our shingle bangs out; and we are prepared to do up parcels or boxes as you may desire. If you have not received our Catalogue, just out, please let us knew, and we will send you half a dozen by mail. The preachers of the Louisiana, Ouachita and Memphis Conferences, in certain localities, might find it convenient to obtain books from our Depository. If they will favor us with their orders we will fill them with pleasure. If they will give us their addresses, we will send them catalogues. All letters on business with the Agency or Depository should be addressed to the undersigned, at Vicksburg. H. H. MONTGOMERY, Agent.

New Orleans Depository.

If any persons have presumed to doubt the permanency of our Depository at this point, we beg leave to state that we are a permanent really; and that nothing is more unpleasant than to have one's existence questioned. To live is the very least of our purpose; we expect to thrive, and have no little comfort in the fact that we sow both: Talking of living, puts us in mind of one of the best autobiographies in the English Language—not excepting that of Dr. Franklin—the Life of Bishop Capers—which we have at $1 25. All the Books published at our Publishing-house at Nashville, for sale at Nashville prices, by KEENER AND MCTYEIRE.

Addresses by Doctor Taylor.

Rev. TAYLOR Secretary of the Sunday-school Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, desire us to give notice that he will deliver an address to the public in behalf of the Sunday-school interest:

And at Mobile, Alabama			20th March.

Notice.—Arrangements have been made with the Board of Managers of the Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference, and with the Agents, Revds. H. H. Montgomery and James H. Merrill, by which the labors of Bro. Montgomery will be confined to the interests of the Depository at Vicksburg and those of Bro. Merrill directed to the interests of the Publishing-house at Nashville.

They will, however, co-operate with each other generally.

Rev. Dr. James A. Light, having been relieved from his appointment to the Carthage Circuit in consequence of the state of his health, will travel in the Mississippi Conference, as agent of the Publishing house, to raise money for the augmentation of the capital of the same, to collect money already due, and receive subscriptions to the Church periodicals. R. ABBEY, Financial Secretary.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

A Little New Orleans Girl,

Who is about seven years old, and who had been sick, was talking a few days ago with her grandmother.

"Grandma," said she, "how do people join the Church?"

Her Grandma, answered, "Why, my child, the minister, at a certain time, invites all who wish to join the Church to come forward, and give him their hand as an evidence of their desire to become members. If you wish to join, you must, then, go up, give your hand to the minister, and your heart to God!"

"Ah," said the little girl, "how do you give your heart to God?"

"Why," said the Grandma, "you must think in your heart, as you give your hand to the minister, that, at the same time, you give your heart to God—to obey Him, and worship Him, and love Him, in your thoughts and wishes and feelings."

"Well, then," said the little girl, "I want to join the Church—I want to give my heart to God, and my hand to the minister."

At another time, while she was sick, she lay for some time with her eyes strangely looking upward—she paid no attention to the questions asked her. Her Grandma thought she was going to have a spasm. Presently she spoke, and said:

"Grandma, I have seen an angel; and, O, how beautiful it was! It had such beautiful wings, and such a beautiful thing shining all round its head."

Her Grandma told her, that if she loved and served God, she too would be an angel when she died and passed away from this world.

"How," said the little girl, "can God put wings on such a body as mine!"

Her Grandma told her that God, who had power to make both body and soul, and had power to raise the dead body from the grave, could not find it hard to make us like the angels after death.

We trust the little girl will be permitted to join the Church and give her heart to God, and that she may be so good and pious on this world that she may be permitted to be an angel of God in heaven. And we trust that all our little readers will join the Church, and be good Christians, and have a home here—after being the angels.

Visit from the Angels.

On a beautiful Spring morning, as a young mother completed her toilet, and was about to leave the room, she turned, as she was wont, to look at two lovely, sleeping infants, with that fond affection, and holy love, and beaming joy, which mothers only know. As she turned from the cradle to the youngest (now the eldest, as the angels), the eldest, a little more than two years old, suddenly raised herself, and gazing upwards, fixed her clear blue eyes on the mantle, while her face wore an expression of joy, such, I ween, as angels only wear; she exclaimed,

"They are going! Mamma, they are going!"

"What are going?" said the mother gently—afraid the tones of her voice would break the illusion.

"Oh, the little babies with wings—so many of them—and the beautiful (beautiful) flowers! oh, all around so pretty, they are going, Mamma!"

As her mother continued to question, the angel expression faded, and a look of disappointment settled upon her countenance, still disproved the notion that there was a darkened future.

The child had been told of the beauties of a heavenly home—of the joy that awaits the redeemed. The opening leaf, the swelling bud, had been placed in those tiny hands, their beauties pointed out—daily had she been told and taught to admire the skill of the Great Artist. She had been taught to love her little kneeling-place, and at twilight to clasp her little hands in prayer before her couch was pressed by that gentle form. Was it a wonder, then, that her infant slumbers should be sweet? That visions of heaven should open to her view? That flowers, such as bloom only in the Paradise of God, should be scattered visibly around her?

Giants.

The bed of Og was twenty-seven feet long and seven feet broad. The height of Goliah was 11 feet, his coat weighed 150 and his spear 10 pounds. The body of Orestes, son of Agamemnon, leader of the Grecian expedition against Troy, was 11½ feet high, and a woman 10 feet. Maximus, a native of Spain, the Roman Emperor, was 9 feet high. Maximus, originally from France, another Roman Emperor, was 8½ feet high. His wife's bracelets served him for finger rings. His strength was such that he could draw a loaded wagon, break a horse's jaw with his fist, crush the hardest stones with his fingers, and shave trees with his hands. His voracity was equal to his strength, eating 43 pounds of flesh and drinking 10 bottles of wine daily. Byrne and O'Brien, Irish giants, were 9 feet high. A Tennessee giant lately died 7½ feet high, weighing more than 1000 pounds. The Kentucky giant was 7 feet 10 inches high.

Is it You?

There is a child—a boy or girl,
I'm sorry it is true—
Who does n't mind when spoken to;
Is it you?—it can't be you!

I know a child—a boy or girl,
I'm loth to say I do—
Who struck a little playmate child;
I hope that was n't you.

I know a child—a boy or girl—
I hope that such are few—
Who told a lie—you, told a lie!
It cannot be 'true you!'

There is a boy—I know a boy,
I cannot love him though—
Who robs the little birdie's nest;
That bad boy can't be you!

A girl there is—a girl I know—
And I could love her, too,
But that she is so proud and vain;
That ought isn't you

Died of a Broken Heart.

We find in an English paper an account of the death of a father from grief. His boy, aged eight years, was accused on a charge of stealing a sovereign. Bail was refused, and the lad was sent to prison. The father, on parting with his child, took the matter so deeply to heart that he went home and never again looked up. A deep-seated melancholy took possession of him; he was obliged to give up work; and on the day his little boy was tried, the father breathed his last. The surgeon that attended him says that he died of a broken heart. The boy was discharged.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

THE TWO PICTURES.—No. I.

"Fannie?"

"What?"

"Is dinner ready? I am in a great hurry."

"Yes, that's the first cry always. And you know Biddy is so slow. Now sit down and listen to this new piece of music. There, there, there now! roll still there, there, there. Isn't that delightful, Harry?"

"Yes, Fannie, dearest, but business cannot be delayed."

"Oh—ah! Well, perhaps you expect me to go into the kitchen and help? If you do, I want it distinctly understood that I haven't been brought up to it, and I didn't marry for the sake of—"

There, there, there, thrash, with a vengeance—two! Bingle, bingle, bingle!—dinner is ready at last. Cold and heavy, turned and sour. Husband looks sad, but wife "don't care." Away he goes—perhaps to a saloon—or to stand by the counter till his lunch rests, and he looks more like a corpse than a live man. And for whom? A thing which sits in the parlor and plays on the piano, and gives him to understand that "she wasn't brought up to be a woman," and didn't "marry him" for the sake of "sleeping" to be "his wife."

PICTURE NO. II.

"Fannie?"

"O, pa has come, sis!" And down patter little feet, and pa's neck is encircled with tiny white arms, and his face covered with warm, soft kisses.

"Now, will Fannie bring father a drink? He is tired."

"Yes, sir."

And away trudges the dainty feet, and a minute more, and dimpled hands are handing it. And then the last is carried away, and the mate is set in the corner, and pa looks so happy that Fannie tosses her active little brain to its utmost, to think of something more to do for him.

Yours here.

Twelve. Harry, Nellie. Set up the chairs while I bring a pail of water. Father will be here in a few minutes now. Hurry, trip!

"Fannie?"

"Well, dear?"

"Is dinner ready? I am in a great hurry."

"Just this minute ready, Harry."

"I knew it would be." Clatter, clatter, clatter! Bread good, vegetables good, meat good, all good, but the wife the best of all.

"Fannie, I am in trouble."

"About what, pray tell."

"O, my wife is the great torment of my life. The little minute runs so fast that it keeps me all the time in a sweat to keep up with her. The fact is, she wilts me with her unnumbered little kindnesses. It isn't so very comfortable to feel lost like a speck in a blaze of—of—O, dear, how red our Nellie's cheeks are to-day! Been using some of mother's cosmetic—helping to get dinner, aye?"

Wife laughs, and husband looks pleased in spite of his sorrows. Away he goes to his humble work. But he forgets fatigue, for he is blessed with a loving wife and a happy home.

SWEETHEARTS AND WIVES.

You all are apt to complain (writes a lady addressing her own sex) that lovers, when they become husbands, cannot unite the two characters. You lay this mostly to the men's charge. Do you think it is their fault entirely? I am disposed to say no. I will tell you why. Before marriage, you take the greatest pains to elevate yourselves into goddesses, and desire to be worshipped accordingly. Men, especially those possessing superior intellectual qualities and refinement of nature, favor these views, and treat you as something nearer to heaven than themselves; and is it no sooner has the honeymoon passed than your husbands discover, by imperceptible but sure degrees, that you are (though in somewhat inferior ratio to themselves) of the "earth, earthy." Happy the woman who has the wit to contrive that, in her married life, the same halo shall surround her in her husband's eyes that existed before their union! The thing, in the intimacy of commonplace, every-day life, may be difficult, but it is by no means impossible the achieve. Your own neglect of all these cares and arts by which you won the lover, cause commonly the early estrangement of the husband.

How frequent is the spectacle of neat, scrupulous maidens, who, when they become wives, neglect their personal appearance; and who, if asked why they do so, would answer, "O, I'm married!" showing plainly that their care and trimness formed no part of their natures, but was a trap, a cage spread for the lure and destruction of men. Pretty Mrs. Spider! when your careful, flaxspun web caught the credulous fly, your object being effected, good-by to neatness, good looks, care, and refinement. What more had you in the world to do? Your unfortunate husband finds that the very qualities which most likely influenced his choice have vanished, "like the baseless fabric of a vision," and which, to paraphrase the poet, "leaves but a wreck behind."

THE INSANE.

Dr. Bemis, Superintendent of the Insane Asylum, Worcester Mass., says: "We believe that the number of persons made insane by the influence of religious hopes and fears, has been greatly overstated. The insane mind is frequently occupied by delusions of a religious nature, when it is well known that the cause of its derangement has no connection with feelings or impressions relating to a future state of existence. No richer or wider field than the invisible world can be offered to the gloomy misanthrope, whose mind is already diseased—none his imagination will be more apt to choose to wonder in and dwell on, when the whole origin of his derangement may have been nothing more than the influence of dyspepsia, or some trivial reverse of fortune."

ROBERT OF NORMANDY.

The son of William the Conqueror, was wounded by a poisoned arrow, and the surgeon declared that he could only be cured by having some one extract the poison with his lips. "Let me die, then," said he, "I will never be unjust and cruel enough to suffer any to die by sucking my wound." His wife, however, took advantage of his sleep, applied her lips to the wound, and lost her life in saving that of her husband.

APPETITE FOR TOBACCO.

We give, says the Scientific Artisan, what is highly recommended as a convenient and efficient removal of the appetite for tobacco. Whenever the desire for using it comes on, moisten the mouth with water, and relief is immediately effected. We are assured that if this method is persevered in for a short time the desire for tobacco will entirely cease.

Garden, Farm and Plantation.

Adorning and Beautifying Farmers' Homes.

Should farmers adorn and beautify their homes before they become wealthy? and if so, how may it be done in the easiest manner?

Every farmer who owns the land upon which he resides—every man who owns a house and garden, should strive to make it as beautiful as possible. It cannot be expected that the man of small means can procure the expensive adornments of the rich. His house may be small and plain, but he can beautify and adorn it, nevertheless. I say he can make his home beautiful and attractive, even if he is poor, and I will state the reason why I think he should endeavor to make his home beautiful, and adorn it as much as possible.

When I think of the many reasons why farmers should adorn their homes, I almost wonder that every farmer should not see the necessity of having a pleasant, attractive home. The moral influence of an attractive and beautiful home is great, both upon old and young. It tends to make them love the pure and beautiful, wherever it may be found. Nothing will banish vicious thoughts and feelings from the mind, sooner than to be surrounded by what is attractive and lovely. I have never known but few instances where victims of crime had been favored with pleasant homes, either in childhood or manhood. Everything rough and unattractive makes the man the same. But few persons ever leave a pleasant home for the tavern or dram shop. Notice where you will; the first signs of reform in bad men are usually the adorning of their homes.

Nothing shows the refinement of the farmer more than the adorning of his home. It shows his good taste, and that he is desirous of making all around pleasant and comfortable. Beautiful and attractive houses tend to increase all the good qualities of the occupants, and remove the bad. Beauty and loveliness in nature tend to all that is noble in thought and deed, and make mankind better, both as concerns their own happiness and that of others.

Having shown why farmers should adorn their homes, I will tell how to do it the easiest:

If your house is poor and plain, it makes no difference. If you cannot afford to build a new one, adorn the surroundings of the old one. In odd spells build a neat yard—it will cost almost nothing. Set out some pretty trees in front, and surround the house with them if possible. Fill the yard with flowers; they will cost nothing but the trouble of getting, unless rare varieties are procured; and your wife and children will see to the cultivation—never fear for that. Build a wood house, if you have not one already. Dont deface your door yard with wood piles, old rails, sleds, cartwheels and other rubbish. Remove the hogpen from its conspicuous position near the roadside to the rear of the house, and build a neat frame structure, instead of sticks and slabs—'twill pay for itself in a few years. Have good, neat fences; they look, and are much better. Remove all sticks, stones and stumps from the fields. Build good barns and sheds, if not already built; they will pay for themselves, and look better than the unsightly objects on many a farm. Dont allow loose boards on your buildings—they are very unsightly. Have good yards around your farm buildings. They add greatly to the beauty of the premises. And above all, have the best books of the day, where yourself and family can gain instruction in their leisure hours; and take at least one good agricultural paper. Strive to make your home, farm and family, a pattern one—and in no way can it be done so effectually and easily as by adorning it externally as well as internally.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MARTHA DOWLING, wife of the Rev. DEMPSEY DOWLING, died at her residence in Dale County, Ala., January 15th, 1859, in her seventy-second year. She had been a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for fifty-four years. She was born in North Carolina, and when but three years old, her parents moved to Darlington District, South Carolina, where she lived till over sixteen years old, when she married D. Dowling. Very soon after she attached herself to the Church—she became deeply concerned about the salvation of her soul, and sought God in the pardon of her sins by the exercise of an evangelical faith in Christ Jesus, and found that peace which passeth all understanding. She remained, with her husband, in South Carolina until 1825, and then, with their family, set out for Alabama, and settled in Dale County, and there remained, having the enjoyment of many friends, loving children and obedient servants, until the time above mentioned, when she was taken by the hand of death from her husband's embrace. But thanks be to God! she went in the triumphs of a living and saving faith. The day before she died she appeared to be in better health than usual. After eating a hearty supper, she and her husband and a few of their grandchildren joined in family prayer. A short time after retiring, she aroused her companion by giving signs of alarm, and a few minutes after she sank in the arms of death. As she went she shouted "glory! glory!" and told those present that she would soon be in heaven—that "her room was full of a heavenly light!" She was an affectionate mother, a dutiful and kind wife, a generous mistress. She raised fourteen children, seven sons and seven daughters—left eighty grand-children living and thirty-nine great-grand-children. Two of her sons are local preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and one of her grandsons an itinerant preacher. Nearly all her children and children's children are members of the M. E. Church South. At her burial 109 of her descendants were present.

A. DOWLING.

ENNIS HOOPER departed this life on Sunday, January 23d, 1859, at Pleasant Valley, the residence of his mother, near Baton Rouge. Our beloved little brother was in the fifteenth year of his age, and gave high promise of intellectual distinction. But the fatal scourge, consumption, had been gnawing at his vitals for more than two years, and has at last numbered him amongst its victims. The mind of little Ennis was very mature for one of his years, and he early displayed a noble regard for all the c[illegible]. For a long period he had been a member of th[illegible]urch, and his every aim was to render himself [illegible]mmortal crown which we now sincerely trust he [illegible].

MRS CAROLINA E. ELLIS, wife of G. W. Ellis, Esq., died December 20th, 1858, in Copiah county, Mississippi. She was born in said county and State August 4th 1828. She leaves a husband and six children to mourn her loss. She was a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, but was not satisfied with her acceptance with God. However, during a protracted meeting held at Zion by Rev. V. H. Johnson, in the past Summer, she often went to the altar as a penitent, seeking, with deep humility and anguish of soul, for brighter manifestations of God's love. In a subsequent conversation with her husband, she confessed that she had experienced great relief from the weight of sin. She seemed afterwards to feel a deeper interest in the devotions of the domestic altar. Her friends cherish the hope with confidence that if faithful until death, they will meet her in heaven, where sorrow and death and parting are felt and feared no more.

W. WAINSWORTH.

SISTER O. BEALL, wife of W. D. Beall, and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Stanfill, died on 19th December, at the residence of Mrs. Hampton, in Holmes county, Mississippi; in which neighborhood she had been reared and lived in, till her demise. She embraced religion some five years since, in the Church at Emory; and united herself to the M. E. Church at that place, continuing a consistent member until called to that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Sister B.'s last hour was filled with glory. She appealed to her husband to meet her in heaven; and to fear their children for the Lord; to take her Testament and read it to them. She requested her friends to read the 23d Psalm, and to sing.

H. W.

CHARLES M. GODBOLD was born in Wilcox county, Alabama, August 31st, 1837, and died at the residence of his mother, in that State, 20th December, 1858. His parents had him baptized in infancy; and he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South, July 6, 1856; shortly after which he made a profession of religion. The Church has lost one of its most promising young members, and his mother a dutiful son. We sorrow not as those without hope. His conversation was in heaven. After praying with his friends and relatives, he told them not to weep for him, for he was going home.

ANSON WEST.

CHLOE SIMMONS died January 18th, 1859, after a protracted illness, aged 68 years. She was the daughter of David Mills, who emigrated to this State in 1812. She was born in 1790, and married John Simmons in 1825, with whom she lived many years, filling the responsible station of wife and mother. Sister Simmons was for many years a member of the Methodist Church, and in her death she bore testimony to the reality of her religion, dying in great peace in the arms of Jesus. To all my questions she gave satisfactory answers. Being in her perfect senses, she was willing to suffer the will of her heavenly master; expressing a desire to depart and be with Christ.

Rapides Parish, La. R. T. PARISH.

MRS. MARY E. STORK, daughter of Josiah and Elizabeth Garlington, was born in Wilcox County, Ala., the 28th of October, 1827, and died December 1st, 1858. She joined the M. E. Church South in 1842, and from that time till her death, she lived in the enjoyment of religion. She died as she had lived, and on her death bed she told her friends that Heaven was here, and with confidence she went to the spirit land. She has left a husband and two little ones behind.

ANSON WEST.

RALPH, infant son of B. G. and M. H. Humphreys, died on 29th ultimo, on Roebuck Lake, Sunflower county, Mississippi, adding another cherub to the heavenly host; and making another tie to bind the parents to heaven.

AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST.

There is something peculiarly interesting in the history of Jesus Christ—in every word he spake and in every act he performed. His words intrinsically are of priceless worth. But there is something so apposite and appropriate in many of his sayings to the circumstances under which they were said, that we should always associate them together. Then, indeed, they seem like apples of gold in pictures of silver." The incident to which we now refer, occurred near the end of his earthly mission. Jesus had been visiting the scenes of his childhood and the friends of his youth. The Jewish feast of the Passover approaching, he set his face to go to Jerusalem, apparently to participate in its solemnities—really to consummate his earthly mission, by offering up himself as the Passover for all nations. Samaria intervening between Galilee and Jerusalem, a portion of travel necessarily be passed through. While in that part of their journey night overtook them. Two of his disciples were sent forward to a village to procure entertainment for Jesus and his followers. Under the influence of the accursed spirit of religious intolerance, the villagers rejected their petition, because they were going to Jerusalem. Perhaps they were the more prompted to this refusal, because they were not only going to Jerusalem, but to a religious festival there. And it may have added still to their resentment, because Jesus had taught sometime before in the village of Sychar, (a village of Samaria,) that salvation cometh of the Jews. Certain it is, the weary travelers are refused lodging. Covered with dust, oppressed with heat, fatigued with travel, enfeebled by hunger, Jesus and his disciples continue their journey. What traveler, thus treated, has been free from resentment. Bitter feelings possess the sons of the disciples, and bitter words fall from their lips. The sons of Zebedee are especially indignant. John—we do not know so much about James—was one of those characters who can see no fault in a friend, nor virtue in a foe. He scarcely in all his gospel mentions the name of Judas without expressing his detestation of the character. "Wilt thou," they say, "that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume them, even as Elias did?"

It seems strange that, after having been three years with Jesus, taught by his words and his example, in public and in private, they should still so mistake his mission and its spirit. Yet such is poor human nature! Even slow, under the most favorable circumstances, in the attainment of knowledge and of grace. But while Jesus rebuked them, still he was a man—wearied in body, depressed in mind—well he might be sorrowful! He, the Lord of Glory! the author and preserver of all life! the bestower of all good upon those who gave him no place of rest! is rudely turned away. His own disciples, after all the labor bestowed upon them, are still so ignorant. The dreadful scenes but just before him, and which He foreknew so well, are crushing his human soul. No wonder, if in such an hour, expressions savoring of sadness, should escape him.

The weary, houseless travellers still pursue their way. The sun has gone down far over the waters of the Mediterranean. His last ray has died away from the western sky. One by one the stars have looked out upon their Creator in his deep humiliation, until all their hosts are marshelled in the wide and deep canopy above. Night has thrown his dusky mantle around the entire horizon. The fox, slipping from his hole ready to enter upon his night's depredations, barks amid the tangled copse. The bird, seeking late his covert, rushes by on fluttering wing. And the man of Nazareth, pressed with fatigue and hunger and grief and care, groans heavily. A disciple ventures to speak an encouraging word. I wish I knew which disciple that was—for I love him. The expression is somewhat similar to that of Peter: "Though I should die with thee, yet will not I deny thee." But it was not the same spirit. It was not the spirit of self-reliant courage. I do not think it was Peter, or James, or John. "Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." I thought I would paraphrase these words; but I would prefer for the reader to do it for himself. Call up the circumstances under which they were said, and what a world of kindness and sympathy and friendship do they express. Who does not love that disciple? It was then that Jesus spake the memorable words: "Foxes have holes and birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head." Luke, 9, 48. ANNOTATOR.

REV. QUICKLY STIR-EM-UP.—By RAG-PICKER.

The subject of this sketch was born in the populous city of Ignorance, in the State of Read-nought. His parents, though a good-meaning, simple-minded folks, were firm believers in dreams, omens etc.; and a Dream-book, Bible, and Hymn-book, constituted their whole library. They were counted oracles among persons of the same class, and generally looked upon, by others, as good, but credulous sort of people. Of course they instilled these principles into the mind of young Quickly; in whom, as he grew in age, they developed themselves in a more striking manner. Indeed he very much neglected the plain teachings of the Bible, following in preference the wild visions of his sleeping hours.

One night old Mrs. S. having eaten a very hearty supper and sought the sweet restorer of tired nature, dreamed she saw her son exhorting a large congregation to repentance, and that at the same time a radiant angel approaching said to her, "Your son must preach." With this she awoke, and calling aloud for Quickly, related to him her dream, and warned him to outer at once upon his labor. This made so deep an impression upon his mind, that before day, he too, had been favored with a similar vision.

This, by them, was deemed a sufficient evidence of a call to the ministry; and accordingly all hands were soon busily engaged in preparing for his departure. License was readily obtained, for old Mrs. S. was owner of considerable property, and a refusal by the Church would have been suicide to its interests.

At his first appointment a goodly number were in attendance, most of whom, it must be confessed, went more through curiosity than anything else. However, as Quickly had a loud voice, and was not at all diffident, they were led to believe that there was a good deal of "come out" in him. But we will not follow him as a beginner, but will enquire of him about the middle of his second year. Up to this time he had rapidly progressed in public favor, and now he often with delight beheld his name in notices of meetings as a valuable and beloved assistant. And not unfrequently he had the pleasure of signing similar notices himself, in which he returned the compliments of his brethren. Indeed so useful was he now considered, that no meeting could be held, with much hope of success, unless he was present; and in the general effort to secure his services, many of less pretension were entirely overlooked. Many there were who poured praise into his ear, and if any disapproved of his matter or manner, they were wise enough to say nothing publicly. It is true that he had not paid much attention to grammar, nor had he stored his mind with much of that knowledge usually thought indispensable to preachers; but then it must be borne in mind that his style did not require much learning, and that he believed all human knowledge calculated to injure the cause of religion. He bent the energies of his mighty mind to the task of alarming the consciences of his audiences, and therefore could draw from his own experience or imagination keen arrows of terror for the hearts of the impenitent. When he wished to frighten a congregation he always selected the night for that purpose; because, he said, darkness lent additional terror to descriptions of hell-fire. It was sometimes thought that day-light removed these convictions. Besides this he would sometimes relate a wonderful dream about Heaven—and christians (and sinners) would tremble under the excitement of joyful hope; some, indeed, were led to think of Heaven, that they too might have such delightful dreams. So much, then, being accomplished by him, the insignificant faults that sometimes appeared, were not considered as detrimental to the cause of religion.

We now skip two or three years in brother Quickly's history, and reach a point where we are reminded of the old saying, "A new broom sweeps clean." Here we find a change has come over the sky above the reverend gentleman, and that it has greatly affected his mind. We left him surrounded by admirers, the lion of every "big meeting," holding undisputed influence over his friends and acquaintances; but we now find him neglected by ministers and people, cast down, and almost destroyed. It happened that some of the preachers who followed him on his works, found a great deal of trouble that they did not expect. They tried in vain to get the church-books—none had been kept; they enquired after the Sunday-schools—they had died out; the day for prayer-meetings was unknown—they had not been kept up; books and religious papers were hard to find, though an occasional "Scenes beyond the Grave" was found. Added to this, the members were quite ignorant of the doctrines of the Church, and did not knew that they were expected to grow daily in the love and knowledge of God. There were some who seemed to rise above this general ignorance, but they were of the less important ones who had been but little noticed by Brother S.

This condition of the Church gave them considerable uneasiness, and they began to enquire of each other, and then to complain; and ere long they concluded that Bro. Stir-em-up had much thunder but no lightning about his sermons—that he excited but did not feed his flock. They now thought of his non-improvement in knowledge; and called to mind that his sermons, when divested of noise and imagery, were not even dry skeletons of a form.

From this, commenced neglect of his talents; which increased, until it left him as we found him last. As might be expected, he fretted greatly under this plain disrespect; and having built upon a sandy foundation, the pretentious fabric fell under the weight and fury of the storm. He remained in the ranks long enough to be convinced that he was not appreciated; and then deserted to the enemy, carrying no trumpet before him to sound the fame of his exploits. Thus ended the ministerial career of one who entered the holy office without that authority recognized by the Bible; and having entered, neglected that preparation for, and cultivation of the field confided to him, so earnestly enjoined by the scriptures.

He has left a few cousins behind, but it is thought by many that they will profit by his inglorious failure, learn to rely upon study, prayer, and the Spirit of God; and by due attention to these, be the means of many revivals whose fruit shall be gathered for years hence. So mote it be.

FATHER CHINIQUY.

It is to be doubted if many of your readers are fully aware of the importance of the late secessions from the Romish Church in Illinois, under the lead of the priest above named. He having been a second Father Matthew among the French Canadians, had obtained more than 200,000 pledges of abstinence from intoxicating drinks. Many of these Canadian Romanists afterwards moved to Illinois; and he with them. He commenced a settlement in a place which he called St. Anne; and gathered around him a population of 10,000. He erected a house for himself, and a Church; and then he began to feel the pressure of the powers above him.

He first came in collision with his bishop in Chicago. A similar settlement of Canadians had there erected a Church and parsonage for themselves. The bishop demanded it, that he might sell it to the Irish, and pocket the money. They sent for Father Chiniquy to advocate their cause. But in vain. Under threats of excommunication the bishop obtained the titles, and there was no redress. Next, the bishop went to St. Anne, and made a similar demand for the property, on which, besides his personal labors, Chiniquy had spent $6000 of his own money. The bishop claimed that a priest had no right to have property. The bishop excommunicated the priest and his whole flock. Soon after this the bishop was removed, and attempts were made to get redress from his successor. In his final interview with this bishop the priest was told that he must submit to the will of the bishop, without asking reasons.

Father Chiniquy replied nobody, "My lord, there is but one God in heaven or on the earth, and to him alone will I make such an act of submission. Excommunicate me if you think proper."

Taking his leave he went to his room and fell upon his knees, and poured out his cries and tears unto God. He felt that he was an outcast, and friendless among men, but he had hope in God. He then opened the Bible, which was his constant companion, and the first verse his eye fell upon was, 1 Cor. 7: 23, "Ye are bought with a price; be ye not the servants of men." In a moment he saw that he had been the slave of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and that it was a monstrous usurpation. That the Word of God emancipated him from his bondage and from that moment he was a freeman in Christ.

Having assembled his people, he related all that took place in the interview between him and the bishop. "And now," said he, "if you believe I have done wrong in thus obeying God rather than man, in following the dictates of my own conscience, and the directions of the Bible, instead of submitting unconditionally to the will of the bishop, then manifest it by rising up, and I will be your pastor no longer." No one arose.

"Well, then," he continued, "if you think I have done right in making the Bible my only infallible guide, and rule of faith and practice; and if you will adopt it for your guide and rule of life, and unite with me in all Scriptural efforts to do good, do you manifest it by rising up." Immediately the whole congregation were upon their feet, and there they covenanted with God and their pastor to be Bible Christians, and to walk together as such in Church relations.

A visit from the bishop was the next thing to be expected. He came with a great display, and retinue of priests.

A stage had been erected for his accommodation, and upon it Father Chiniquy sat down by his side. The bishop had selected every epithet he could find in the French dictionary, with which to express his bitterness and wrath, and to denounce the curse of God first upon the congregation, and then upon their pastor. When he had expended a full half hour in this tirade of false accusation and malignant cursing, during which time it was with the greatest difficulty that the people could be restrained from violence, he ceased, and then Father Chiniquy rose, and meekly replied, as he (the bishop) had said so much against that congregation and himself, he would surely hear a few words in reply.

"Not a word, sir," said the bishop. "Not a word, sir—sit down—not a word."

At this point the people could be restrained no longer. Cries, "pull him down," "tear him to pieces," "kill him on the spot," were heard from every part of the assembly of 4000 people, all perfectly mad with rage. But the cries of the pastor to "let him go off uninjured, return him good for evil, blessing for cursing," at length prevailed, and aided by the sheriff, whose presence the pastor of St. Anne had wisely secured for the occasion, the miserable bishop and his priests escaped the violence of a mob.

Thus have 10,000 of our French Canadien population in this State shaken off the yoke and chains of priestly despotism, and proved themselves worthy to be ranked with American freemen and Protestant Christians. True, they have not identified themselves with any particular denomination among us. But they are called Protestants by the Romanists and by their neighbors. And they say if taking the Word of God as their rule of life, believing what it teaches and practicing what it requires, makes them Protestants, then they are Protestants. If renouncing the Pope and hierarchy of Rome, and submitting in all things to Jesus Christ as their only Savior, makes them Protestants, then they are Protestants, for they rely upon him alone. Like the Bereans they are now searching the Scriptures daily. Bible truths come to their minds with a freshness and power of which one can hardly conceive, and the grace of God is rapidly transforming them into truly spiritual and happy Christians.

THE PRESIDENT'S EXPENSES.

A correspondent of the Boston Courier communicates information about the President's mansion and expenses that will be interesting to our readers. He says:

"The truth is, that up to the time of Mr. Polk, the White House was not decently furnished. Congress then made an appropriation, which, being judiciously expended, improved things somewhat. After that, no considerable appropriation was made till the year 1853, when some fifty thousand dollars were appropriated for heating, ventilating, painting, enlarging, and refurnishing the house. The responsibility of applying this appropriation to the purpose intended by Congress was devolved on Captain Lee, then of the Topographical Corps of the Army, and we think the money was expended to the satisfaction of everybody. For the first time, the house was made comfortable to live in. The appliances for warming the house by hot water, and which were furnished by Wulworth & Nason, of your city, cost, it is said, more than ten thousand dollars, including the expense of putting up. The furniture of the house is substantially the same, carpets and all, as was purchased by Captain Lee in 1853.

The silver in the house, I am told, is mostly that bought in Paris during the administration of Mr. Monroe. There are but two or three pictures in the house. One in the Red Room, a portrait of Washington, which was cut from the frame and secured by Mrs. Madison when Washington was occupied by the British during the war of 1812. Another, in the President's office, a portrait of Bolivar, the South American patriot. There are no household ornaments about the house, except vases scattered here and there on mantels, and articles brought from Japan by Commodore Perry. The White House, in a word, is furnished more like a first-class hotel than a first-class private residence. There are articles of use in abundance rich and massive, but no articles of art or adornment.

But to return to our question. What does it cost the President each year to keep up the Executive mansion?

First, the President receives twenty-five thousand dollars salary. Next, he receives a house, garden and stables free of expense. The house is furnished and the garden cultivated by the Government. Every article of furniture necessary is furnished by the United States. The government also lights and heats the house. It pays for a steward to take care of the public property, and a fireman, and for no other domestic servants. The Executive office is in the Executive mansion, and for the former, the government provides a private secretary, clerks to the secretary, two messengers and a porter. For all domestic servants, however, except steward and fireman, the President must pay out of his own pocket. He must pay for his cooks, his butler, his table-servants, his female servants, his coachman and groome, etc., as any other person does who employs such a retinue of servants. He supplies his table, with the exception of garden vegetables, as any other private citizen does, by his own purse. So with his stables. In short, the only things furnished by government, are house and furniture, fuel and lights, steward and fireman, garden vegetables and flowers. All else is matter of private expense.

With these items as basis of calculation, any gentleman who keeps eighteen or more servants of both sexes, who keeps a stable filled with horses, as does Mr. Buchanan, who dines persons, besides his own family, every day, and once a week gives a dinner to forty invited guests, can form some notion how much, out of twenty-five thousand dollars, remains at the end of the year.

AMERICA VISITED FROM AFRICA BEFORE COLUMBUS.

Many years ago, in opening a mound or ancient burial place on Grave Creek, Virginia, an oval stone was found, with three lines of inscription in some written language. W. B. Hodgson, Esq., of Savannah, for a while Consul of the United States in Barbary, North Africa, and now of the city of New York, assigned it to a Numidian origin in his Notes on "North Africa," and said:

"Near one of the skeletons in the upper vault was found the stone in question, with three lines of alphabetic characters. It is of an oval form, three-fourths of an inch thick, and its material is a fine sandstone. This is the only example, I believe, of ancient alphabetic inscription in North Africa. The inscriptions on the Dighton rock and the pictorial writing of Mexico and Yucatan are symbolic, not alphabetic. The history of this trilinear lapidary inscription I had at first regarded as apocryphal. Mr. Schoolcraft has, however, confirmed it, and described the stone. Who was the gorgeous chieftain, whose engraved signet was found by his side? Did he come from the Canary Islands, where the Numidian characters and language prevailed?: Shall we recur to the lost Atlantis? Could any of the Carthagenian or African vessels, which usually visited the 'Fortunate' or Canary islands, have been carried to the New World? The peopling of America is quite as likely to be due to Africa and Europe as to Asia. History preserves the memory of the circumnavigation of Africa by several expeditions. The Periplus of Hunno, the Carthugenian, was the subject of a written narrative. With these historical indications that the Atlantic was in early ages navigated by Mediterranean vessels, I find no difficulty in supposing the stone in question to have been brought thence."

THE AROOSTOOK REGION.

They call it a county in Maine—but their countries are like Irish miles, of enormous proportions. Aroostook extending about 120 miles in one direction by 45 in the other, comprises an area considerably greater than the whole State of Connecticut. It is a rolling country, quite free from stones, the highest elevations not being in chains, but mostly isolated. It is well wooded, with the maple predominating among the hard woods, and the cedar growing in the swamps, all of which are easily susceptible of draining. The soil, composed of decomposed limestone, slate, and vegetable matter, is a deep loam, resting generally on a bed of gravel seven or eight feet beneath the surface. Its extraordinary fertility was demonstrated by Dr. Charles T. Jackson, in his geological survey of the State, many years ago. His scientific analysis has been amply confirmed by subsequent harvests. In 1849, when the county contained but one-fiftieth of the population of the State, it raised 87,000 bushels of wheat, while the remainder of the State harvest but 18,000 bushels. All agricultural products of our latitude grow equally well; while as a grazing region it is pronounced equal to any part of the State of New York.

But the climate? says some thoughtless reader, who imagines that the whole of the continent north of us is unfit for comfortable residence. The climate of Aroostook is pre-eminently healthy—and that is the great consideration. But to be more explicit, the region is far milder than we might expect from the latitude. According to Humboldt, a perpendicular ascension of two hundred and fifty feet gives an increase of cold equal to going seventy miles directly North. Now, Houlton, in the midst of the Aroostook region, is only three hundred feet above the level of the sea—a much less elevation than is usually found at the same distance inland. Moosehead Lake, for instance, which is lower in latitude, is nine hundred feet above the sea level. The fact is, Aroostook belongs, not so much to our New England conformation of surface, as to the valley of the St. John and New Brunswick—a section of agricultural richness and climatic genuility of which our citizens ordinarily have no conception. It is a limestone region, which are always warmer than those of the granite formation. The snow is heavy, which prevents the ground freezing to any depth, and it goes off with marvellous rapidity. A practical farmer, who has resided in Aroostook fifteen years, states that he has known the snow to be several feet deep one week, and before the end of the next his fields were plowed, planted and sowed, and the dust flying as the harrow passed over the grounds. This peculiarity, which belongs to the St. John valley, has never been satisfactorily explained, but the fact is well known. A most disagreeable Spring is thus avoided, and vegetation takes such an early start that there is no trouble from the frosts of early autumn.

GUSTAVUS VASA.

The father of Gustavus Vasa and many of his friends and kinsmen had fallen in a massacre. His mother and several of the most illustrious ladies were carried prisoners to Copenhagen, and treated with every indignity. On his own head a high price was set, and he was safe nowhere. He fled into Dalecarlia, a wild region of mines and mountains, inhabited by the most daring and independent race of Sweden. He hoped to rouse them to the rescue of their country; but that great bloody deed, and Christian's spies everywhere, had thoroughly unmanned even these hardy men. On his journey, his servant made off with his clothes and effects, and Gustavus pursued him till his horse fell under him—but in vain. Once more disguised as a peasant, he went on through sterile mountains, unpeopled heaths and forests, till he reached Fahlun, with its blazing fires, rolling smoke, and sooty copper works. Here he labored for some time in the mines; but his uneasy mind drove him on again. He engaged as a thresher at a farm; but there the fineness of his linen and his manners did not escape a sharp-eyed man.

The master, informed of this, soon recognized Gustavus, a fellow-student at Upsala, and filled with terror, entreated him to plunge deeper into the mountains, and leave him and his family in safety. He next betook himself to the castle of a nobleman, who received him most affectionately, making himself sure of the offered reward. He mounted and rode off to the next military station, and was soon back again with twenty troopers. But the bird was flown, through a hint from the more noble wife who furnished him with a horse and sledge for his escape. He sought refuge at the door of a monastery, founded by his ancestors, but the monks shut the door in his face. His next asylum was with a worthy clergyman, but here the Philistines were upon him again, for the Danish soldiery were hunting everywhere. He was again rescued by the presence of mind of the lady who, on the entrance of the troopers into the house, where Gustavus was sitting with the other farm men, she gave him a cuff on the ear, and sent him off on pretense of some neglected errand.

His host then concealed him under a load of straw, and drove him towards a place of security; but the soldiers met them on the way, examined the load of straw, ran their swords through it in different directions, and at one pass pierced the leg of Gustavus. He bore the wound without stirring, and was saved; but the blood soon running through the cart, and leaving a track on the snow, his ingenious host cut a wound in his horse's foot, and when the bloody track was remarked, showed that as the cause. Through such dangers and discouragements Gustavus escaped, finally roused the men of Dalecarlia, expelled the Danes, and was unanimously elected King. He became one of the noblest Kings that ever reigned; completed the Reformation in Sweden, and remains one of the world's great names. [Westminster Review.

REVOLUTIONARY PIETY.

Among the decidedly religious Members of Congress in 1777, Richard Henry Lee, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, from Virginia, is named. On the capture of Burgoyne, a proclamation for a general thanksgiving was ordered, and R. H. Lee, Dr. Witherspoon, and Samuel Adams—the two latter known as orthodox Christians—were appointed to prepare it. Their draft is extant in the Journal as follows:

"Nov. 1st, 1777. Done in Congress.

"For as much as it is the indispensable duty of all men to adore the superintending Providence of Almighty God; to acknowledge with gratitude, their obligations to him for benefits received, and to implore such further blessing as they stand in need of; and it having pleased him, in his abundant Mercy, not only to continue to us the innumerable bounties of his common Providence, but also to smile upon us in the prosecution of a just and necessary war for the independence and establishment of our inalienable rights and liberties, particularly in that he hath been pleased, in so great a measure, to prosper the means used for the support of our arms, and to crown them with the most signal success: It is therefore recommended to the Legislative and Executive powers of these States, to set apart Thursday, the 18th day of December next, for solemn thanksgiving and praise; that, with one heart and one voice, the people may express the feelings of their hearts, and consecrate themselves to the service of their Divine Benefactor; and, together with their sincere acknowledgments and offerings, they may join the penitent confession of their manifold sins, whereby they have forfeited every favor, and their humble and earnest supplication, that it may please God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, mercifully to forgive and blot them out of remembrance; that it may please him graciously to afford his blessings on the government of these States respectively, and to prosper the public council of the whole; to inspire our commanders both by sea and land, and all under them, with that wisdom and fortitude which may render them fit instruments, under the Providence of Almighty God, to secure for these United States the greatest of all blessings, independence and peace; that it may please Him to prosper the trade and manufactures of the people, and the labors of the husbandman, that our land may yield its increase; to take schools and seminaries of education, so necessary for the cultivation of the principles of true liberty, virtue and piety, under his nurturing hand; and to prosper the means of religion, for the promotion and enlargement of that kingdom which consisteth 'in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.'"

JOHN KNOX'S CALL.

Knox's call to the ministry is thus related by McCrie: These persons were so pleased with Knox's talents, and his manner of teaching his pupils, that they urged him strongly to preach in public, and to become colleague to Rough. But he resisted all their solicitations, assigning as his reason, that he did not consider himself as having a call to this employment, and he would not be guilty of intrusion. They did not, however, desist from their purpose; but, having consulted with their brethren, came to a resolution, without his knowledge, that a call should be publickly given him, in the name of the whole, to become one of their ministers.

Accordingly, on a day fixed for the purpose, Rough preached a sermon on the election of ministers, in which he declared the power which any congregation, however small, had over any one in whom they perceived gifts suited to the office: and how dangerous it was for such a person to reject the call of those who desire instruction. The sermon being concluded, the preacher turned to Knox, who was present, and addressed him in these words: "Brother, you shall not be offended, although I speak unto you that which I have in charge, even from all those here present, which is this: In the name of God and of his Son Jesus Christ, and in the name of all that presently call you by my mouth, I charge you that you refuse not this holy vocation; but as you tender [regard] the glory of God, the increase of Christ's kingdom, the edification of your brethren, and the comfort of me, whom you understand well enough to be oppressed with the multitude of labors, that you take the public office and charge of preaching, even as you look to avoid God's heavy displeasure, and desire that he shall multiply his graces unto you." Then addressing himself to the congregation, he said: "Was not this your charge unto me, and do ye not approve this vocation?" They all answered, "It was, and we approve it."

Overwhelmed by this unexpected and solemn charge, Knox, after an ineffectual attempt to address the audience, burst into tears, rushed out of the assembly, and shut himself up in his chamber. His countenance and behaviour, from that day till the day he was compelled to present himself in the public place of preaching, did sufficiently declare the grief and trouble of his heart, for no man saw any sign of mirth from him for many days together.

GREAT PUBLISHING HOUSES.

The New York Albion gives an interesting account of the origin and growth of the Publishing House of the Appletons, Broadway, New York. More than 30 years ago, Mr. Daniel Appleton, the father of the present gentleman who leads the firm, began his career by publishing a little book called "Daily Crumbs," at a small store in Exchange street, opposite the post office. "Daily Crumbs" was followed by "Gospel Seeds," and this by a few other religious publications. The store was removed to Clinton Hall, afterward to 200 Broadway, then about 22 feet wide by 50 deep. Here many scientific, literary and miscellaneous works were issued, and many of them were very profitable. Of Webster's "Speller" more than one million per annum have been sold, and one press was kept constantly at work the year round at his book. They have now one of the most elegant stands in Broadway, doing a vast business, the whole conducted by a most admirable system. As they began with "Daily Crumbs," so now the last work in press is the New American Encyclopedia, for the compilation of which about 200 persons, literary men, are employed, of which more than 10,000 copies are sold, at a cost to the people of the United States of more than $500,000.

We believe the first book that the Harpers began with was "Allaine's Alarm" and Baxter's Call." James Harper related to us some years ago their origin in business, when we bought a bill of books, crossed over to Brooklyn, and returned and found the vast House of the Harpers was in ruins by fire. The Methodist Book Concern published their first book in 1789. It was "A Kempis." The same year also they published the Arminian Magazine, the Hymn Book, Saint's Rest, and Primitive Physic. But the total of publications now issuing from the Methodist press in New York, is 20,000 per day, including all grades, from a Tract worth one cent to a book worth $50. "Tall oaks from little acorns grow."

And the Southern Methodist Publishing-house at Nashville, for the time it has been in operation, (hardly four years) has progressed at a still more rapid rate.

LOTTERIES—THEIR CHANCES.

A pains-taking writer in the Augusta (Georgia) Chronicle and Sentinal, on public grounds, has undertaken to investigate the "magnificent schemes" which are daily thrust before the public. He has undertaken to examine some of them in detail, and the following are his deductions: There are 5510 prizes, of which 462 are direct, 28 approximate, and 5000 contingent. There are 50,000 numbers. The chance of drawing a direct prize is 462 to 50,000, or as one to one hundred and three. Taking the approximate with these, the chance is 510 to 50,000, or as one to ninety-eight. The chance of drawing a twenty dollar prize is one to ten. The odds it will be seen, are enormous.

But a further inspection will make the illustration of the subject even more impressive. The 50,000 numbers are the representatives of $500,000. Now, the prizes to be drawn make $320,000, and if any one were to buy all the tickets he would lose by the operation the handsome of $180,000. Besides, all the tickets are not sold. The proprietors have still further advantages. Their side of the game is a sure one, and where they draw one of these lotteries every week, were they to sell all the tickets, nine millions of dollars would annually fall into the hands of the managers.

HINDOOISM IN BOSTON.

Recently, in a speech before the Young Men's Christian Association in New York, Rev. Mr. Scudder, missionary in India, endeavored to impress upon the young men the necessity of hearty and earnest labor to counteract the pantheistic tendency of the age. It is infused into books, pamphlets and newspapers, and needs constant watching. Mr. Scudder said he had been laboring against Pantheism, in the shape of Hindooism, for the last fourteen years. The home of the American Pantheist is in Boston, and they, if we follow their lead, will take us back to the worship of those numberless gods of the Hindoos. Mr. Scudder said he could point to the original Sanscrit stanzas from which those celebrated ones, entitled "Brahma," by Emerson, were taken.

A JEWISH MARRIAGE.

Mr. Editor: A few days ago I witnessed a Jewish marriage in the Synagogue on Carondelet street, in this city; a brief description of it may not be uninteresting to such of your readers as live where there are but few Israelites and no Synagogues.

The ceremony was to be performed at 8 P. M. The windows were darkened and the gas lit. A numerous audience of Jews and Gentiles were assembled; the Jewish people treating us with great courtesy, in making way and providing seats for us.

Soon after the time appointed, four young men, dressed in black, with white gloves and their hats on, came in and went to the front of the altar, to the canopy used on such occasions made of crimson damask, fringed with gold, and tassels of silk; it was about seven feet square, and sustained by four staffs, like flag-staffs—these the young men set on the floor and sustained in an upright position. The priest then came down from the altar, where he had been waiting the arrival of the bridal-party, (with his hat and robe on) and took his stand under the edge of the canopy, with his back to the altar. Then the bride, with one bridemaid, and her family, came in and stood to the right of the priest, under the edge of the canopy; then the bridegroom with one attendant came and took his stand under the edge of the canopy, to the left of the priest and facing the bride—wearing their hats, as did all the Israelites in the house. Then—as well as I could hear—the priest uttered the vows, which the parties took. Then, the attendant, (I do not know his technical name) handed the priest a cup of wine, which he held in his hand and chanted a hymn in Hebrew, then gave the cup to the bridegroom, and then to the bride. The [illegible] put the marriage-ring upon the finger of the bride. Then another cup, or rather, thin glass goblet of wine was handed to the priest. One of these goblets contains (so I learned) sweet wine, the other bitter—to indicate the mingled state of married life—both sweet and bitter.

The priest made a considerable address, perhaps eight or ten minutes, on the marriage state. Telling the parties in substance, that they were identified in fortune, in character, in social relations, and in happiness. He urged them to cherish and keep alive their youthful love; that a thousand occasions would arise for reciprocal courtesies and means of making each other happy. That they should never be longer absent from each other than duty demanded, lest they should grow indifferent, and learn to be independent of each other. Lastly, that they should pray for each other, and help each other to eternal salvation.

After chanting another hymn in Hebrew, he gave each of them the wine; the remainder was then poured into another goblet and the empty glass laid upon the floor, when the bridegroom put his foot upon it and crushed it to atoms—signifying that the ties that bound her to others were broken, and that as long as that glass remained broken she would never be united to another. Then the bridal-vail was thrown aside from the bride's face and the young and happy husband imprinted the nuptial kiss. A scene of kissing and congratulation followed, much as at our weddings, and which closed the ceremonies.

PULPIT PROPRIETY.

Mr. Editor: A number of years ago—at the close of my second year in the Itinerant Ministry—I preached for the last time at one of my Circuit-appointments. While standing in the churchyard just before service, I was introduced to the Rev. Mr. D. of a sister church. On concluding my discourse, (there was considerable emotion in the audience,) I requested Rev. Mr. D. to close the service for me. He walked up into the pulpit, and remarked (for he was an itinerant lecturer on astronomy, and exhibited the motions of the heavenly bodies by means of an orrery,) that he would lecture that evening in the village near by, on the science of astronomy; that adults would be admitted for fifty cents, and children and servants for twenty-five cents. That astronomy was the sublimest of sciences; that an intelligent contemplation of the vastitude of creation, the harmony and order of its movements—led to devotion, and that an "undevout astronomer is mad;" and that the serious consideration of this sublime subject could not fail to do us religious good—uplifting the mind, and well-preparing us for that everlasting career of intellectual progress, upon which we are so soon to enter. "In conclusion, my hearers, I would repeat, that I will lecture at the village at half past seven P. M. Admittance fifty cents, children and servants half price. Let us pray."

Of a piece with the above is the reading of notices at church and camp-ground, from the pulpit—that "Squire Jones' valuable yoke of oxen have strayed, and any information concerning them will be thankfully received." Or, that "Mr. Smith's sorrel filly, with a blaze face and pestle tail, had runaway ten days since; and that five dollars reward is offered for her safe return."

I hope these desecrations of the pulpit are passing away, and that we are learning to feel more reverence for the solemnities of God's worship. CLERICUS.

A WORLD'S MISSIONARY CONVENTION.

The Rev. Dr. Wentworth, a well-known missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, now laboring in China, in a letter to the News of the Churches, calls very earnestly for a general convention of friends and directors of missions, from all parts of the world to devise ways and means for the furtherance of the gospel in India and China at the present juncture. He expresses his conviction that the late important changes in the relations of those countries to the rest of the world, clearly make it the duty of Protestant Christendom "to call a delegated convention of all the missionary societies in Europe and America, and map out the eighteen provinces of China and the adjacent islands for immediate occupancy. I say map out, because I believe it will better secure the occupancy of the entire territory. Let the London Missionary Society choose, or have assigned to it, its province or field of labor, the Church Missionary Society have another, the American Board another, the Wesleyans another, the Methodist Episcopal Church one, the M. E. Church South another, the Presbyterians another, and so on till all are allotted, all manned, and all under Christian culture. India demands similar treatment."

THE LATE REV. THOMAS CURTIS, D.D.

The Charleston Mercury learns that the Rev. Thomas Curtis, D.D., lost on the North Carolina, recently destroyed by fire between Norfolk and Baltimore, was a native of England, where early in life he attained a prominent position as a scholar and theologian. At one time he was connected with the London Eclectic Review, for which he reported the Parliamentary debates. In 1838 he came South to Georgia. In 1841, he was called to the pastorate of the Wentworth-street Baptist Church, Charleston, to succeed J. C. Furman. In this relation he remained until 1845, when he established the Female High School at Limestone Springs, Spartanburg District, S. C., at the head of which he was (a most successful instructor) at the time of his dreadful death. Dr. Curtis had reached the advanced age of nearly eighty years, and beloved by all who knew him.

THE WORLD'S THREE BOOKS.

The Bible, Shakspeare and Pilgrim's Progress, says Henry Ward Beecher, are the three books most read and most felt in the English language, and there seems as little likelihood that the last two will go out of print as the first and greatest. Perhaps there are no three books in the language so little understood or so inadequately appreciated; no three about which there are such varieties of opinion, and such conflicting interpretations. And yet each originally and intrinsically most simple, comprehensive, natural, and addressed [illegible] human understanding, and the universal heart. The most noted English critic has said, there are not three books in the world to compare with this immortal trio.

Mr. Adams and the Bible.—In a letter to his son in 1811, John Q. Adams says: "I have for many years made it a practice to read through the Bible once a year. My custom is to read four or five chapters every morning, immediately after rising from my bed. It employs about an hour of my time, and seems to me the most suitable manner of beginning the day. In what light soever we regard the Bible, whether with reference to revelation, to history or to morality, it is an invaluable and inexhaustible mine of knowledge and virtue."

John Randolph's Mother.—The late John Randolph, some years before his death, wrote to a friend as follows: "I used to be called a Frenchman, because I took the French side in politics; and though this was unjust, yet the truth is, I should have been a French Atheist, if it had not been for one recollection, and that was when my departed mother used to take my little hands in hers, and cause me, on my knees, to say: 'Our Father which art in heaven.'"

The press on which General Green printed the proclamation of the army has lately been discovered in Fendleton, South Carolina.

ANOINTED TO HEAL.

Divinity cannot go further in power than to heal a broken heart, or satisfy the yearnings of a half-conscious immortality; than to restore a spirit to its proper sphere of action.

To create globes of matter, kindle their fires, and maintain them as the lamps of God; to give sensitiveness to the nerve of a sightless eye and pour through that small tenant the varied form and color of this fair earth; or to unseal the ear and introduce to its vaulted chambers all the sweet sounds of the musical air; what is all this when compared with that power of the Savior which arrests the soul in its downward rush, raises it to the true orbit of love, and fills it with a bright consciousness of its Creator, its Redeemer, and its Friend?

Whatever may be hereafter, the nature of the second coming of Christ, or the hushed meaning of the Seven Thunders; whatever may be the work of his hand, or the fire of his eye, when he is clad with zeal as a cloak, and comes in garments of blood from Bozrah, traveling in his might; now he comes to heal, now he preaches the Gospel to the mourner, now he proclaims the jubilee to every slave of sin, a forgiveness to every debtor, and the restoration of every forfeited inheritance.

"All bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth." "Blessed are the poor in spirit for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven." "Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted, etc." Words of unsurpassed eloquence. "No passage inspired or uninspired can equal for brevity and fulness the affectionate breathings of its exhaustless prayer." "Of their transcendent excellence," says Sir J. Mackintosh, "I can find no words to express my admiration and reverence. At the close, the divine speaker rises to the summit of moral sublimity, "Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness sake." For a moment, O Teacher blessed, I taste the unspeakable delight of feeling myself better. I feel, as in the days of my youth, that hunger and thirst after righteousness which long habits of infirmity and the low concerns of the world have contributed to extinguish.

The Savior calls off the heart from its mistakes and transgressions, from the infatuating, unsatisfying and harmful propensities of a carnal mind, and starts it in the high pursuits of a spiritual life; he sets it upon the ennobling practice of self-denial, humility, and obedience; he puts it in possession of a well-grounded hope, a strong faith, and an all-satisfying love; drawing it from the onions and idolatry of Egypt he brings it to the grapes of Eschol and the pure worship of Jehovah.

He discloses and proves the promises of life to be strong, precious, and encouraging; he points to a renovated earth and a renewed body; to friends restored without element of corruption, to a clime of endless budding and joy, of youth without fading or pain, waste or winter.

He gives his cheering love and presence to all his people. To every breast that invites him he enters and there abides—"a friend that sticketh closer than a brother." I once saw a man who had only his Bible and his Saviour—no health, no property, no friends, no relatives—yet happy. "Oh," said he, "what should I be without religion!"

To sin and pain he applies his blood and grace; a mercy that stoops as low as human guilt, and balm as searching as human misery. To one whose life has been misspent, to a heart faithless, despairing, yet repenting, to this sinking soul he comes as an Angel to a sepulchre; he rolls back the sin and bids the sinner come forth and live.

Through Christ, death has no sting. Its summons is welcome, its rest is sweet. "I know Him in whom I have believed." "I have had more pleasure this last two hours in dying than I ever had in all my life." To the departing saint, the way and air are crowded with moving Angels, not ascending and descending, but in surrounding Hosts.

P. O.

LIFE AT THE CAPITAL—AND DEATH.

While all good and wise men rejoice at the progress of taste and refinement in the country, they have tried, almost vainly however, to draw a distinction, in the public mind, between real social culture and excellence, and that bastard presentation of it which has sought, but too successfully, to usurp its name and place; and which finds its representatives and advocates among the technically fashionable—whose days are devoted to—nothing, and whose nights are given up to folly and sin—who laboriously seek to corrupt Christian Society by persuading the Christian Church to sanction balls, indecent dances, theatres, and the like. Ever and anon palpable evidences that "the wages of sin is death"—that the customs of the style of life hinted at are perilous to virtue, peace and salvation—arise to the surface. An eminent instance has just occurred at Washington City, the centre of American dissipation, intelligence of which is brought us by the telegraph of day before yesterday. We quote from the Delta. Daniel E. Sickles, a member of Congress from New York, having become satisfied that his wife had been dishonored by Philip Barton Key, United States District Attorney for the District of Columbia, sought reparation by shooting and killing Key.

The political and social position of the parties in this case, gives it an unusually afflictive and painful character. Philip Barton Key was the youngest son of the late Francis S. Key, the distinguished lawyer, patriot, and author of the national song, "The Star-Spangled Banner," and brother of the estimable lady whose readings of the poets, a few weks ago, excited so much admiration in our community. P. Barton Key was a widower, having a daughter nearly grown.

The death of his wife, a few years ago, plunged him into profound grief, which, with an impaired constitution, had brought him nearly to death's door. By the advice of his physicians, he paid a visit to Cuba last year, and during his absence was re-appointed, it was said on the warm solicitation of Chief Justice Taney, to the office which he had held during the administration of Mr. Pierce.

Mrs. Sickles is a gay, fashionable, handsome, young woman, of Italian descent, born in New York, but has passed much of her life in Europe. The indolent modes of life, luxurious habits, and reckless morals which have been recently introduced into our Federal Capital from the circles of Upper Tendom of New York, produce their natural fruits in such incidents as this.

Daniel E. Sickles, the victimized husband, is a young man of pleasing person, very agreeable manners, and gallant bearing. A very warm politician and man of the world, he was also, we have reason to believe, a man of strong domestic affections and tastes. His beautiful wife and their lovely little daughter were the objects of his fondest devotion and most passionate love. Key and himself were intimate friends.

THE NEW AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

This great work has been fully advertised in our columns. The fourth volume is now on hand. There are to be fifteen of them. Every man, who can spare the money, ought to subscribe. Then you can read them as they come out, and pay for them in the same way. Then, when you get the whole, it will answer for you every question that books can answer. Mr. S. Colman, the Agent, cannot visit you all. Write to him at New Orleans, care of H. D. McGinnis, 36 Camp street, and you will be supplied.

LETTER FROM COL. CLAIBORNE.

The Late Rev. Dr. Winans.

My Dear Sir: In the Advocate of the 23d inst., I read, with great pleasure, an article signed "Vicksburg," suggesting a bust of the late Wm. Winans. Why not a statue? We erect statues to heroes. Why not to one who "fought the good fight," who never turned his back on man or devil, and who is as worthy of the painter, the sculptor or the pen of history as any man that has trod on Southern soil. My friends of the Free Trader and True Southron compliment Mr. John Moder, who is now modeling a bust of Gen. Quitman, at Natchez, from his portraits. I was in the studio of that artist a few weeks since, and concur in all that Maj. Gen. McArdle and Maj. Gen. Wood have said in praise of the artist. I think he will produce a life-like likeness of the illustrious Quitman; and I should wish to see him employed to perpetuate the features and figure of the no less illustrious William Winans, the friend and guardian of my early youth.

If it be determined to have a bust or a portrait, to be deposited in the rooms of the Historical Society, at Jackson, Mississippi, put me down for ten dollars. If a statue, put me down for fifty dollars.

When I was at Natchez, recently, I had the pleasure of reading, in MS. an article on the life and character of Wm. Winans, from the pen of his literary executor, the Rev. Wm. H. Watkins, and I may say, in advance of its publication, that for beauty and vigor of style, and as an analysis of character, it is one of the ablest productions I have ever read, and will do honor to its gifted and estimable author.

I have read, for some time past, with very great interest, the numbers of the Rev. J. G. Jones, on the introduction of Protestantism into Mississippi. Aside from their intrinsic interest, they are of great historical value, and I hope he will continue them. It is evident he has not exhausted the subject. The pious persons he refers to, are "household words" to me. Most of them, and their descendants, I have known from my earliest childhood—the Swayzes, the Gibsons, the Griffins, Colemans, Jones, Coreys, Curtiss, Fowlers, Fosters, and others; and, if God spares my life, I shall have much to say of them and their early trials and adventures, in a historical work I am engaged on. And I take this opportunity to ask all the old settlers of Mississippi and Louisiana, and their descendants, to send me any and every thing connected with the journeying and settlement of their families in this country—recollections, traditions, journals, old letters, old pamphlets or old newspapers.

J. F. H. Claiborne.

WORDS TO WOMEN.

We have the fullest faith in the attainableness of the highest happiness in the married state. One thing is certain: it is the state in which our Heavenly Father designs all men and women to live; and, as the highest happiness cannot, of course, be found in violation of his purposes, therefore it cannot be found in the unmarried state. Let those who are single not forget it. We admit, however, that there is much misery—much unnecessary, self-created misery—in married life. But, great as it is, those who suffer most of it, would, as a rule, be much more miserable in single life. Of course, much of this misery is caused by men—perhaps, the most of it; but much of it, also, is caused by the women. In nine cases out of ten, we judge, a good husband will make a good wife; but the wives should be good any how. And they should remember that, in nine cases out of ten, a good wife makes a good husband; though the husbands should be good without this condition. But the happiness of home, and of the married state, depends most upon the women, we imagine.

We never look upon a bride, or upon one soon to become a bride, but that we feel a disposition to say: "O that thou didst know, in this thy day, the things that belong unto thy peace." One of those "things," and the most important of all, is gentleness—unvarying gentleness—that "suffereth long and is kind" that "never faileth" gentleness to the husband, in manner, in words—tender, loving gentleness. A recent writer has said that the first and most important quality of a woman is gentleness. Made to obey a being so imperfect as man, often full of vices, often full of faults, she ought early to learn to suffer even injustice, and to bear wrong from a husband without complaining. It is not for his sake: it is for her own that she ought to be gentle. The ill temper and obstinacy of women never do anything else than augment their ills and the bad conduct of their husbands—men feel that it is not with these arms they ought to be overcome. Heaven did not make woman insinuating and persuasive that they might be peevish; it did not make them feeble that they might be imperious; it did not give them a voice so soft that they might rail; it did not give them features so delicate that they might disfigure them by rage. When they are angry they forget themselves. They have often reason to complain; but they are always wrong in scolding. Each ought to maintain the character of the respective sex. A husband too mild may render a wife presuming; but at least if a man be not a monster, the gentleness of woman will pacify him and triumph over him sooner or later. The empire of woman is an empire of softness, of address, of compliance; her commands are caresses, her menaces tears.

OUR OWN COLLEGES.

The Alumni of Randolph-Macon College, Virginia, among whom are Rev. Dr. Myers of the Southern Advocate, and Rev. Dr. McTyeire of the Nashville Advocate, are to have a grand reunion at next commencement, in honor of the completion of the Endowment Fund. Without any personal familiarity with Randolph-Macon, and without taking any pains to become acquainted with the names of its Alumni, scattered through the South and South-west, we call up, without effort, the following, suggested by the names of the two distinguished gentlemen already mentioned: Col. Tennent Lomax of Alabama, for many years the accomplished and popular editor of the Columbus (Ga.) Times and Sentinel: Hon. James F. Dowdell, the present talented representative in Congress from East Alabama: Hon. David Clopton, of Tuskegee, one of the leading lawyers and public men of Alabama: Richard H. Powell Esq., a wealthy planter of Chunnenuggee Ridge, Alabama: Dubose Anthony Esq., a planter of the same region: Rev. Jas. L. Pierce, brother of Bishop Pierce, and President of Madison Female College, Georgia. Many others might be readily mentioned by one better acquainted with Randolph-Macon. These are all men of position—most of them, if not all, members of the Methodist Church—an honor to the College, the Church, and the country.

What an argument for the support of our own Colleges! Suppose they, like many others—influenced by a false pride—had graduated at Harvard, Yale, or some other College not connected with the South or their own Church. They would have been no better scholars—they would have occupied no higher position—the announcement of such a celebration, as the one proposed, at their Alma Mater, would awaken no general sympathetic interest in them or it, and their Church and section would not be at all honored by it. In the present instance—and it illustrates all similar ones—the advantage and honor are shared by the Church, the country, the College, and the Alumni. They are all brought together in the eye of a sympathetic and admiring public, their names are interwoven in a common history and a common renown. Whatever advantages may be imagined in connection with graduation at foreign institutions, there are peculiar advantages, of the dearest character, which such graduates can never enjoy. These advantages, increase with coming years.

THE PUBLISHING HOUSE.

We have reason to believe that the Publishing-house at Nashville is beginning to experience an unusual prosperity. The Notices of the Agent are in a cheerful and encouraging tone. Quite an improvement is reported in the book trade, so much so that some of the "sorts" have run short. The periodicals are flourishing. The movement to sustain the Quarterly promises to be quite successful; subscribers are coming in from all quarters; and we trust that from every section of the Church they will continue to come, until it has at least five thousand. The Home Circle is steadily increasing in favor and circulation. The last two members have been especially popular. It calls for twenty thousand subscribers, and should have them before the end of the year. The Christian Advocate is aspiring to the same number, and is increasing rapidly. All these things are matters of rejoicing.

One thing, in this connection, we think of special importance; that is, the raising of the two hundred thousand dollars free cash capital for the Publishing-house, which was resolved upon by a meeting of laymen and ministers in committee of the whole at the General Conference. We are afraid there is not as much zeal on this behalf as there should be. Book and Tract Societies organized, Conference Agents are appointed, plans are adopted, and vast machinery put in motion; but we begin to be impatient to hear that the Book Agent is being supplied with the much needed funds, or that there is a prospect of such supply.

There is the principal point at which to touch and quicken the pulse of our whole publishing system. Give the Agent the capital that is needed to accomplish what is demanded of him, and what is necessary to supply the wants of the Church and country. Let the Financial Secretary be every where encouraged and assisted in the first and principal purpose of his office—that of increasing the capital of the Publishing-house. This should be accomplished as soon as possible; for every thing else is dependent upon it. Other things will settle into joint, assume proper shape and progress according to the laws of a healthful development, if the life-blood of the heart of the system be rich and abundant.

And, in this connection, it is not improper to urge the same encouragement and assistance to the Sunday-school Secretary, in his efforts to raise funds to enable the Book Agent to increase our Sunday-school catalogue, and to cheapen our Sunday-school publications. Let those Methodists and Southern men who have put more money into the hands of those two Northern establishments—the American Sunday-school Union, and the American Tract Society—than they ever have into the hands of their own Southern Concern, be ashamed of themselves, and, in future, give their money to, and buy their books of, their own institution.

ARE THE BAPTISTS PROTESTANTS?

We have seen it stated in several Baptist papers that Baptists are not Protestants, and therefore we ask the question; not captiously, but simply for information. Is anybody in the Baptist Church authorized to answer this or any other question concerning Baptist faith? If we knew, we should apply to the proper source. But if any body can answer, we should be pleased to be enlightened. We do not wish to be troubled with the individual opinions of any self-constituted Baptist editor, whose paper is private property, and who has no authority to speak for any body but himself; nor with the individual opinions of any one Baptist minister, who holds no representative relation to his Church. They may be the best of men; we take it for granted that they are. We simply wish the questions answered: Does the Baptist Church recogize itself as Protestant or Anti-protestant? The immediate occasion of these remarks is the following in the Arkansas Baptist, stated as one of the objections to the Pedo-Baptist Churches:

"They are Protestants; i. e. sects which have separated from the Roman Catholic church, which is either the church of Christ, or it is not: If it is the church of Christ, they cannot be, because they have separated from it; and if it is not, still they cannot be, as we know that no clean thing can come out of an unclean thing."

The philosophy of the last member of the above sentence would turn all the redeemed saints out of heaven; for they are redeemed out of a wicked world, precisely as Protestantism is the true faith redeemed out of the corruptions of Romanism. But we seek no controversy with our Baptist brethren, nor with any other body of Christians; we simply seek for light. The vagaries, nonsense, bitterness, and bigoted folly into which these denominational controversies tempt even the wisest and best of men, have caused us to set our face against them, as a rule.

WESTERN TEXAS CORRESPONDENCE.

At the last session of the Texas Legislature, a bill was passed granting a large quantity of land for the purpose of boring Artesian wells in the country, lying between the Nueces and Rio Grande rivers. Eighteen of these wells have been awarded to Messrs. Perham & Randolph, of Selma, Ala.

We are favored, this week, with a letter from one of these gentlemen, Mr. Perham.

IN CAMP, 40 MILES WEST OF CORPUS CHRISTI,
February 25th, 1859.

We arrived at Corpus about two weeks after leaving Selma, without any serious accident or delay, except three days at Galveston. We found the country still suffering for rain, not enough having fallen to raise the creeks in two or three years; still the grass is green and abundant in most places. After building houses, and putting our machinery together in Corpus, we moved out into the wide prairies, houses, tools, and all. The name of our "local habitation" is La Carrita "mot," on the San Fernando creek, that is, where the creek ought to be, but alas! the tall grass is growing in the very bed of the stream, and one might almost believe there had been no water there, since the last draining off of the flood. We have a "water hole" ten miles north of us, from which we used water for all purposes, for some weeks, but fortune has been kind to us, as we have found, and dug out, a spring, distant only five miles, so that the boy who "totes" water, can make one trip in a day!

We have some neighbors all around us; north twenty miles, a clever Pennsylvania Dutchman; east twelve miles, a civil Mexican Ranchero; south ten miles, a fast Georgian; west twelve miles, a good natured Scotchman. From the Camp to Corpus, is one unbroken prairie. Although far from fashionable society, we are not alone, more than fifty thousand head of cattle and horses graze upon this tract of land, and no one here would consider it a large estimate to say there were a hundred thousand deer! They are seen in all directions, in droves of ten, fifty, and countless hundreds; but they understand what the poet meant when he penned "Distance lends enchantment to the view," for no government engineer ever caculated with more precision the law of projectiles, or the force of gunpowder, than these wily monarchs of the plain. Several of our party have succeeded in "knocking some of them off of their pins." A year or two ago this was a great "Mustang range," but they have been much thinned out of late. Two large herds may be seen any day, within a mile of so of our Camp; but of all wild animals, a wild horse is the most completely wild! About one mile in the nearest approach he allows man to make. The plan of taking them is very effective, but requires a great deal of knowledge and experience, and not a little labor. A strong pen is built, constructed with wings like a partridge net. If twenty or thirty miles from the range, all the better for the arrangement; good riders, mounted on fleet, well trained horses, are then stationed along the course, one or two miles apart, according to the distance to be run, and the number of huntsmen. At a given signal, the first rider makes a dash at the drove, careful to give them the right direction for the second rider's stand, in this manner a fresh rider falls in on each side of the gang, every mile or two, rushing at the frightened horses with all the fury of a wild Camanche Indian. Thus the race is kept up the whole distance. Each "Mustanger," after riding his short Gilpin race, is at liberty to pursue the trail at a more leisurely pace, unless he is mounted upon blood and muscle that can stand the whole distance, in which case, whip and rein, and we may add spur is freely given, that this rider may enjoy as much as possible the excitement and sport. When one of these "drives" comes off, and every man does his duty, they seldom fail "to bag" a goodly number of the precious game, sometimes as many as one hundred. After the race is ended and the horses penned, a fearful scene ensues—as if conscious of the fate that awaits them, they commence kicking, biting, and prancing, as though each prisoner blamed his neighbor for the folly of being caught, and resolves to avenge the loss of his freedom by selling his last moments as dearly as possible. In this last dreadful combat and struggle, many a noble horse is maimed and crippled, and not unfrequently killed. When this tragedy is ended the "roping" begins. The horse is caught with the lariat, thrown down, his feet tied, and his eyes blindfolded, then he is dragged out of the pen and left to struggle upon the ground until all his companions are treated in the same fashion. This done, the "taming" process begins, which consists in throwing the animal as many times as he will attempt to rise, with sundry whippings, and much abuse in general, until the broken-spirited, broken-hearted, and sometimes broken-necked creature gives up and endures any insult offered to him. He is then called a "gentle Mustang!"

By kind words and gentle means, I have taken one of the wildest, and in two days had him under me, obedient to every impulse of the rein, and to-day, just three weeks from the first riding, he was pacing over the prairie with a young lady upon his back, apparently well pleased with his new condition. But I have no doubt one week in the range, with his old companions, would undo all I have done—so much for the influence of bad company! A "Mustang drive" came off a few days ago in our vicinity, the particulars of which may afford some instructive items of religious interest. After prayers and intercessions to the Saints for aid and success in the hunt, it was proclaimed by one of the most devout, that "Santo hino," (the term for Infant Jesus,) had promised to give them fifty ponies and ten colts, upon condition that one dime per head for the horses, and five cents each for the colts, should be paid to him before the "drive" commenced. A collection was consequently made among the huntsmen, and the amount carefully deposited in a little bag kept for the purpose, and suspended under the "image of the Saviour." The next day the run was made, but no horses or colts were taken, although six hundred Mustangs were started in the gang. Yesterday was fixed to make the trial over again; what their success was, I have not learned. When we questioned one of the party as to the failure of the Saint to comply with his contract, the business reply was, "the Saint has it to do, or he shall perish without our money again." All, however, agreed that it was not the Saint's fault that they caught no ponies, but one Antonio's, who did not keep his place and perform his part properly. "Have Americans no Saint?" said one of the disappointed party, to a friend of ours, who was rather ridiculing the idea of such religious nonsense in connection with horse catching. "Yes," said the American, "I have one, this is my Saint!" at the same time taking a large Dutch pipe from his mouth, with a horrid comic face upon it, "this is my Saint"—when the lad, with great warmth of feeling, and not a little emphasis, replied, "Wash your mouth, and not make yourself like the beast that walk on the prairie!" Such is the attachment to, and veneration for, even the most degraded dogmas taught them, that the least suspicion that you do not respect their religion, cuts off all intercourse with you. The perplexing question to us, as to how the Saint was to get the money out of the bag, was readily answered by one of them: "When the Priest comes to the jacal, he will take all the Saint's money to him!"

Should any of your readers pass this way, tell them to call at the Artesian Well, and we will give them a splendid live-oak to camp under, wood to boil their coffee, and plenty of "staking ground" for their horses.

Trusting that this beautiful land may soon be under the "true cross," I remain yours,

Perham.

MEMORIALS OF METHODISM.

Rev. J. G. Jones concluded his interesting series—"Introduction of Protestantism into Mississippi"—with our last issue. We hope he will resume his labors in this field. It is a wide and fertile one, and so far as the Southwest is concerned, its virgin soil is yet almost unploughed. Our genial and accomplished friend, Rev. Dr. C. K. Marshall, writes us to request that we beg Mr. Jones to continue. Rev. William H. Watkins, sagaciously aware of the value of such materials as can now be obtained, but which will soon be gone, by the death of our old men, writes as follows:

Natchez, Mississippi Feb. 22, 1859.

Mr. Editor: Since January we Mississippians have read the New Orleans Christian Advocate with increased interest. Where we came from and what we have been doing are fit questions, and now seem likely to be answered. Some most interesting and eagerly sought papers have been furnished you recently by Rev. J. G. Jones. As men grow old they are wont to look back. Through them, we grow familiar with dates and facts and men, which it is well for us to study. Bro. Jones ought to continue these papers. He has the materials, the qualifications, and the right, by hereditary descent.

Bro. Nixon has given you extracts from our records of the proceedings of the Mississippi Conference, held 1816. Does the Church know that the travelling preachers of the Mississippi District met, by authority of the General Conference, in 1813, and transacted all the business of an Annual Conference?

I find the following in the unpublished autobiography of the late Dr. Winans. It is of importance to us, as the published Minutes contain nothing with regard to the Mississippi District for 1813.

"The General Conference at its last session (1812) had authorized the organization of a Conference for this country, and accordingly the preachers belonging to the Itinerant Ministry assembled on the first day of November (1813) at the house of Rev. Newit Vick in Jefferson county, Mississippi. There were present, Brothers Harper, Sellers, Hobbs, Griffin, Ford, Nolly, Shrock and myself. We received a communication from the Bishop accompanied by an address from the Tennessee Conference, informing us that the Bishop could not be with us (according to my recollection, the reason assigned was the danger of traveling through the Indian country) that therefore a Conference could not be organized; but advising us to transact the business of a Conference, subject to revision by the Tennessee Conference, and appointing Brother Sellers, President. We accordingly formed ourselves into a quasi Conference, and I was chosen Secretary. We admitted five on trial, viz: Jonathan Kemp, Simon Gentry, Thomas Owens, Peter James and Josiah Daughtery. Elected to Elder's orders, Thomas Griffin, John S. Ford and William Winans. Placed Lewis Hobbs in a superannuated relation, and located Miles Harper. We also elected to Deacon's orders, Randal Gibson and George Fletcher, local preachers.

I was assigned to New Orleans. Our transactions, except the appropriation of books for my support in New Orleans, were confirmed by the Tennessee Conference; and were, thereby, invested with complete ecclesiastical authority."

Scotch Words.—The Scotch language is perhaps destined to perish. There are many Scotch words and Scotch expressions which ought to be saved from the wreck. By their adoption the English language would be immensely enriched. The Scotch language has no Roman majesty, but it lends itself most opulently to pathos and humor. It has been kept free from those pedantic Johnsonianisms which have been so fatal to the English language. In its homeliness there is a power after which the English language often strives in vain. What in effect is homeliness, but that which, coming from the home, goes back thither with natural impulse and irresistible force? A language loses its moral empire, when it deserts entirely, as the English language has deserted, the common speech of the people. And that moral empire gone, what avail a learned air and rhetorical embellishments? [Critic.

MILBURN'S LAST INTERVIEW WITH PRESCOTT.

The following account of a visit of Rev. William H. Milburn to William H. Prescott, not forty-eight hours before the death of the latter, will be read with interest. Mr. Milburn, as Mr. Prescott was, is almost entirely deprived of sight, and like him devoted to literature. The interest to most of our readers will be greatly enhanced by the fact that they have known Mr. Milburn well, and often listened to his finished and eloquent discourses and lectures.

Happening to be in Boston on Wednesday last, I called to pay my respects to Mr. Prescott. Forgetting his hours, I reached the door at five minutes past one, when I learned from the servant that, as was his custom, he had left the house as the clock struck one, to take his daily walk. I was shown into the library, the gathering place for the family after tea. This beautiful room is, after the fashion of Boston houses, on the second floor, in the rear of the drawing-rooms; it is, perhaps, thirty feet long, by twenty wide; at the Western end there is a large bow-window, over which are suspended the swords worn by the grandfathers of Mr. and Mrs. Prescott, at the battle of Bunker Hill, Col. Prescott commanding the American forces, and Mrs. Prescott's grandfather, Captain Linzee, commanding the sloop Falcon, engaged in throwing shells upon the American redoubts. By the two long walls of the room are arranged handsome cases, I think of maple, on which are shelved about 5000 volumes of well-selected and handsomely bound books.

On the left side of the room, as you face the window, a door is painted in exact imitation of shelves with books, so that the visitor is startled when it is pushed aside for the historian to enter. This door opens upon a staircase, which leads to the room above, his workshop, as he called it, where his labors were performed. Surmounting the cases, at appropriate intervals, are busts; among them, as I remember, those of Scott and Byron, which he particularly prized. On the table are many choice and exquisite volumes, presentation copies from literary friends abroad and at home. One shelf of the library, he told me, was its most expensive and important feature, as it contained the transcripts of documents in the Royal Archives of Simancas and Madrid, made for him there, arranged in a large number of volumes handsomely bound; and which had then (for this was several years ago) cost him over five thousand dollars. The room throughout is furnished in perfect taste, and is at the same time the perfection of comfort; a characteristic of the libraries of the gentlemen of Boston.

Mr. Prescott's house is filled with engravings, pictures, busts, statuettes, and medallions, the tokens of admiring regard from friends in every part of Europe, and North and South America. Behind the door, in a hall, hangs the full length portrait of Hernando Cortez, in full armor; and on the opposite wall is a striking likeness of Phillip II, both copies of originals, sent him by friends—the first from Mexico, the other from Spain.

On the evening in question, Wednesday, January 26, Mr. Prescott entered the library with a slower and heavier step than when I had been in the habit of seeing him years before; but his manner had the same unaffected simplicity and cordial warmth. Whether a stranger would have perceived it I cannot say, but my ear, sharpened by necessity, at once detected the work of paralysis in an occasional thickening of the speech. I mean, a difficulty in perfect articulation now and then.

He then led the conversation to his English friends, to some of whom he had given me letters on my recent visit to that country. He first spoke of Lady Lyell, the wife of the celebrated geologist. She is one of the most charming people I have ever seen, he said. When she married Sir Charles she knew nothing of geology; but finding that her life was to be passed among stones, she set herself to work to make friends of them, and has done so to perfection. She is in thorough sympathy with all her husband's researches and works; is the companion of his journeys; oftentimes his amanuensis, for her hand has written several of his books; and the delight and cheer of his whole life. Unaffected, genial, accomplished, and delightful to an almost unequalled extent, she is one of the rarest women you can meet. And, he continued, you saw my friend, Dean Milman. What an admirable person he is! I had a letter from him only a day or two since, in which he gave an interesting account of the opening of his cathedral, St. Paul's, to the popular Sunday evening preachings—a matter which has enlisted all the sympathies of the Bishop of London and of himself. He has been a prodigiously hard worker, and so has acquired a premature old look. Accomplished as a historian, divine, poet, and man of letters, he is at the same time among the most agreeable and finished men of society I saw in England.

I said: Mr. Prescott, arn't you coming to New York? We should all be very glad to see you there. No, he replied; I suppose the days of my long journeys are over. I must content myself, like Horace, with my three houses. You know I go at the commencement of Summer to my cottage at the sea side, at Lynn Beach, and at Autumn to my patrimonial acres at Pepperell, which has been in our family for two hundred years, to sit under the old trees I sat under when a boy; and then, with Winter, come to town to hibernate in this house. This is the only traveling, I suppose, that I shall do until I go to my long home. Do you remember the delightful summer you spent with us at Lynn, two or three years ago? I wish you would come and repeat it next Summer.

In another part of the conversation he said: These men with eyes have us at a serious disadvantage, haven't they? While they run we can only limp. But I have nothing to complain of, nor have you; Providence has singularly taken care of us both, and by compensation keeps the balance even.

He then spoke with entire calmness of the shock which his system had received from the first stroke of apoplexy last year; said that it had weakened him a good deal, but was very grateful that he was yet enabled to enjoy life and work. That he was able to take exercise although confined to spare diet, and not allowed to touch meat or anything of a stimulating kind; and managed, moreover, to keep up his literary labors. "I have always made my literary pursuits," he said, "a pleasure rather than a toil; and hope to do so with the remainder of Philip—as I am yet able to work two or three, and sometimes more, hours a day." He stated that his eye had suffered considerably from the blow, and while we were talking he found it necessary to shade his face. In the course of the conversation, we were joined by the ladies of the family, Mrs. Prescott, her sister, his daughter, and daughter-in-law.

He then spoke in glowing and grateful terms, as I alluded to the interest taken in his health throughout the country, to the kindness which he had invariably experienced at the hands of his countrymen. "I can never," he said, "be sufficiently grateful for the tokens of esteem, regard and affection which I have had from them through all the years of my literary career. True, it makes me feel like an old man to see my fifteen volumes upon the shelf, but my heart is as young as it ever was to enjoy the love which the country has ever shown me." When I said it was a cheerful thing for a man to know he had given so much happiness as he had done by his books, he said that it was his own truest happiness to trust that he had been able to confer it. He said he hoped to live to finish Philip, which was now three-fifths done. As I bade him goodbye, I said, "God bless you, Mr. Prescott; I know I breathe the prayer of the country when I say, may your life be spared for many years, to add volume after volume to the fifteen." He rejoined, "My greatest delight is the love of my friends and their appreciation of my labors."

Little did I think that the hand which so warmly grasped mine as he led me down the stairs would, ere eight-and-forty hours were past, be cold and stiff in death. Peace to the memory of one of the sweetest and noblest men that ever lived!

DEATH OF HALLAM, THE HISTORIAN.

The English papers announce the death of Henry Hallam, the historian, on the 22d of January, at the great age of 81. The Times says of him:

Among historians we doubt whether there is to be found one equal to Mr. Hallam in impartiality. There have been historians as erudite as he, not less acute, more inspiring as thinkers, more elegant as writers; but for stern justice he is probably without a rival. His unflinching integrity, his subjugation of personal prejudice, his determination to speak the truth under all circumstances, is one of the rarest things in literature. He belonged to that school which in history deals with principles rather than with persons, and in criticism deals with poems rather than with poets, with books rather than with authors. The tendency of our literature of late years has been in a direction entirely opposite, and would seem to represent principles as subordinate to the personage by whom they are illustrated, books as but secondary to the authors from whose pens they have flowed—a tendency, in fact, which would render biography the basis of history, the base of criticism, the base even of philosophy.

NEGLECT OF FAMILY WORSHIP.

In one of our exchanges, our eye fell upon an obituary notice with which we were struck. The person was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and had been for a number of years; but he had never erected an altar in his house. A short time ago he was laid upon his sick-bed.

"Just before his death, he called his family together and gave them a solemn lecture concerning the realities of the religion of Christ. Said he, 'My children, it is one thing to profess Christ, it is another to possess Christ.' He mourned over his neglect of the great duty of family worship—a duty which he had neglected through timidity, 'My children have never heard me pray,' said he. 'O, my little ones, I have prayed for you in the grove, and while attending to the duties of the day; and if the Lord in his goodness does raise me to health again, I will, by the help of the Lord, erect a family altar.' But the Lord has taken him."

DR. JNO. B. SMITH AND PATRICK HENRY.

The great Virginia orator was, as is well known, original opposed to the adoption of the federal constitution. Dr. Smith President of Hampden Sidney College, was warmly in favor of it. Patrick Henry offered himself as a candidate representative of Prince Edward county in the state convention, and he appointed a day to meet the people of the county show the defects of the constitution and the grounds of his position. The court-house is not a half hour's walk from college. Dr. S. had made his arrangements to be present defend the constitution, but being called away to visit a person, he employed a young man who lived in his family, a markable talker for memory, for shrewdness, and for the in his pen, to take down Mr. Henry's speech in short-hand. In a week or two from that time there was to be a public exhibition in the college-hall, an occasion which was always sure to draw out a large crowd. When the day arrived, Patrick Henry who lived in the neighborhood, came with the rest, little dreaming of the rod that was prepared for him. One of the speakers among the students came forward upon the stage delivered Henry's philippic against the constitution, exactly as he had himself delivered it at the court-house. Another immediately followed with a speech, prepared by Smith, in which he had put forth all his energies in defence of the constitution. Henry was not a little annoyed at the treachery, and at the close of the exercises gave Dr. S. to understand, in no equivocal terms, that he felt that an unfair advantage had been taken of him. Dr. S. contended that he had cause for complaint, unless his speech had not been replied to fairly, and in that case he declared himself willing to make amends in his power. Henry said that was not the ground of his complaint—the young man had certainly taken his speech down with great accuracy; but he thought it was indelicate and improper that he should be placed in such circumstances before that audience without any previous notice. The doctor replied that Col. Henry knew it was his intention to have replied to him at the court-house, but was providentially prevented; for he had then spoken for public effect, and his speech was the property, and all he could do was to see it fairly reported. The orator was not satisfied, but broke off all intercourse with the doctor, and would never hear him preach afterwards, though formerly he had been one of his constant hearers.

METHODIST PUBLICATIONS.

The Quarterly Review.

We have the pleasure of announcing to the friends of this excellent work that the prospect for sustaining it is very encouraging. A little further effort, and its perpetuity will be certain: a very desirable thing in the history of Methodist literature. This work, always popular, is attracting greater attention as it grows older. The January number of the current year has been very highly commended: many of its articles pronounced superior. No labor nor expense will be spared to make the Quarterly acceptable, if its friends will rally to its support. Reader, have you subscribed? if so, ask your intelligent neighbor to do likewise. Let every preacher strive to get one additional subscriber. We can furnish the January number to those who may desire to take the work. Send on the names and the cash—only $2.

The Home Circle.

Subscribers continue to come for this beautiful monthly, but not half as rapidly as they should; we ought to have two thousand. Its praise is in all the land. We ask our brethren and especially the lady friends of the Home Circle, to exert the work and procure subscribers.

The Sunday-School Visitor is on rising ground. Send your lists of tens, twenties, fifties, and hundreds.

And do n't forget the Christian Advocate. No, it is not forgotten: subscribers are coming in beautifully. We want two thousand before the close of the present volume.

Come, friends, our prospects are brightening at the Publishing-house. Work with us, and for the Church, and you shall have your reward.

Agent.

AN INDIAN HUSBAND AND FATHER.

A correspondent of the Nashville Advocate relates that, being a Missionary among the Cherokees, he witnessed the following romantically beautiful and tender scene:

In the year 1854 I was employed on the Tahlequah Circuit, soon got to my work, provided with a good interpreter, and soon in the midst of a revival of religion. And at one of the Sabbath appointments, after sermon, I gave the people a chance to join the Church. The brethren sang with spirit, as the Cherokees can sing, but the people seemed backward about joining the Church. Finally, a full-blooded Cherokee man, who would say about forty-five years of age, arose from his seat with a child in his arms, (a thing not common with full-blooded Indians,) made his way to the stand, and told Brother Sanders to tell me that his wife died some time before and had left him the child, and had charged him on her death-bed, to raise it for Glory and heaven. And with that he took it by the arm, and handed its little hand up for me to take it into the Church.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL CELEBRATION.

Dr. Taylor, our Sunday-school Secretary, on last Sunday, had a "reception" at the McGehee Church, at four o'clock in the afternoon, almost equal in grandeur to that of General Scott, and more interesting. All the Methodist Sunday Schools in the city, and in Algiers, Gretna, and Carrollton, with the German Schools, about fifteen in number, were represented. Being a very wet day, we only had the large church full; had it been fair we should have found it necessary, we suppose, to adjourn to LaFayette square. Such singing! The Americans sang in English, and the Germans in the rich tongue of the Father-land. The welcome given to Dr. Taylor, by our young friend, Mr. Charles Ewing, was in the excelsor style. The Dr. was never happier in speech. Our friend, Wm. Foster, Esq., presided with becoming dignity and grace. The bull is in motion—Dr. Taylor is going round on his big circuit—and a general S

FEARFUL STEAMBOAT DISASTER.

Blowing up of the Princess.

One of the most shocking and destructive steamboat disasters which have occurred upon the Mississippi is that of the blowing up and burning of the magnificent steamer Princess on last Sunday morning, about ten or eleven o'clock, a few miles below Baton Rouge. Below are the items we get by telegraph; but the extent of the loss of life is far from being known. It is variously estimated from forty to one hundred—nearer the latter, we fear. If the devil has not got possession of steam, it looks very much like it.

BATON ROUGE, February 27.—The steamer Princess exploded her boilers this morning when off Conrad's Point, in sight of Baton Rouge. The boat took fire after the explosion and was burned up. We give the following names, as far as ascertained, of DEAD AND MISSING.—A son of W. H. Stúrt, of Fayette, Miss.; Mr. Brandon, clerk of the Court, Natchez; two brothers of the name of Marks, of Fayette, Miss.; James Yale and W. Glover, Natchez; Col. Coffey, of Grand Gulf; Dr. Richards, of Point Coupee; John M. Bell, of New Orleans; H. W. Sherburne, of Baton Rouge; Charles Bannister, Representative from New Orleans; L. Huard, Representative from New Orleans; Edward Craig, barkeeper, died on Kate Dale; A. G. The Killed and Wounded—BATON ROUGE, Feb. 28.—Among the large number killed by the explosion of the steamer Princess are, A. W. Belle, of Clinton; Mr. Calhoan, of Kentucky, and Messrs. Haard, Calhoun and Atkinson, residences not ascertained.

Mr. F. A. Cheatham is still alive, but his recovery is considered hopeless.

Mr. F. A. Laville is also still living, but has lost both legs, and his recovery is considered doubtful.

A large number of bodies are still being found, whose names we have not yet been able to ascertain.

Among the bodies found is one supposed to be the remains of Mr. Sherburn.

Latest from the scene of the Princess's explosion—the cause of the disaster—miraculous escapes.

BATON ROUGE, 9 P. M., Feb. 28.—It is impossible to give full particulars of the terrific disaster to the steamer Princess, which has spread such gloom over our community. Those who witnessed the explosion uninjured describe it as appalling in the extreme.

No one knows the real cause of the explosion. There are a thousand and one reports in regard to it, the most probable of which is the following:

The Princess was considerably behind her usual time, the weather was cloudy and foggy, and the officers of the boat were anxious to reach New Orleans punctually.

A few moments before the explosion it was noticed that there was an unusual pressure of steam on—too much for safety—and it was not let off.

The engineer is also reported to have said that he would reach New Orleans at a certain hour or blow up the boat.

Mrs. Morton, who was saved, had a son with her about two years of age, who was picked up some nine miles from the scene of the disaster below the wreck, and was found to be entirely uninjured.

Messrs. Brewer and Lurty are reported among the dead at Bayou Sara.

The despair and gloom which pervades our community cannot be described.

Among the saved there were probably one hundred more or less wounded. Many of these have since died, at the various places to which they were carried, but it is impossible to get a full and correct list of the saved or lost. The Princess had more passengers on board than she was ever known to carry before.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23.—The Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have agreed to report a bill allowing to the Panama mail route to California $500,000 per annum, for a semi-monthly service, and to the Tehuantepec route, for a similar service, $200,000 per annum. Mr. Slidell gave notice that he should call for a final vote on the Cuba bill, on Friday next, 25th inst.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—The Senate last night had a long, spirited and sharp discussion upon the amendment offered by Mr. Hale yesterday to repeal the restrictive clause in regard to the required number of population in Kansas to qualify her for admission into the Union as a State.

The amendment was finally rejected by a vote of 19 yeas to 27 nays.

The Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill was then taken up and discussed till midnight, when it was passed by a vote of 27 yeas to 16 nays.

The most important matter brought before the House to-day, was the report of the Committee appointed to investigate and report upon various charges of fraud in the contracts of the Navy Department, and in other Departments of the Government. The Post-office Appropriation bill was up for consideration. Several additional amendments were offered and adopted. The bill was then passed to a vote, and rejected by a vote of 86 yeas, against 119 nays.

The Committee made a majority and minority report. They are both elaborate documents of great length. The minority report charges the President, the Secretary of the Navy, several members of Congress, and various other officers of the Government with complicity in gross frauds, connected with the contracts of the Navy Department for coal, and in other matters not stated in the report. The minority Committee also offer a series of resolutions strongly censuring the President, the Secretary of the Navy and others implicated in the alleged fraudulent transactions.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25.—Yesterday the minority resolutions of the Naval Fraud Committee were presented in the House. The purport is to the effect that neither the personal nor official integrity of the Secretary has been impeached, the Committee's investigations having been extended to every item of the Naval Appropriation bill.

The Committee appointed in the House to investigate the charges against Searing neither exculpate him nor recommend his expulsion.

In the Senate the Cuban bill was discussed. Senator Wilson's amendment to the bill appropriates $50,000 for the President to expend in negotating the removal of commercial restrictions which burden our trade with Cuba and various States of South and Central America.

It is probable that the Cuban bill will pass the Senate by about nine majority, but its chance of being acted on in the House is small.

A test vote on the Cuban bill was taken in the Senate, with the result; yeas 30, nays 18.

Senator Slidell stated that he would not press the bill, as he feared it might cause the loss of other appropriation bills, but the sense of the Senate had been distinctly expressed, and he should present the bill on the first day of the next session.

In the House the Post-office Appropriation bill passed by four majority, in the same shape in which it was previously offered. The amendments giving Butterfield & Co. choice in selecting the route for the overland mail, was rejected.

Feb. 26.—Considerable excitement was caused by the President vetoing the bill granting lands to States for the endowment of Agricultural Colleges, etc.

The House tariff bill provides that the first three sections of act forty-seven be suspended for three years from the 30th of June, 1859, and that duties be levied during those three years according to the specifications of act forty-six. Warehouse goods for consumption are subject under this act.

The House refused to suspend the rules for the introduction of this bill by a vote of one hundred and twenty-eight to eighty-two-thirds being necessary to carry a motion of the kind.

The speaker stated that the alternative was that the bill would come before the House in Committee of the Whole.

It is reported that the President will receive Mata, and recognize the Juarez Government.

BATON ROUGE, Feb. 23.—In the House to-day, the apportionment bill, as reported by the conference committee, was passed and sent to the Senate. It passed, to a second reading in the Senate, and was made the special order of the day for to-morrow, Thursday. Both houses then adjourned. The Democratic members hold a concus this evening.

BATON ROUGE, Feb. 24.—In the Senate to-day the apportionment bill was taken up as the special order of the day. The House bill was finally passed, after being emended as follows: Pointe Coupee, Avoyelles, and West Baton Rouge to be allowed one Senator. East Feliciana and West Feliciana one, and East Baton Rouge one. The number of representatives was also reduced to ninety-eight. In this reduction New Orleans loses two representatives—one in the First and one in the Sixth District.

Congressional Proceedings.—Feb. 24.—In the Senate to-day the Army Appropriation Bill was amended, by the addition of an appropriation of one million of dollars for fortifications. The bill thes passed the Senate by a large majority.

In the Senate to-day Gen. Houston, of Texas, made a parting speech, in which he ably vindicated his Congressional course.

In the House to-day Mr. Regan, of Texas, made a personal explanation relative to a dialogue between himself and Mr. Bryan, one of his colleagues. The explanation resulted in very sharp words between the two representatives, respecting nationalism. Considerable excitement was produced in the House, and fears were entertained of their coming to blows, but no violence was attempted, and the excitement soon subsided.

The House to-day concurred in Mr. Sherman's amendment to the Naval Appropriation bill. The amendment reducing the appropriation for Navy Yards from $1,192,000 to $130,000, was also carried and the bill was then passed.

March 1.—In the House yesterdy the amendment to the Post-office Appropriation bill appropriated $3,000,000 for the deficiencies of the present fiscal year. The bill appropriates nineteen and e half millions of dollars, of which amount nearly four millions are for deficiences in the departments up to June 30, 1858.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27, 2 o'clock, P. M.—Daniel E. Sickels, member of Congress from New York, has just shot and killed Phillip Barton Key, the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, charging Key with having dishonored him and destroyed his domestic peace. Sickles immediately summoned an officer, gave himself up and was committed to jail.

NEW YORK, Feb. 28.—The steamship Illinois has arrived at this port from Aspinwall, with San Francisco dates of the 6th, which has been anticipated by the Quaker City. The Illinois brings $1,280,000 in treasure on freight.

The Panama Star confirms the report of the signing of the Onsley Treaty between Great Britain and Nicaragua. The Star also represents that a revolution in Chili is imminent, and that the present government is virtually at an end, as all the ports are about to be blockaded by an overwhelming force.

NEW YORK, Feb. 28.—The bark Antagonist arrived at this port to-day from Buenos Ayres, bringing advices from that port to the 4th of January. She brings important intelligence in regard to the movements of the Paraguay expedition, which is two weeks later than our previous advices. The captain of the Antagonist reports that the fleet had rendezvoused at Buenos Ayres, as previously arranged, and Commissioner Bowlin and Commodore Wm. B. Shubrick, the flag officer of the U. S. squadron, had gone with the large of war Dolphin and the Perry and the war steamers Fulton and Water Witch, to open negociations or have an interview with President Lopez. The steamers are to take the Dolphin and Perry in tow at the fork of the river. The rest of the fleet will remain at Montevideo. Letters received by the Antagonist report that a Paraguayan steamer of war had gone up the river with a heavy chain to place across the river, and obstruct the passage of the U. S. vessels. A French and an English war steamer had also gone up the river, of course. The English steamer, it is supposed, has gone up the river for the purpose of demanding indemnity in the case of the British schooner recently seized by President Lopez. It is reported that Lopez has some ten thousand men under arms to welcome the U. S. Commissioner and fleet. It is the general opinion that our squadron is inadequate in case of hostilities, an account of the small number of vessels attached to the squadron that will be able to ascend the river.

FOREIGN.

Arrival Steamer City of Baltimore.

NEW YORK, March 1.—The steamship City of Baltimore, Capt. Lietch, of the New York and Liverpool line, arrived at this port this morning, bringing dates to 16th ult., and brings four days later than by the Canada at Halifax.

The Cunard steamship Europe arrived out on the 14th. Her American advices had a tendence to check the buoyancy of the cotton market.

A British Loan of £7,000,000.—The English Government proposes a loan of seven million pounds for the expenses of the Government in the Indian campaign.

Atlantic Telegraph.—The English government refuses to grant unconditional guarantee to the proposed new Atlantic Telegraph Company.

By the Steamship Prince Albert.

The New York papers, of the 18th, have a dispatch from St. John's, N. F., giving summary of news brought by the steamship Prince Albert, which left Galway evening of the 5th, arrived at St. John's the 17th; Prince Albert had a boisterous passage, ship damaged, nearly a full complement of passengers, among them William Smith O'Brien. On the 4th inst., Mr. John D. Lever was returned to Parliament for Galway. Parliament opened on 3d inst. Queen's speech very non-committal. Though silent on war question, it caused a decline in funds at London and Paris—Threatens force against Mexico. On foreign affairs, it says: "I receive from all foreign Powers assurances of friendly feelings." Conclusion of treaties in regard to the Principalities, and one of commerce with Russia, noticed: the latter referred to as indication of complete re-establishment of friendship between the two countries. The treaties with China and Japan are mentioned as promising great commercial advantages. Satisfaction is expressed at the abolition, by France, of negro emigration on the east coast of Africa; and that the pending negotiations give promise of a total abandonment of the system. In respect to Mexico, the speech says: "The state of the Republic of Mexico, distracted by civil wars, has induced me to carry my forbearance to the utmost limit in regard to the wrongs and indignities to which British residents have been subjected at the hands of the two contending parties. They have at length been carried to such an extent that I have been compelled to give instructions to the commander of the naval forces in those seas to demand, and, if necessary, to enforce reparation." Addresses in response to the speech were agreed in both Houses. Earl Melville in the House of Lords, and Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons, complained of the silence in regard to the threatening state of the Italian question and other matters of interest. Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli expressed their confidence in the maintenance of peace.

France.

France continued her warlike preparations. It was rumored that the Duke de Malakoff would soon return to Paris, and be succeeded in London by the Duke de Montebello. Prince Napoleon and his bride had arrived in Paris.

The French Government is having constructed six immensely powerful floating batteries, which are to be navigated as ships, and will transport large numbers of troops. There are in French ports two hundred ships in commission, of all descriptions, most of them being heavily armed and of large tonnage.

Alarmed by the ominous aspects of these things, the British Government is hooking to the condition of its coast defences, which will be strengthened and new fortifications also erected, without loss of time, at various points. Political prophets in high places predict that the storm of war apparently gathering will break forth within the year.

The Sardinian Chambers have voted a fifty million francs loan.

The platform announced by Sardinia is that she will neither attempt to create war, and neither will she in the least succumb to Austria.

The Austrian Government has announced that it is willing to agree to withdraw its troops from the Roman States if France will do the same.

The Czar is about concentrating a powerful army on the Austrian frontier.

The English Commissioner at Beyrout had been expelled the Province.

The Governor-General of India has issued a proclamation commanding that all the native allies of the British in the recent mutiny war be disarmed, as the rebels were reduced to a hopeless state of subjugation, and their forces annihilated.

The American ship Alert was wrecked on the Cape of Formosa in October, while on a voyage from Hong Kong to Shanghae, and 12 of the crew lost.

Sardinia.

The Sardinian Government has decided upon a loan. It was reported that the King of Sardinia was about to marry the sister of the Empress of Russia, the widow of the Duke of Leuchtenberg.

Paraguay and Brazil.

The Brazilian mails had arrived at Lisbon, bringing the news that the Brazilian Government had offered its mediation with Paraguay; that the American commander had accepted the offer, and that the Brazilian Admiral had gone to Paraguay on the mission.

Miscellaneous.—The Melbourne mails of the 18th of December had reached England, and gold valued at £568,000 was on its way there. The steamship City of Manchester left Liverpool for New York on the 2d inst. Warlike preparations are going forward actively in France, but the Ministerial journals are recommended to keep silent on the subject. The latest letters speak of the war symptoms being decidedly on the increase. Great anxiety was felt for the Emperor's speech at the opening of the Legislature on the 7th. It was rumored that he is preparing a surprise for the world, and that war is certain. The Minister of the Colonies had decided that the immigration of Africans shall be superseded by Chinese. There were rumors in England of extensive warlike preparations, including three thousand men for the navy. The marriage of Prince Napoleon and the King of Sardinia's daughter, was celebrated at Turin on the 20th (730th.) and the bridal party started forthwith to Paris. Turin letters say that matters looked slightly more pacific there. The Austrian six-million loan had been introduced in London. It bears five per cent. interest. It was quoted at a discount for some time, but sadlenly improved, and closed at a small premium.

LONDON, Saturday, Feb. 5.—There was a debate in the Commons last night on the engagement of the cultivation of cotton in India. The Bombay mail, of January 11, has been telegraphed. Various British successes were reported, including the defeat of Tantia Topee's forces.

Hayti.

NEW YORK, Feb. 23.—We have dates of the 6th from Hayti. All was quiet at Port-au-Prince and in the surrounding country. The supply of coffee was small.

By the Canada.

HALIFAX, Feb. 24.—The Cunard steamship Canada, Capt. Lang, arrived at this port at 8 o'clock this evening.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 12.—Continental affairs.—The political aspect of affairs on the Continent has undergone some change, and during the early part of the week more pacific rumors predominated, but the latest advices are of a more warlike character, notwithstanding the peaceful sentiments which have been uttered by the Emperor Napoleon, and his Minister Count Moruay.

Warlike Movements in France.—The action of the French Government goes far to weaken confidence in the Emperor's expressions of a desire for peace. Warlike preparations are still continued on a large scale in every military and naval department of France.

The Paris Bourse.—The Paris Bourse has fluctuated considerably during the week, and continues sensitive. The three per cents closed heavy at 68 francs.

England.

The proceedings of the English Parliament comprises nothing of general interest or importance. The London Stock Exchange had experienced but slight fluctuations during the week, but closed with some depression.

The Sardinian Loan.—The Sardinian Chamber of Deputies had ratified the loan of fifty millions of francs. Count Cavour explained that the loan was called for by the critical position of Italian affairs, and was designed to be used for the defense of Sardinia against the threatening attitude of Austria.

Austrian Military Movement.—Extensive military preparations are going forward in Austria; the movement of troops towards the Italian frontier continued.

India and China.

Later advices have been received in England from India and China. The Calcutta mail, of the 9th of January, had arrived, bringing dates from Hong Kong to the 30th of December. The advices received from India indicate a speedy termination of the war.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 12.—Napoleon's address to the French Legislative Assembly, delivered at its opening on the 7th inst., was pacific in its tone rather than its tendency, for its effect has been unfavorable to the tranquility of the public mind.

The latest important intelligence published by the London press says that the warlike preparations on the Continent for coming events are rather increased than slackened, and their continuance in France entirely neutralizes the effect of the Emperor's speech and proclamation.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, March 1, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current of Saturday the 26th ult.

The operations of the past week have been to a fair extent in most of our leading staples, and it will be seen that an advance has taken place in the rates for Sugar, while Molasses has gone off readily at firm prices. In Cotton, the movement was less active for several days, owing to the unfavorable tenor of the last advices, and the desire to be in possession of later European intelligence. This intelligence arrived with Liverpool dates to the 12th inst., and proved to be of a favorable character, a more active movement having token place in the Liverpool Cotton market, with a general advance in prices of an 1d. per pound, the improvement being attributed to the improved aspect of political affairs on the Continent and the favorable advices received from India and China. The advices from the manufacturing districts were of a very favorable character, there being a good demand for goods and yarns, with an advancing tendency in prices. The river has risen 6 inches since our last report, and is now 5 feet below high-water mark.

COTTON.—The business of the early part of the week was partially interrupted by a holiday, but the transactions, nevertheless, reached a fair extent, with sales for the first three days of 24,500 bales, without material change in prices, but with a firm market for the Middling and better grades. On Wednesday the Africa's advices were before the public, and being of an unfavorable tenor, especially in their political aspect, and still later advices being about due, our market presented a dull appearance, but few buyers coming forward. On Thursday buyers generally still kept aloof, awaiting the later European advices which were looked for with marked interest. On Friday the Canada's advices, seven days later than those previously in hand, were received, and being found of a more favorable tenor than had generally been expected, buyers were induced to come forward and operate very freely. The sales for the week amounted to 50,500 bales. Arrived during the past week 44,903 bales. Exports of the week 50,104 bales. Stock in presses and on shipboard not cleared on the 25th instant, 522,294 bales. With respect to prices, we have to remark that for a day or two past the tendency has been rather in favor of purchasers, but the foreign advices seemed to restore the market to more firmness, though factors generally manifested a willingness to meet buyers almost on the basis of our previous quotations, and were thus enabled to effect sales to the good extent already stated. We retain previous figures and insert some quotations for the Inferior and Ordinary grades:

New Orleans Classification.

Inferior	6 @ 7¼	Good Middling	11¾@12
Ordinary	8 @ 8¾	Middling Fair	12¼@12¾
Good Ordinary	9¾@ 9¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¼@10¾	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10¾@11	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 3,000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3¾ to 5; Common to Good Common 5¼ to 6; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 6¾; Prime to Choice 6¾ to 7¼; Centrifugal and Clarified 7¼ to 9¼; Refined 10 to — cents per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 6,000 hhds. The quotations are: For Inferior and Fermenting 28 to 31; Prime to Choice 32 to 33 in hhds. and in half-hhds. 34 to 37 cents per gallon.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs, planters, 4¼ to 5½; leaf, inferior to common 5½ to 8¼; fair 8½ to 7; fine 7¼ to 8¾; choice, heavy and light, 8¾ to 9 cents per pound.

FLOUR.—The sales of the week have reached 8,500 barrels, at a range of $4 50 to $4 87 for fine and unbranded; $5 25 to $5 50 for superfine; $6 50 to $6 75 for extra, and $7 25 to $7 75 for choice extra.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 38,000 sacks—prices ranging from 81 to 85 for ordinary to good mixed, and 87 to 90 cents per bushel for good white and yellow to prime white. Oats sell at 75 to 80 cents per bushel. Bran has been selling at $1 10 to $1 12½ cents per 100 lbs.

PORK.—The sales for the past week ranged at about $19 00 to $19 50 per barrel for Mess, and $13 50 for Prime.

BEEF.—With no transactions, we are unable to give reliable quotations.

BACON.—Shoulders 8 to 8¾; Ribbed Sides 10 to 10½; Clear Sides 11½ to 12; Sugar-cured Hams 12½ cents per pound.

LARD.—In barrels and tierces 11¼ to 12½; kegs 12½ to 13 cents per pound.

BUTTER.—Western has been selling at 10 to 15 cents per pound.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 11½ to 14 cents per yard; India Bagging at 13½ to 13½. Bale Rope, machine made, at 8¼ to 8¾ cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Have sold during the week at a range of 9 to 10 cents for light and medium, and 10¼ to 10½ for heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote ordinary to low fair at 10½ to 10¾, fair to good fair at 11 to 11½, and prime at 11½ cents per pound.

EXCHANGE.—The transactions in bills on England have been to a very fair extent. Prices have ruled much about as previously noted—clear bills 8¾ to 9¼ and 8½ per cent premium, according to signatures, and bills with shipping documents attached 7¼ to 7¾ and 7½ per cent. according to classification. Time drafts on the North are in fair request. We quote 60 days on New York, Boston, etc., ½ to 1¼ and 2 per cent. discount. Sight funds have been in active request. The sales made have been at from 7-16 to 9-16 for Bank checks and ½ to ¾ for out of door bills, closing nearly ½ for Bank checks and ¾ to 9-16 for out of door bills.

LIVE-STOCK.—Beef Cattle—Western, we quote at 11c. per pound, net, and good Texas at 10c, ordinary at 9c. Hogs, 6c. per lb. net. Sheep $2 75 to $4 00 perhead. Milch Cows, $40 to 80 per head. Veal Cattle, $12 00 to $13 00 per head.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 12.—Advices by the steamer Canada, report the sales of cotton for the week at 67,000 bales. All qualities of cotton had slightly advanced during the week, owing to the improved aspect of political affairs on the Continent, and the favorable advices received from India and China. Middling Orleans and middling Mobile have advanced ¼, and Uplands 1-16; and Fair American, of all classes, have advanced 1-16. The market closed active, at the following quotations: Fair Orleans, 7 7-16; Fair Mobile, 7 3-16; Fair Uplands, 6 15-16; Middling Orleans, 6 15-16; Middling Mobile, 6 13-16; Middling Uplands, 6¾. Some circulars say the advance is only 1-16, others set it down at 3-16. The broker's circular states the general advance at ¼.

LONDON, Feb. 12.—The funds have recovered from the depression of last week, and an advance of ¼ to ¾ on the quotations by the Prince Albert has been obtained. Consols for money closed at 95¼ to 95¾.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 12.—The advices from Manchester and the manufacturing districts are of a very favorable character. There was a good demand for goods and yarns, and the market closed with an advancing tendency. The demand for India goods was unusually active.

HAVRE, Feb. 11.—The Havre Cotton market closed firm. The sales of the week amount to 5000 bales. Orleans fers ordinaire closed at 99 francs.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 16.—The sales of Cotton for the three business days since the sailing of the Canada, amount to 32,000 bales.

The market opened buoyant, at an advance of 1-16 to ¼ on the quotations of last Friday, but closed quiet, and the closing quotations of last week were barely maintained under the effect of the Europa's advices. Middling Orleans, 7d.; Middling Uplands, 6¾d.

NEW YORK, Feb. 28.—The cotton market was active and with advancing tendency. The sales to-day amount to 4500 bales. Middling Uplands 11¼ to 12c. The Flour market is buoyant. Sales to-day were 18,000 bbls. at previous quotations. Corn dull; sales to-day 12,500 bushels at 84 to 85 for mixed. Pork is quiet. Eastern Mess is selling at 17.00 to 18.10. Lard closed dull at 11c. for tierces, and 12½c. for keg. Bacon steady at 8¾ to 9½ for sides, and 9¾ to 6¾c. for shoulders.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 28.—The Flour market closed with an advancing tendency; the sales to-day were 2000 bbls. at 5 60 to 5 70. Molasses steady at 36 to 37. Sugar 7¾ to 7¾. Coffee quiet, but steady at previous quotations.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 28.—The steamer Twilight and Aleck Scott arrived from New Orleans yesterday. The steamer Imperial left for New Orleans yesterday.

The Mississippi at this point has risen three feet and four inches during the last forty-eight hours, and still rising, with fourteen feet of water in the channel between here and Cairo.

The Illinois and Upper Mississippi are also rising. The Missouri river is at a low stage, and is still falling. It is reported that the Mississippi river is overflowing its banks below Carlo.

MEMPHIS, (Tenn.) Feb. 28.—The river at this point has risen four inches during the last twenty-four hours and is still rising. The water is now within twenty-three inches of the extreme high water mark.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN BOOKS.

Whenever we see a good thing we like to circulate it, to wit—

"Mind your Own Business, is an old injuction which cannot be too scrupulously observed. Especially would we urge it upon our Church in regard to our publishing interests. The time was when we had to depend upon others for our religious literature, not having a book or paper in the land that we could call our own. But our circumstances have changed; we now have an ample supply of weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies, the largest list of general religious reading books and Sunday school books printed in this (Southern) country, many of which have reached to an almost unparalleled circulation. Bodies we have multiplied greatly in our numbers and wealth. Only let us purchase, read and circulate the issues of our own press Orst, and as largely as they deserve, and we shall extend our achievements beyond the highest expectations of the most believing ours among us. Scarcely a day passes which does not reveal some new success of our press. Let the bo of good cheer then, and push on in our "great work;" rejoicing always and heartily in the great good being done by others, but attending faithfully to the peculiar work which God in his wise providence has assigned to us."

DONATION.

At the late Mississippi Conference it was announced that Capt. D. P. Cain, had presented a hogshead of Sugar to be sold, and the proceeds appropriated for the use of the Superannuated preachers, and the widows and orphans of preachers.

It was ordered, when sold, to be appropriated to a special case, under the direction of the Conference Stewards. I am requested by the Committee to whom it has been forwarded, in a draft on New Orleans for $65, 50—to say, through the Advocate, that Capt. Cain's donation has been received and applied as intended. T. C. THORNTON,

NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

All the Books Published by the Church, South—that is, the Books in the FIRST PART of the Catalogue issued at Nashville—we have, and sell at NASHVILLE PRICES. Of the SECOND PART, we have only the following Books, which we sell at the prices enhexed, less 25 per cent. on time, and 25 per cent. for cash.

Of these Books we have not time now to speak particularly. Suffice it at present to mention "Biedsoe's Theodicy" at $1 50, and in Turkey at $2—the greatest thunderbolt forged against Calvinism in three centuries. It has proved itself exceedingly troublesome to all of that faith; in fact, as "horrible" to them as the Decree was to Calvin.

Worthy of Imitation.

When at Jackson, Mississippi, second Sabbath in January, a proposition was made to raise one hundred dollars, to make the Methodist Church of that place a Shareholder in the Book and Tract Society. The Bible to be for the pulpit, and the Annuities to go to the Sunday school. It was responded to fully.

Since then, a response from three other Churches has been made. Are there not several other Churches in the Mississippi Conference that will contribute one hundred dollars for the same purpose?

I think at least two hundred congregations can be found to respond to this proposition, if the Preachers will bring it before them. Will they? I wait to hear. H. H. MONTGOMERY.

COMPLIMENTARY.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE,
FEBRUARY 23, 1859.

At a Meeting of the students of Dolbear's Commercial College, on Wednesday evening, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted—

Resolved, That the warm and tender interest which our worthy President has ever manifested in our personal welfare, success and happiness awakens our deepest gratitude and affection.

Resolved, That, for the recent expression of that interest so generously manifested in the anniversion of last Saturday, we respectfully tender him our sincerest thanks.

Resolved, That Messrs. Harrington, Royster and Ware are hereby appointed a committee to purchase and present him with some suitable testimonial of our respect, together with a copy of the above resolutions.

Resolved, That the above resolutions and Mr. Dolbear's reply be published in the Picayune, Delta, Crescent, Courier, True Witness and Advocate. J. D. ANDERSON, Chairman.

THOS. W. WRIGHT, Secretary.

MESSRS HARRINGTON, ROYSTER, WARE—Committee:

Gentlemen—Allow me to express to you my most sincere thanks for the very elegant manner in which you have discharged the duties which the warm hearted liberality of your fellow students have devolved on you.

For those kindly resolutions and this beautiful cane, be assured gentlemen students, one and all, I have no words to express the full sentiments of my heart.

They will ever be remembered with gratitude, with pride and pleasure, and cherished among the dearest memories of my life.

And let me say, gentlemen, without compliment, I have never seen students any where, or at any time, more entitled to the warmest regard and highest respect and consideration of all, than those now at this institution. To attain the highest positions and public good wishes you have only to continue as you have begun, industrious, studious, moral, temperate, and honorable in all things. Such, and such only, are worthy to control the destinies of this nation and the world. Accept again my thanks, gentlemen, and be assured of my best wishes for your prosperity and happiness. I will only ask of you and those who have been students of this institution heretofore, to extend to it your best wishes, so that soon it may annually number a thousand of the noblest sons of the South: New Orleans should be more than Athens ever was. It should be the great commercial,

LETTER FROM A LOG CABIN.

MR. EDITOR: Enclosed you will find the subscription money of a new subscriber for your most excellent paper, the Advocate. The N. O. C. Advocate has many friends up here, who will do all they can to extend its circulation.

The month of January has been most lovely—bright sunshiny days and fine moon-lit nights being the general rule, and not, as usual at this season, the exception. Indeed, so genial and warm have the past three weeks been, that many plum, peach and maple trees are budding and blooming, and mother Earth, instead of donning her usual mantle of pure white snow, is putting forth many tufts of green grass, and bunches of blue-eyed violets. Along with the delightful weather came four steamboats, puffing and squealing, arousing all animated nature generally, while three miles of the Bayou—causing a cheerful excitement, and bringing us backwoods folks in closer contact with the great moving world beyond. The glad shouts of happy school children do not, as yet, awaken the echoes along the banks of that portion of the Bartholemew which winds its way through the rich and fertile township of De Bastrop. A short time since, the 16th section was sold at an average of $18 per acre, for the support of schools. The funds arising from the sale will be quite sufficient for the erection of schoolhouses and the employing of competent teachers to instruct the children, and we sincerely hope the School Commissioners will act immediately in this important business. There are few or no Church buildings in this new and thriving township, but we are looking forward to "better times coming." The Methodists are the most numerous denomination, and ere the close of '59, will no De Bastrop with many neat log meeting houses. Last year, we met for worship under the wide spreading oaks and hickories, with the green grass for a carpet and rough logs for seats. I opine the prayers and songs of praise ascending from those lowly sanctuaries, were as acceptable to our Father above, as those of our wealthier brothers and sisters, reclining in their velvet cushioned pews. The Onachita Conference has the supervision over this part of Arkansas. With many good wishes for the present and future welfare of yourself and Advocate, I remain your friend,

OUR NEW CARPET.

"Well, my dear," said I to my wife, as I threw myself into an easy chair at the close of my down-town labors, "after the moving expenses are all settled, I shall have two hundred dollars clear. So much for economizing all winter. And Brown knows of a first-rate village lot I can buy cheap, for two hundred down, and the rest on long credit. And we can soon save enough to build on it. We shall have a home of our own before long, my dear."

I rubbed my hands as I spoke, with no small degree of self-gratulation, for a village home had been my ambition, and now it seemed almost within reach.

"Yes," said my wife hesitatingly; "but you've left one thing out of the calculation. We must have a new parlor carpet."

"A new parlor carpet!" echoed I dolefully. "Why I thought we concluded that the old one was good enough."

"So we did," said my wife, laying her hand coaxingly on my shoulder; "but it does look so faded and shabby—come to lay it down in a new house—and besides, it don't begin to fit the room here."

I was silent—this was a new phase entirely.

"Suppose we are a little extravagant for once, dear," resumed my wife, closely watching my countenance; "if we purchase a first-rate carpet, we shall be very careful of it, so that when we have a house of our own, it will answer just as well as a new one, and we have the use of it here in addition. And it certainly is cheaper in the long run to buy the best article."

I did not quite agree with this last reasoning on my wife's part, but still I thought there was a great deal in what she said. She had been a very good little economist since our marriage, and deserved a little indulgence.

"It will only be a few months additional labor on my part to make up the two hundred dollars," thought I, and said aloud: "Well, a new carpet be it then, my dear. How much will it require?"

"I can get beautiful velvet for fourteen shillings a yard."

"Velvet—that's rather too extravagant!" said I, alarmed. "Brussels or three-ply is quite good enough, I am sure."

"Oh, no!" exclaimed my wife. "Just consider, dear, it is for always, and the difference between the price will be so trifling."

I held out stoutly for some time, but my wife coaxed and cried, and at length I reluctantly capitulated, and disbursed sixty-one dollars and twenty-five cents to pay for thirty-five yards of velvet carpet.

Well, the carpet was bought, and very handsome it looked on the floor. The next day, much to my astonishment, my wife informed me that we must have new parlor chairs.

"New chairs!" I exclaimed in horror; "why, we had new ones last year!"

"Curled maple chairs on a velvet carpet! How ridiculous!"

"Not more ridiculous than spending money for what we don't want," was my somewhat tart reply.

"But what will Mrs. Smith say? And how will our furniture correspond? Six mahogany chairs and a sofa in hair-cloth wont cost much," sobbed my wife.

Alas! the first step had been taken, and the rest were easy. Suffice it to say, that I handed over a roll of bills (fifty dollars) to my wife to pay for the new furniture, and our parlor soon bloomed forth in cumsy mahogany, and hair-cloth, not half so pretty as our neat curled maple furniture, now promoted to the "spare room!"

My wife couldn't resist the temptation of inviting company to tea, in order that they might admire our beautiful carpet. Her china was old and cracked, and a new set "wouldn't cost much—for we must have things to correspond, you know."

So she expended twelve dollars on "a luve of a set—such a bargain!"

And then, the day before, she saw a cumsy mahogany centre table with a marble slab, which she could get for fourteen dollars, because one of the legs was cracked—"the best bargain in the world—and it would correspond so sweetly with the chairs!" and she bought it straightway.

An etagere for the bare space by the window was next necessary—my wife said we might as well get a nice one, while we were about it, and ordered one which cost twenty dollars—all "to correspond." A little before the tea-party she discovered that she hadn't "nothing to wear," and concluded that as she hadn't had a "nice dress" in two years, it would do no harm to be a little extravagant now, and a new robe silk, price twenty-five dollars, was the result.

Our guests arrived, and duly admired the carpet—the tea-party passed off very well, with the exception that old Mrs. Jones tipped back on one of our new chairs and split it across the back! Mrs. Smith would insist on bringing her baby, which had the measels, and in a short time our little Mary was taken with the same direful disorder. She was a delicate child and became very sick. The doctor prescribed the country, and we went for a few days accordingly, much to the benefit. On our return I added up our "carpet" expenses, as follows: carpet, 35 yards, at $1 75 per yard, $61 25; six chairs at $5 apiece, and sofa at 20, $50; china, $12; center-table, $14; etagere, $20; silk dress, $25; doctor's bill $8; country boarding and expenses, 15; total, $205 25—all on account of the new carpet, which we didn't need! My village lot has retired into the dim distance again—but it has been a good lesson to both of us. My wife, in particular, is heartily disgusted with "the horrid piece of extravagance," and our joint advise to all young married people is, "beware of new carpets!"

P. S.—I forgot to mention that during our absence in the country, the moths got into the "velvet" and nearly ruined it, and that our "cheap" center-table "fell to pieces in the most unaccountable manner. [Life Illustrated.

Garden, Farm, and Plantation.

Garden Vegetables and Their Origin.

Enjoying as we do a succession of healthful and delicious vegetables throughout the year, it is interesting to learn as much as possible of their origin and history. Some are natives, (indigenous,) but many are foreigners, (exotics.) We owe a debt of gratitude to those men who have lived before us and have introduced into our gardens these useful esculents. For the present, let us inquire into the origin of several of the most common vegetables. And first,

THE CABBAGE. This was first found growing wild on the cliffs of the sea-coast, in the South of England. In its native state, the plant is small and the leaves are few. The inhabitants of the district called it sea-colewort. In this state it was known to the ancient Romans, and was esteemed highly as an article of food. One would hardly have supposed that the little, wild plant, weighing only about an ounce, would give origin to the bouncing cabbage of our gardens, weighing often from fifteen to twenty pounds. Cultivation has already produced many varieties of cabbage, and the end is not yet. In a catalogue before us, we notice that one seedsman advertises twenty-two sorts for sale. The cauliflower and broccoli belong to the cabbage tribe; but they require more care in their management. The first named of these always reminds us of the saying of old Dr. Johnson, that "of all flowers, he admired none more than the cauliflower!"

LETTUCE came from the coast of the Levant and from one of the islands of the Greek Archipelago, as the name of one of its varieties (the Cos,) indicates. It was introduced into England in the year 1562. In its wild state, it was only a weed, so bitter and so strongly acented as to be disagreeable to the taste. Some sorts were even poisonous. It has now been run into many varieties. Lettuce has some of the medical properties of opium, soothing the nerves and inducing sleep. It is one of the most cooling and agreeable salads for the table.

THE TOMATO is a South American, and received its name from the Portugese colonists. It is of the same botanical family as the potato, (solanum,) and is now about as widely diffused. No vegetable has attained so great a popularity so suddenly. Twenty-five years ago it was but little known, and much detested. Then shortly it was introduced into gardens as an ornamental plant, called "love-apple." Then it became an ingredient in all sorts of pills and panacea. Now, it is everywhere cultivated as a delicious and healthy article of diet; it is served up raw and cooked, stewed and seasoned, stuffed and fried, and roasted; is used as a pickle, a catsup and a sweetment, and is preserved in air-tight cans for winter use. It contains a cooling acid, and possesses some of the medicinal qualities of calomel. Speaking of its use abroad, Mr. Loudon says: "Though a good deal used in England, in soups, and as a principle ingredient in a well known sauce for mutton, yet our estimation and uses of the fruit are nothing to those of the French and Italians, and especially the latter. Near Rome and Naples, whole fields are covered with it; and scarcely a dinner is served up in which it does not, in some way or other, form a part."

THE BEET ROOT came from Southern Europe, and was first found growing wild on the shore of the Mediterranean sea. It got its name in Greece, from the resemblance of its seed-vessel when swollen, to the Greek letter Beta. Most varieties contain a good deal of saccharine matter, and some of them so much, that in France, sugar is extensively manufactured from them.

TURNIPS were found wild in England and Holland; but in their primitive state they are small, worthless weeds, almost destitute of roots. They have been cultivated in gardens and fields for 250 years past. Cultivation has done as much for this vegetable as for any other. In the catalogue before referred to, we find fifteen kinds of seeds offered for sale. The finer kinds of turnip, if properly cooked and dressed, make a palatable dish for the table; though for persons of weak stomach they are hard of digestion. A preparation of turnip is sometimes used for coughs, hoarseness and other asthmatic disorders. Experience, as well as analysis, shows that the turnip is nutritious, nearly as much so as the potato; and in late years, when that crop was cut off in Ireland, great use was made of this valuable root. The importance of the turnip for feeding stock is too well known to be dwelt upon here.

THE CARROT hails from Spain, and has long been cultivated. Fessenden says it has been found growing wild in England; and Bulst adds that "it is supposed to have been introduced into Europe from the Island of Creta." The Spanish ladies anciently used to deck their hair with its beautiful green leaves, before its usefulness for food had become known. It was once supposed that the carrot was peculiarly beneficial in pulmonary affections. As a food for horses and cattle, it is unsurpassed in excellence.

THE POTATO—Its birth-place does not seem to be as certainly known now, as it was supposed to be a few years ago. It is commonly ascribed, however, to Peru, and Chili. One writer says it was first carried to Spain from the mountains near Quito. It found its way into England by another route, having been brought from South America to Virginia, in 1584, and thence carried over to England by Sir Walter Raleigh, in 1856. On its first introduction, it encountered many prejudices, some persons utterly refusing to taste it, declaring it was fit only for swine. But it soon made its way to popularity, and is now the most useful vegetable in the world. A writer happily observes: "With the lower classes of people, it is one of the greatest blessings the soil produces, forming flour without a mill, and bread without an oven; and at seasons of the year, an agreeable, wholesome dish, without the use of expensive condiments."

THE ARTICHOKE originated everywhere; at least, it has been found wild in Europe and Asia, and in both North and South America. It is a maritime plant, grows best in a moist soil, and likes an occasional dressing of salt.

THE RADISH is a Chinaman, and was first introduced into England in 1584. It will not fatten anybody, but it makes a fine relish with other food, and may have a corner in every garden, where liked.

Finally, let not the memorable ONION fall of an honorable notice. It was known to the Egyptians some 2000 years before the Christian era, and was worshiped by the ancient Egyptians as a god. It used to be called Unio, because the bulb never divided; hence the English name onion. Disagreeable as its smell is, it has been long in use by every nation on earth, as a seasoning for meats and soups. It gives an oxcellent relish to other articles of food, and possesses nutriment, and medicinal qualities of considerable value. Scientific analysis declares that it is composed of "water, sulphur, phosphoric and acetic acids, some vegeto-animal matter, and a little manna." We hope that this piece of information will improve its odor for our learned readers; but for common folks, we will add that a few leaves of parsley eaten after partaking of onions, will remove the scent and help their digestion. Obituaries.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

JOEL REYNOLDS, infant son of Wm. H. and Elizabeth R. Huntington, aged 5 months and 27 days, died in Marion, Alabama, on the 9th ult. after a long and painful illness. A poet has sung of the "Lovely appearance of death"—a very questionable sentiment, whether considered by the light of Revelation, or by the standard of universal experience. But if there is beauty or poetry in death, it must be in a case of this kind, an infant, whose pure unspotted spirit has fled and found refuge in the bosom of God, and left us its lovely clay, unworn by years, and unmarked by anxiety and care, over which we mourn, and lament in sadness its early departure from earth. The frost of death has nipped the bud before its opening petals had disclosed their beauty and their full proportions, or shed their fragrance on our delighted senses; and thus disappointment is mingled with grief, which increases the bitterness of the cup. Such were the facts in the case we now chronicle to surviving friends. But why mourn? why lament its departure? since Christ has said: "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God."

"I take these little lambs, said he,
And lay them in my breast;
Protection they shall find in me,
In me be ever blest."

SYMPATHY.

MISS MARY CRAWFORD COLE died in Daleville, Miss., after an illness of two days, 19th January, 1859. She was born in Kemper county, Miss., in December, 1840. She obeyed, by her peculiar amiability, to be disqualified for the trials through which mortals are called to pass. By her mother she was early taught to pray, which duty she strictly adhered to. A few years ago, she professed saving faith in Josus, and joined the M. E. Church and remained a consistent member. She grew up as peaceable as a lamb, seldom speaking a cross word to any one, white or black, and became endeared to all who knew her. She told her mother she was going to die, and in answer to the question, twice repeated: "Are you willing to die, Mary?" she answered emphatically, "Yes." After this, her death was as sudden, no opportunity was afforded of conversing with her further; but her friends truly believe God took her to himself. A sister and brother are gone before, and three are left behind, who with a mother and absent father, are sadly bereaved—for all loved Mary, perhaps too well.

JAS. B. RAMSEY.

MRS. ELIZABETH P. MAXWELL, a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for eighteen or nineteen years, wife of Joseph Maxwell; died January 20th, 1859, about fifty-seven years old, in Monroe county, Alabama. She suffered much, was never heard to complain, but endured her suffering with perfect Christian resignation. She had the untiring attention of her devoted husband, of many kind friends; and the best medical aid. She died in the full triumphs of faith. Left a bright and lasting testimony, that all was well. A short time before she died, in speaking of death, she said her Savior was with her, and that she would soon be with her sainted mother in Heaven. Thus died a dutiful and loving wife, an affectionate and kind friend, and devoted Christian.

A FRIEND.

ANNA LETTITIA, infant daughter of Rev. G. H. and Mrs. L. B. Clinton, died of pneumonia on the 17th inst., after a most painful and protracted illness. For the brief space of 6 months and 19 days this lovely babe gladdened the hearts of her parents; then was transplanted to the company of Heaven. May God grant to give them the comforts of His grace and the sanctified use of this painful dispensation of His providence.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your pro parations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser, was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known to North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]
Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 16 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WISER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly; by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning—(Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursling infant. But to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharges to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; one is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.
These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WISER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

Helmbold Extract of Buchu,
Read! Read! Read!—"Ye afflicted read" the following Certificate of a cure of over 20 years' standing.
H. T. HELMBOLD.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous in you in assisting you to introduce the medicine, I am truly yours, M. MCCORMICK.

The Goddess Hygeia!
When Hygeia lent medicinal aid to man,
And taught him all his evils how to scan,
Not to a favored few she shewed the way—
To staunch the wound and all its pain allay—
Not to the few who need claim physic theirs,
And think but what they give legitimate wares,
No! to all human-kind command she gave,
"Employ your skill, and your sick brother save."
So went he forth the Magic Salve to find—
The Magic Salve that now heals all mankind:
Nor Wounds nor Bruises, nor Cut, can long remain,
Nor Scar its rude appearance long retain,
Use it—you'll find we are not truth's detractor,
For you'll be healed by
Dalley's Pain Extractor,
The only sure, effective and complete remedy for Bruises Scalds, Eruption, Piles, or any Cutaneous disease whatever.

Wiser's Canadian Vermifuge.
Of all the pernicious humbugs that ignorance ever preached, the doctrine that internal worms are not injurious, is the most cruel. They engender incurable diseases of the stomach and bowels, and are the truthful causes of Chronic Diarrhœa and Chronic Dysentery, Inflammation of the Mesentery, Epileptic Fits, Insanity, Imbecility, Consumption and Apoplexy. In fact the disease saps the very fountains of vitality, and leads with absolute certainty, unless arrested in time, to an early death. Let Parents reflect on these undeniable facts, and remove the danger in time with that infallible preparation, which the faculty have pronounced a specific, WISER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE.

Facts for Parents.
What, in the opinion of physicians, is the most common and fatal disease of children? Ans. Worms.
What are the ordinary symptoms? Ans. A pale cadaverous complexion, dullness of the eyes, swelling of the upper lip, unpleasant breath, itching of the nose, disturbed sleep, a dry cough, fits of voracity, nausea, and general feebleness, listlessness and emaciation.
What is the safest and most certain means of relief? Ans. WISER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, a medicine without any mineral ingredient, mild in its operation, and guaranteed in all cases, to effect a rapid and complete cure.

To Mothers.
Save your children, mothers save,
Those yun cherish, from the grave,
Worms of youthful life the bane,
Source of feebleness and pain,
Leading soon, if uncontrolled,
To disorders manifold:
May with certinity be cured,
And your darlings health secured.
Would you brace each wasted limb,
Brighten eyes with languor dim,
Rapidly the cause remove,
Of disease, from those you love;
And to cheeks once cherry red,
But now pale'd as the dead,
Bring back natures living rouge?
Use, "CANADIAN VERMIFUGE."

Wiser's Canadian Vermifuge is the only certain and safe remedy for every species of worms.

We Dont Want Any Other.
Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell my other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Wiser's Vermifuge owes its unrivalled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, as this alone it has always depended, and were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of this kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

Beware of Colonel.
The public generally may not be aware that nearly all Worm Lozenges contain calomel, and that the lives of children are thereby endangered; parents should remember this, for although medicine may be easily administered when in the form of Lozenges or Candies of any description, yet the danger that is incurred outweighs the advantages, besides Calomel very often fails in accomplishing the desired object, it is by no means to be depended on as a remedy for Worms, and it is not now as generally resorted to by physicians as it was a few years ago, they have become convinced of the danger of its use and of the uncertainty with which it acts, and have prudently and wisely resorted to other means by which these objections are obviate.
Physicians generally now use WISER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, this medicine is a simple vegetable preparation and can always be administered with perfect safety and confidence as to the result, as it will always destroy Worms

LETTER FROM CHINA.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, December 6, 1858.

MY DEAR BROTHER:—You will have heard long before this reaches you of the peaceable state of affairs in the East at present, and especially in this part of it, the Celestial, or Flowery land."

The whole East is now fairly open to Missionary labor. "The harvest truly is ripe, but the laborers are few."—The thought of such masses of our fellow-men being now accessible to the gospel, and calling for the aid of Christian nations, is almost overwhelming. Surely the idolatrous East is open to the help of all nations, and to such an extent as no past history of any nation has a parallel. India, China, and Japan, but a few years since, were closed to the truths of Christianity. Now in India, Christianity is to be made the basis of the government. Japan is eager to cultivate the intercourse of other nations, and soon we hope to see the heralds of the Cross of Christ planting the standard of Prince Messiah there, and preaching the purity of the gospel of Jesus to them. In China, Christianity is tolerated, and those who embrace it are protected by the government from any outrages of the Mandarins or populace. The same God who has been pouring out His Spirit upon our people and feeding them with the bread from heaven, has, in the same period of time, wrought changes in these three empires of moral darkness which astonish the world. The very strongholds of Satan and idolatry are now being broken up. Who can deny the hand of an all-wise Providence in this? It is not chance which brings about such great results. If the Church does her duty, these lands will not be left unoccupied. God has opened the way and manifested, by such glorious displays of His goodness, in the outpouring of His Spirit upon Christian nations, that the time has arrived when these barren lands shall be occupied and made to flourish as a fruitful vineyard. When we are disposed to work, God is willing to lend his aid. Let not India, China, or Japan be longer without men enough to send the gospel every part and preach the unsearchable riches of Christ. I know there are many difficulties in the way, but when God is for us, none can be against us. Who are willing to engage in this glorious work? Are there not hundreds, from the tens of thousands converted to God in 1858, willing to enlist under the banner of the Prince of Peace and plant it in a heathen land? I know there is not the promise of much of this world's goods; but, on the other hand, many difficulties, trials, cares and crosses are in the way. But should that deter us from so good a work? The child of God must expect that if he does the will of his Heavenly Father he shall more, it is to be found among a heathen people. Put our watchword is, toil, labor and pray more for the peace of God, which alone is able to sustain us; for the crown is in the end, and rest forever more. Our life is a continual warfare with the powers of darkness, but if faithful and true to our posts, we are sure of victory and the crown of life.

We are greatly cheered in this far-off land, by the joyful news, which is continually being wafted across the great deep, concerning the great revival in our native land. Praise be unto God in the highest for such manifestations of His Glory! On the 25th of November a thanksgiving meeting was held here by all the Missionaries and many of the foreign residents, and there was much feeling on the occasion. Mention was made of the great revival in America, and all rejoice in such evidences of Divine Providence, to hasten the kingdom of our blessed Redeemer. This great revival, commensurate with the vast opening for Missionary labor in the East, is certainly an indication of the workings of an all-wise Providence, to the glory of His name and for the good of His people in the establishment of His kingdom among men.

All is quiet at Shanghai. Commissioner Reed has just left for the United States. Lord Elgin is now on an expedition up the Yang-Tsz, and has been out over four weeks. News came that he had some difficulty in passing through the provinces of the Rebels, and that he was fired into as he passed Nankin, and that the fire was returned. We cannot know the exact truth of this until Lord Elgin returns, which we hope will be in a few days. Baron Gros, the French Minister, left here about the 5th November, on the Laplace, and on the Sabbath following she was a wreck. Three lives were lost, and they suppose the entire ship will be a total loss. Ningpo has been of late greatly disturbed by local banditti. Awful reports come to us concerning the barbarity of the Rebels in slaying men, women and children. I had a report from a Chinaman last week to this effect—that the Rebels occupying a city in Kiang-se province, were surrounded by Imperialists, and they (the Imperialists) were surrounded by a large Rebel force. Consequently the Imperial soldiers had no communication with their own forces, and were compelled to eat the flesh of each other, and that one pound of human flesh was sold for one thousand cash, which is equal to one dollar. France and Spain are at war with Coohin-China.

All is quiet at Canton, and we hope the treaty we now have will be adhered to in all its parts by the Chinese government. If so, we have much to hope in the rapid advancement of Christianity in this heathen land.

During this year Missionaries have gone into various parts of China, and have preached the inspired word of God without molestation. It is to be hoped that next year the efforts of the different Missionaries may be crowned with the best of success. Cannot our Church send us more laborers? There is Bro. Kelley; we know him, and know that in him the Church will have an efficient and hard-working missionary. Why not send him? We want him and any others you can send us. Our Church in Shanghai must be extended. We want a Conference in this Province. Approval, assistance, and co-operation on the part of our Church are alone wanted. Then the work can and shall, by the help of God, be done. We have ten native members. One of them is an assistant in preaching, and one or two others we hope will soon use their endeavors to impart the truths of the Gospel to others.

Pray for us in China and help us all you can. Work for the redemption of China in some way, and may the Lord bless all your efforts.

I am ever yours in Christ, JAS. WILLIAM LAMBUTH.

MONUMENT TO BISHOP ASBURY.

THE Baltimore Methodists are moving in behalf of a monument to the memory of Bishop Asbury. Such a monument ought to be equal to anything of the kind in Europe or America. Asbury was the father of American Methodism, and the greatest man, taken all in all, ever connected with its history, or, indeed, with the history of Protestantism in this country. He was not adequately known to the Methodists of the present day until yesterday, as it were. Dr. Strickland's book, in connection with other recently published recollections, has unwonkened them to a partial appreciation of his talents, character, and astonishing labors. His relation to the Methodist Church, and its wealth, and self-respect demand that the Methodists of the present day should erect such a monument as will be in harmony with the character of Asbury, the importance of the Church, and their pecuniary ability. It should be equal to the Washington monument, and should be built at the cost of all branches of American Methodism. Such a monument, would help to rescue from unmerited obscurity, one of the grandest personal histories in the world, and would ennoble the history of the Church.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

ARMINIANISM AND CALVINISM.

MR. EDITOR:—With your permission I will, under the above heading, furnish some articles in relation to the tenets held by Arminians and Calvinists; taking such range as suits me, and gathering my matter from any source or sources I please—selected or original.

There are many important points held in common by Arminians and Calvinists. I would remark just here however, that I mean Arminianism as held by the people known as Methodists.

Arminians and Calvinists both believe in the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, and both reject the Apocrypha as spurious and uninspired.

Both Arminians and Calvinists believe in the eternal and unoriginated Divinity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

Both Arminians and Calvinists believe in the Fall of Man from a state of original innocence; and that "original sin standeth not in the following of Adam, (as the Pelagians do vainly talk,) but it is the corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and of his own nature inclined to evil, and that continually."

They are agreed in saying that "the condition of man after the fall of Adam, is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and works, to faith and calling on God; wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will."

They are agreed in saying that there is one Christ, very God and very man, who truly suffered—was crucified, died and was buried—to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for the actual sins of men.

They are agreed in saying that—"We are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our works or deservings." And both say—that "we are justified by faith only;" and that it is "a most wholesome doctrine and very full of comfort."

They agree in teaching the necessity of Regeneration, and that it is a work wrought in us by the Holy Ghost.

They agree in believing in the resurrection of the dead—in future rewards and punishments—in the endless misery of the wicked, and the endless blessedness of the righteous.

In regard to the moral law they hold the same views, and insist on the same practice.

These views they hold in common, but do not put the same construction on them—one attaching more or less meaning to some of these doctrines than the other. As, for example, in relation to the atonement and the salvation of such as are saved—the Calvinists hold and occasionally teach that: "By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others fore-ordained to everlasting death." And that—"These angels and men, thus predestinated and fore-ordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished." And that: "Those of mankind that are predestined unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ, unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverence in any of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereunto; and all to the praise of his glorious grace." And that: "As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath he by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, fore-ordained all the means thereunto. Wherefore they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are elected by Christ, are effectually called unto faith in Christ by his spirit working in due season, are justified, adopted, sanctified and kept by his power through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified and saved, but the elect only."

And that: "The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by and ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice." Confession of Faith, pages 27-30.

The Arminians do not hold these views in relation to the extent of atonement—or to the purposes of God concerning man. But as I propose short articles, I will give their views in my next. VERITAS.

SHAKESPEARE AND HIS ORTHODOXY.

THE biographers of the immortal bard have been numerous, but very few have said anything of his religious character; and many, perhaps, may feel surprised that one of our brethren in Maine has proposed to deliver a lecture on the passages of Scripture illustrated by Shakespeare. The poet is usually thought of as being entirely careless of religion, or as simply resting for eternal happiness on his morality in the latter years of his life. But there are two or three facts which may tend to raise our estimation of the bard in this matter.

We lay here but little stress on his beautiful reference to Palestine, in his Henry IV.

> Those holy fields,
> Over whose acres walked those blessed feet,
> Which, fourteen hundred years ago, were nailed
> For our advantage on the bitter cross.

But there are two facts which go far to encourage our hopes as to his real Christianity.

It will be remembered that he entirely abandoned the stage, and left London 1610, and retired to Stratford-on-Avon, his native place, where he died in 1616. During this period it would seem that he and his family attended his parish Church, where the Rev. Richard Byfield, an eminent Puritan minister and father of the distinguished commentator on the Epistle to the Colossians, commenced his lengthened ministry 1596.

Richard Byfield was an energetic and faithful minister of Christ, and we may hope, both from his character and from the fact of Shakespeare being his constant hearer, that some Christian sympathy existed between them.

But there is another still more hopeful circumstance. Shakespeare's will was written in April, 1616, and is remarkable for its Protestant and evangelical character. He says, "First I commend my soul into the hands of God, my Creator—hoping, and assuredly believing, through the merits of Jesus Christ, my Savior, to be made partaker of life everlasting—and my body to the earth whereof it was made."

I am disposed, now that my pen is in my hand, to a tradition in reference to the funeral sermon delivered for Shakespeare by the minister of the Church he attended; and I do this the more readily, as I am not sure that it has been printed. A very old lady, who was a native of the neighborhood, told me fifty years ago that she learnt from her grandmother, who heard the sermon, that the congregation in attendance on that occasion was very large and very serious in their feelings; and the preacher was very animated and eloquent, and that after describing the intellectual character of Shakespeare at great length, and avowing his opinion that no man, since the days of the Apostle Paul, had possessed so profound an acquaintance with all the diversified forms of human nature, he burst into tears, and exclaimed, "Would to God he had been a divine!" A wish in which he will yet have sympathy of many.—Watchman & Reflector.

We subjoin a sonnet of Shakespeare, a careful reading of which will, we think, leave no doubt of his orthodoxy:

> Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth,
> Fooled by those rebel powers that thee array,
> Why dost thou pine within and suffer dearth,
> Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
> Why so large cost, having so short a lease,
> Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?
> Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
> Eat up thy charge? Is this thy body's end?
> Then soul, live thou upon thy servant's loan,
> And let that pine to aggravate thy store;
> Buy terms divine in selling hours of dross;
> Within be fed, without be rich no more.
> So shalt thou feed on death, that feeds on men,
> And death, once dead, there's no more dying then.

ALABAMA CORRESPONDENCE.

Improvement of Marion—Schools—Dr. Neely's Lecture—Centenary Institute—Alabama Depository.

IN THE town of Marion, where your correspondent resides, we have evidences of improvement in the way of building etc—the "burnt district," is at last being rebuilt, also some large and elegant private residences, which will add very much to the beauty of the place. The principle draw-back however, to improvement of this kind, is the high rates at which real estate is held—approximating very nearly to city prices. Building lots that a few years ago sold for hundreds, are now commanding thousands of dollars, and very much in demand at that. I suppose this is to be accounted for in the increased facilities afforded to the community by the M. and C. Railroad, terminating at this place; and intersecting by railroad with Union Town on the west, and Selma on the east; places, heretofore, almost inaccessible to us in certain seasons of the year; which, taken with the educational facilities, make it a desirable place of residence, and consequently the prices of real estate have been advanced to their present rates. In the way of schools, we have, as you are aware, the Howard College, and the Judson Female Institute, both Baptist: they are extensively patronized by that denomination. We have also the Marion Female Seminary, under the supervision of Professor Armstrong, who stands deservedly high as an educator of youth, as well as an eloquent preacher of the gospel. This school is not under the patronage of any particular denomination, but is patronized by the Presbyterians and Methodists, and others who claim no denominational affinities. In addition to these we have several schools for boys—one of them in connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church, under the Rev. Mr. Stickney. The people of Marion are proud of their schools, and justly so too, though we sometimes think them rather vain, in claiming to be "the Athens of the South."

Speaking of schools: a few days ago, I visited Summerfield, in company with the Rev. Dr. Neely, who was to deliver a lecture for the benefit of the young ladies' Literary Societies of the Centenary Institute. The object contemplated is, the erection of two seperate and suitable halls for the use of the societies—a noble enterprize, undertaken under the auspices of their energetic and enterprising president, the Rev. Joseph T. Montgomery, at whose solicitation the lecture was delivered. It was a dark and cloudy evening, and decidedly one of the coldest we have had this winter. But notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, and the doubts of many as to the probability of the lecture being delivered at such an unfavorable time, the Methodist Church was well nigh filled, and the audience was delightfully entertained as well as instructed by the eloquent lecturer, whose theme for the occasion was, "THE DIGNITY OF LABOR." To those acquainted with Dr. Neely nothing need be said of the character of the effort; his well-known reputation as a pulpit orator is a sufficient guarantee of its excellence. But as lecturing is rather a novel work to him, and by no means common in the South, it may be well enough to remark that the Rev. gentleman more than met the excited expectations of his delighted audience. His rebukes to the indolent, ease-loving, self-complacent sprouts of humanity, who affect to look upon labor as degrading, and hold in the scale of inferiority the hard-working, horney-handed, honest laborer, were withering in the extreme; while the sarcasm and irony with which they were administered, made them scathingly severe. If any of the soft-handed and soft-headed gentry, or idle parlor-play-things of the still softer sex were present, they must have felt their insignificance, and we would charitably hope, repented of their folly. The amount realized received at the door, with subscriptions volunteered at the close of the lecture, was over three hundred dollars! The same lecture was repeated a few evenings after in Selma, I learn, with similar results.

I am informed that President Montgomery has not only secured the services of Dr. Neely to deliver an occasional lecture in the course of his peregrinations through this part of the Conference, but that he has also engaged others to aid in the same way his laudable undertaking. A capital plan, in the opinion of many, and the better, because of its novelty. It would be well if the people of the South would bestow more attention upon this branch of culture; it would prove both recreative and instructive, and might be turned to a good account in more ways than one.

I have been intimately acquainted as well as officially associated with Centenary Institute from its beginning, and until the last two or three years an annual visitor; and it affords me much pleasure to say, that I found it prosperous beyond any precedent in its history. It is now one of the largest and most extensively patronized institutions of learning in the State. The Methodists of Alabama, with such facilities for educating their daughters as are afforded by their own Church at Tuskegee, Tuskaloosa and Summerfield—to say nothing of several others every way worthy of patronage, though not so extensively known—will not need to send to schools under other auspices; schools too, where the sanctity of home instruction is perverted, and the precepts and pious prejudices of godly parents have been set aside to make room for dogma's intolerant and exclusive, by the arts and subtleties of a system of proselytism that would do honor to Ignatius Loyola, and that rarely fails of its object.

Mr. Montgomery's success in bringing up the Female department of Centenary Institute to its present prosperous condition in so short a time has been a matter of astonishment to many, and elicited no little criticism from others. But why not similar surprise in the case of Mr. Connerly, the able and efficient Principal in the Male Department? He has been nearly, if not quite, equally successful, and no man that knows Mr. C. will ever charge him with "claptrap," or suspect him of resorting to "humbug," that only popular element in many similar enterprises of the present day. No, Mr. Editor, those gentlemen are fair specimens of what industry and well directed energy, combined with a noble generosity, will do. For, while they seek the patronage of the wealthy and others able to pay, the poor and promising boy or girl is not passed by because of their poverty, and left to plod their way through life in ignorance. Nor does their generosity wait for appeals to arouse it to action. Examples might be given, but respect for the feelings of those concerned forbids it. It is gratifying to know that such acts of benevolence find a response in the public mind, and large-hearted liberality will always meet with its reward. As Secretary of the Alabama Conference, I take this occasion to thank you for your elaborate notice of the doings of our Conference, in your favorable review of the "Minutes." You noticed in your last, one of our most prominent if not the most prominent enterprise of the session—the Book and Tract Society, and the establishment of a Depository in the city of Mobile. The enterprise is taking wonderfully with the people, and persons in and out of the Church are becoming shareholders. I am informed by one of the agents that upwards of thirty thousand dollars are already subscribed, and the prospect for the whole amount contemplated by the Conference, is very flattering. THOS. W. DORMAN.

THE BIBLE CAUSE IN ALABAMA.

The following, from our friend and brother, Rev. C. D. OLIVER, will be read with pleasure and profit. The American Bible Society, and the Alabama Conference, made a wise selection in their Agent. The names of places and persons in this communication are so familiar and pleasant to our memory, that we almost envy our brother the privilege of visiting them. East Alabama is a delightful country, and exceedingly productive of warm-hearted people. The very roads, houses, faces, voices, are as distinct in our recollection as though we left them yesterday. We must go there again, if God be willing. We really must. We hope Mr. Oliver, at the close of each sermon for the Bible, exhorted for the Advocate.

MR. EDITOR:—Since the Conference at Macon, I have been more or less engaged in the business of my Agency. I suppose you know that I am the Agent of the American Bible Society for the State of Alabama, commissioned by that Society, and appointed to that work by Bishop Paine at our last Conference. I have met with encouraging success up to the present time. Recently I have been acting for the Alabama Bible Society, located at Montgomery. The history and objects of that Society are interesting. Mr. Abner McGehee, before his death, purchased a house in the principal business street of the city, and made a donation of it to the Bible Society as a Bible House. It is worth between fifteen and twenty thousand dollars. Several members of the different Churches gave for the permanent establishment of the institution $500 each. The interest on the fund raised, and the rent of a portion of the House, go to the purchasing of Bibles, and the carrying on of the business generally. The officers of that Society are influential, active, pious men, who carefully and sacredly attend to all its interests. They have undertaken to supply some fifteen counties, lying mostly east of the Alabama river—Montgomery, Lowndes, Macon, Tallapoosa, Coosa, Chambers, Russell, Barbour, Pike, Dale, Henry, Covington, Coffee, etc. This field has been but partially explored, and more than one thousand families have been found without the word of God. On the 16th of January, being in Montgomery on my way from Mobile, I attended the anniversary of their Society, held in the Presbyterian Church, and by request of the President, Mr. E. A. Holt, made an address. The Report of the Secretary, Mr. Rich. Jones, was an able paper, and the meeting was, I think, a very profitable one. I was requested by the Board of Managers to travel through their field, and to solicit donations to their Society in aiding them to carry out their purposes of Bible distribution. So on the 24th of January, I entered upon that work, and will report in part my success.

I began regular work at Union Springs, which I reached through an exceedingly muddy road, on the 26th of January. Stopped with Col. Richard H. Powell, and was kindly entertained. That night, by the consent of the Pastor, took up a collection in the Presbyterian Church. Next day operated privately and raised $29 75. At night stopped with Dr. N. B. Powell, on the Channenaggen, and received true Virginia hospitality and something for my cause. The following morning was quite rainy, but I pressed forward, and by twelve o'clock reached Hardaway, and took dinner with Rev. Geo. Stewart. Drop the last l in his name and write d, and put the word faithful before it, and you have the man. His neighbors have great confidence in him. He gave liberally to my cause. He, his brother Charles, and brother-in-law, gave me $50. Before night of the same day, found myself in Enon. Here I met my good old friend and brother James Banks and two of his sons, formerly of Elbert county, Ga. It was refreshing to meet with these and others, who were ready to acknowledge the claims of the Bible. Obtained here $60, and expect to receive more from the same quarter.

Saturday morning, 29th. Left for Glenville. A very heavy rain had fallen the night before, and friends advised me to leave my buggy and take it horseback, which I did, and in doing so, acted wisely, for I have no idea that I could have gotten along with it. Before sunset I reached the point of destination. Met with the Rev. Mr. McCarty, the Pastor of the M. E. Church, who took me with him to brother Truetlen's, where I felt quite at home, being treated with great kindness by himself and wife. Here I met with Rev. John W. Lamy, P. E. of Eufala District, who was attending his first quarterly meeting for this place. He promises to fill his responsible office with both dignity and usefulness. At night I preached. Next morning the weather was rainy, yet I had the pleasure of mingling with the people of God in prayer meeting. At 11, Bro. Lancy preached and administered the sacrament, being assisted by several clerical brethren present. At night, I presented my cause and took up a good collection. Received at Glenville about $143 55. Brothers Glean, Barnett and Mitchell gave each $25. Some others did finely. I was much pleased to meet with some who knew me in my boyhood and were intimate friends of my parents.

Glenville is a pleasant place. Has two good Schools, male and female. The Church is now in a good condition, and will, I trust, greatly prosper under the labors of its able and devoted pastor.

I spent the last night of my stay in Glenville with Rev. Jas. E. Clement. His kind wife and himself made me almost forget my absence from home. It would have amused you to have seen us eating sugar cane. We devoured it with a boyish relish and independence. You, Mr. Editor, live too much in the midst of it to appreciate our taste for it, for there can be too much of a good thing.

I went from Glenville to Eufala and stopped with Mrs. Col. McDonald, widow of Col. Alex. McDonald, whose house is literally the preacher's home; for several of the pastors of the M. E. Church have lived with her and hold her in high esteem. Here I met with Rev. Wm. M. Motley, their present pastor, whose company I much enjoyed, and whose help to my cause I gladly acknowledge. For besides making a very liberal contribution himself, he assisted me in my collections from others. Brother Motley is popular and useful in his field of labor.

Saturday night, 5th Feb., met with the Young Men's Christian Association, and gave them an address. This Association, composed of religious and intelligent young men, with Wm. H. Chambers, Esq. as their President, must accomplish much good. Sabbath morning I opened Sabbath School and gave a talk. Preached at 11 A. M. at M. E. Church. In the afternoon at the Presbyterian Church, and at night again at the Methodist Church. Monday night, conducted Young Men's prayer meeting. Received in subscriptions and cash, from Eufala, $176 75. Of this amount $17 80 from the Presbyterian Church.

Through the kindness of Rev. Dow Perry, I received $20 00, which he collected at Cotton Valley on the second Sabbath for the Bible cause.

On my return home, I stopped with Sister Rush, near Tuskegee, widow of my dear old friend Charles G. Rush, who was my faithful adviser when I first joined the Conference, and was stationed at Tuskegee. His memory is blessed, too much can hardly be said of him. Many orphans and widows will no doubt rise up in another world and call him blessed. His aged widow is lying in feeble health, and waiting, in the patience of the gospel, until her change comes. I believe all their children are members of the Church. How much this speaks for a godly example and teaching on the part of parents.

Saturday, 12th. Went into Tuskegee and stopped, according to promise, with a long-known friend, Dr. W. A. Lipscomb, President of the Methodist Female College.

Sunday, 13th. At eleven A. M., preached a Bible sermon in the chapel of the Female College, to a large and brilliant audience. The Minister of the Presbyterian Church, Rev. Mr. Small, and of the Methodist Church, Rev. Mr. Matthews, were present with their people. Our collection was a very good one. The amount received on that occasion and privately was about one hundred and eighty-three dollars. Preached at night to a large congregation.

It is due Dr. Lipscomb to say, that he manifested great interest on the occasion, by not only contributing liberally to the Bible cause, but by making everything pleasant and accommodating about the large and beautiful chapel. The Professors of music connected with the chapel and their pupils sang charmingly the hymns selected for the occasion. A lovelier collection of young ladies I have never seen in any institution. They are beautiful in manners and in person, being trained according to the best models of female character. The President of this College is too well known throughout the nation, for his elegant scholarship and refined taste, for me to add to his reputation. A young lady educated under him will never be in ignorance of what constitutes a real Christian gentleman. He is assisted by Professors Price and Jones, both graduates of the State University, and by others, who heartily co-operate with him in all his plans to make complete scholars and true women of all those committed to his care.

This noble Institution is an honor to all those who have aided in its establishment; for it has sent out, and will continue to send out, educated women, as centres of a wide and refining influence. An educated daughter, when she returns to her home, elevates the taste and habits of the entire household. All defer to her opinions and allow her to be a sort of umpire in all matters of taste.

May this great educational and moral power never want for friends or patronage. Some friend of female education would perform a noble act—one for which he should be held in perpetual remembrance—who should make a donation of some $10,000, and thereby liquidate a debt hanging over it.

Sunday, 20th. At home, at Auburn. Preached at eleven A. M., and took up a collection, and, although the morning was rainy and the congregation not large, got in cash subscriptions nearly $160. A brother of this place had previously given me for the Bible cause $100. I hope to get here $300.

And now, Mr. Editor, I will close, by stating that within five Sabbaths I have obtained for Alabama Bible Society about $800. It meets with great favor. I pray God's blessing upon those who have treated me so kindly, and have contributed so liberally to spread God's holy word among those who are destitute of it. C. D. OLIVER, Bible Agent, Alabama.

Who Will Help?

A man's ability is the measure of his responsibility.

To all living within the following counties—Coosa, Tallapoosa, Chambers, Lowndes, Montgomery, Macon, Russell, Butler, Pike, Barbour, Conecuh, Covington, Coffee, Dale, Henry and Autauga—we would say, please help to furnish the funds to supply these counties with the Bible. There have been found in less than half of the above counties, over a thousand families without the Bible. Can you read this? Can you repeat the Lord's prayer at your family altar, or in your closet, without putting your hand in your purse to help forward this work? Could you do without the Bible? Would you be willing to raise your family without it? What would you and your children have been without it? Ought the Bible to be circulated? Who ought to circulate it?

Now go stewards of the Lord, please get an envelope and enclose to me—at Auburn, Macon county, Alabama—a donation to the Alabama Bible Society, giving me your name and residence.

C. D. OLIVER, Bible Agent.

EUROPEAN AFFAIRS.

It is still asserted in all quarters in Europe, that war is inevitable. And, truly, it seems so. Without being able to give a satisfactory reason for our opinion, we have no idea that there will be a war. Nevertheless, we shall give the readers of the Advocate the war news.

A Turin letter says that Gen. Neil has visited all the fortified places of Piedmont, and has declared that they can not be got ready before the end of March. He has written to Paris, recommending delay. Meantime preparations continue with regularity and swiftness. It appears that the King will be Generalissimo, that Gen. Nail will be chief of his staff, and La Marmora commander-in-chief of the Piedmontese army, with Gens. Fonti and Cialdini under him. A corps of the French army will act in Venitia, and Garibaldi with his volunteer corps will hold the Provinces bordering the Lago Maglore, Como and the Sondrio, so that the Austrian army will be surrounded. The Generalissimo of the Austrians will be the Archduke Albert, son of the Archduke Charles, and who gives every promise of following in the steps of his father. He commands at this moment the army of Hungary. When the hour of the struggle arrives, he will come and place himself at the head of the Italian army, having under his orders General Hess as chief of his staff. The movement of the Austrian troops continues.

The Constitutionnel says that the French army will, on the 1st of June, number 682,000 men, of whom 497,000 will be ready for active service.

The Austrian army is perhaps slightly larger than the French; it may reach 750,000 men, and its etat-major is said to be composed of a larger number of good officers than any in Europe. Add to this the fact that Lombardy is now so well defended by judiciously placed fortifications that an attack from that side is almost impossible, and we have no chance left but the entrance at Venice. It is in fact recognized in France that Venice is the vulnerable point, and that the first work must be done by the navy.

According to report, King Victor Emmanuel has just been betrothed to the Duchess de Leuchtenberg, the oldest daughter of the late Emperor Nicholas of Russia. These two alliances with France and Russia will suffice to complete the consolidation of Victor Emmanuel's power in Italy, and henceforth we may admit one or two things—either that Austria will be forced into concessions or into a war.

The Paris correspondent of the London Daily News, says the uniform tendency of all the evidence which now presses on my ear at every moment is to show that war was thoroughly resolved upon at the moment when the Emperor made his ever-memorable New Year's speech to M. de Hubner: and that all semi-official statements and dispatches to the contrary have been made and written with a view to deceive. Orders have been issued to call home all French ships of war on foreign stations which can possibly be spared from the particular service on which they now are.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times states that a large frigate, to be plated with steel, is in progress of construction at Cherbourg. This vessel is to be armed with iron beams at each end. The ship of the line Gemappe is to be cut down and converted into a steam-frigate plated with steel, and is to serve as a floating battery to defend the roads of Cherbourg.

The conviction that the danger of war is imminent appears to be seriously entertained even in England. The tone of remark in Parliament by the British Ministers was deemed discouraging, inasmuch as it showed them to be uninformed of the purposes of the French Emperor. The London Times declares that "war is intended to be provoked," and with a boldness and energy that assures its conviction of the approach of a momentous crisis, asserts it to be England's duty to say "that without war or any other disturbance of the general peace of Europe, Italy shall be free!" This would be a grand solution of the pending difficulties, if it be in England's power to command it, but it is not very apparent how that power, any more than France, can effectually interfere in Italian affairs without producing a war.

Sir Charles Napier has addressed a letter to the Earl of Derby in which he says: "In the present disturbed state of Europe, is it right, is it safe, that France, with an army of 500,000 men, should have the command of the Channel? Between Brest and Cherbourg there are between thirteen and fourteen sail of the line, (the half Cherbourg) either manned or ready to be manned, and France has the means of manning the fleet which we have not, and she may bring the crew of the Toulon fleet to Cherbourg by rail, but we cannot bring the crew of the Mediterranean fleet to Portsmouth by rail."

The Sardinian Government is said to have sent an order to France for a supply of rifles to arm some additional battalions about to be raised in Piedmont.

The casting of cannon at Vincennes was conducted with the greatest secrecy, as if there were a desire to open a campaign with the new improvements before the secret should transpire to the world. It is stated that only half the usual number of horses will be required for the new pieces of artillery, which are represented to be as extraordinary for their compactness and lightness as they are formidable in their effects.

It was reported in Paris that the effective force of the French army in Algeria was to be reduced.

The Herald's Paris correspondent learns that the artillery of the army of Lyons had been placed on a war footing, all the officers and men on furlough being ordered to join their regiments without delay.

It is reported, on what appears to be good authority, that in the event of war breaking out between France and Austria the Emperor Napoleon has expressed his determination to take the field and command the army in person.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, in his letter of Feb. 3, writes: I saw a few days ago, at the Val-de-Grace, four hundred cases of amputation instruments, a most unheard of number, which had been sent in to sharpen. They are pressing actively the termination of the railway from Marseilles to Toulon, and from Toulon into the Sardinian territory at Nice.

The Ionian Parliament, after having unanimously declared for union with Greece, passed a resolution to elect a parliamentary committee for the purpose of considering what further measures should be taken. Mr. Gladstone, in consequence, addressed a message to the Parliament, stating that this resolution was contrary to the constitution, and advising that the committee be merely empowered to address a petition to Queen Victoria. Acting on this, Mr. Gladstone was furnished with the address of the committee to the Queen, with the request to lay before the great powers their desire for a union with Greece.

Two principal ringleaders in the massacre of the Christians at Jeddah, the Chief of the Police and the Chief of the Arnaouts, had been condemned to death, and were executed on the 13th of January. The Kaimakam and the others accused had been sent to Constantinople, where their fate would be decided upon. From Jassy there are reports of a political conspiracy with a Russian tendency. It had been frustrated. Fighting was reported to be going on in Montenegro.

The French Government had received dispatches from Cochin China, December. The plan of a town had been laid out on the Bay of Touran. All the preparations had been completed for the attack on the capital of the Empire of Annam at an distant day. The revolt at Tonquin had been confirmed, and it was suspected that it would considerably assist the French operations. The persecution of the Christians had increased with double fury.

The London Star understands that Mr. Cobden will shortly pay a visit to the United States.

A rumor was current that Queen Victoria and Prince Albert would visit Berlin to be present at the baptism of their grandson, and it was considered that the Emperor of Russia would be present on the occasion.

Prince Napoleon and his bride arrived at the Tuileries on the 3d, and were received by the Emperor and Empress. The Prince was to receive the title of High Admiral.

The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Advertiser says the return of the Duke of Malakoff to France would certainly take place soon. The Daily News correspondent confirms this, and says that the Duke de Montebello, and not Count Persigny, will probably succeed him at London.

An important pamphlet bearing the title "Napoleon III. and Italy," had made its appearance in Paris, and attracted considerable attention. Some parts of it are ascribed to the Emperor himself. The pamphlet seeks to establish that treaties would be only inviolable if the world was immoveable.

CUBA.

The Diario de la Marina, in an article translated for the Delta, complains that the culture and manufacture of Sugar in that Island has not advanced in a ratio in harmony with scientific, agricultural, commercial and social progress. He says:

When various branches of industry are connected with each other—when they depend the one upon the other, progress in one naturally implies corresponding progress in the others, hence being intimately united they should always march pari passu. But in Cuba we witness a spectacle entirely in opposition to that just mentioned, and which is universally recognized, indicated by common reason, proved by numerous past events, and sustained by a thousand circumstances at this very time. It is known that on our estates, the manufacturing branch is united with the agricultural, so that we are at the same time manufacturers of sugar and cultivators of cane. This beneficent association which, in other countries, has caused both branches to prosper, has, in our estates, for reasons we cannot now examine, produced the disastrous results to which we are about to allude.

In our view—the agricultural branch—the culture of the cane, is now generally in the same state as when the first plantation was opened; and if in some of the more advanced we can say that a less primitive system exists, it is not by far that demanded by the high state of civilization at which we have arrived. In certain social conditions, the cultivation of a large area of land does not suit, if capital invested in scientific culture can employed in another manner, obtain a greater return. And this extensive system, convenient enough in the infancy of communities, during which land and labor are worth little, is extremely progressive when, through the influence of civilization, capital has a less relative value. Then it becomes proper to fertilize the land to a high point, in order to avail ourselves of the labor we have and economize it, employing machinery as an assistance or a substitute. Both results are achieved by means of capital.

According to some planters the whole question of cane culture reduces itself simply to an increase in the number of hands, in order that thus they may plant a large area of land without introducing any improvement. "New lands and many hands," constitute the programme of these agriculturists.

We, on the contrary, believe that the whole secret of preserving the fertility of good lands, and of improving those which may not be so productive, consists in cultivating an extent of land which we can attend to well, with the capital and labor we can bring to bear. Cultivating less land, but cultivating it rationally, we need fewer hands, on account of the less space cultivated, and the new machinery introduced, and it is certain that thus we shall obtain a larger product and of better quality.

As to the slaves, we can confidently state that on many estates they are more happy, physically speaking, than European operatives, since they are not only better fed, possess commodious and wholesome habitations, and have at their disposal, when ill, infirmaries as well attended as the best hospitals: but even the number of working hours has been much diminished, and they have a longer time for repose than the unhappy natives of other climes.

The following communication from Pensacola, from an old contributor to the Delta, who was quite recently one of the most distinguished officers in the Engineer corps of the United States, we publish as an item of news, indicating one of the tendencies of public opinion. We wish it distinctly understood, however, that in publishing the various opinions on this and similar subjects, which appear in the secular press, we utter no opinion of our own. We wish, simply, to keep our readers well informed in reference to current topics, and thus discharge our duty as a public Journalist. When it becomes our duty to express opinions on such subjects, we shall do so distinctly and unreservedly.

Mr. Slidell is justly entitled to praise for his speech delivered in the U. S. Senate on the acquisition of Cuba; for it is a brief, lucid and convincing argument; at least, in the judgment of men not influenced by sectional fanaticism or political interests.

But I regret to differ with the enlightened Senator in regard to the effect of acquiring Cuba by war measures. Conquest would not be expensive. A dozen vessels of war and some transports landing 10,000 men, well supplied with horse and field artillery, cavalry equipments, and 100,000 muskets and Sharp's rifles to arm the Creole volunteers, would insure the quiet possession of the island.

No foreign power would intervene further than the limits of intervention which governed in the Texan annexation. Cotton and the immense foreign trade with England and France can not be exposed to interruption of transit for a day by those powers

PHILOSOPHY OF MISSIONS.

It is often asked, "Why should we send the gospel to the heathen?" We answer, in the first place, because Christ has commanded his servants to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Christ died for all men; it is by faith in his atonement that men are saved; "faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God; and how shall they hear without a preacher, and how shall he preach except he be sent." It is the aim of the Christian religion to convert the world, and should be the aim of the Church, and of each individual Christian.

It is asked again, "Why should we give them more light, and thus increase their responsibility?" We, in turn, ask, why did God make men responsible at all? Why are children allowed to grow up and become responsible? Why do we educate them, thus giving them more light, and thus increasing their responsibility? Why is it excellent for them to study to increase in wisdom all their days, and thus increase their responsibility?

It is objected again, that "the heathen have already some light, and a certain moral standard, to which if they conform, they will be saved." Granted; but they do not conform to it, and, therefore, are not saved. If it is asked what proof we have of this, we answer by referring to the spiritual condition of portions of the Christendom, our frontier territories, for instance, where the gospel is not preached, and where the means of grace are not enjoyed. Many of the inhabitants are well educated, and all are acquainted with the teachings of the Christian religion; and yet, do the people of such communities conform to their known standard of religious duty? Are men awakened and converted? Every body knows the contrary. We may bring the case nearer home. Suppose that in the most enlightened and religious portion of our country, we were to abandon the churches, abolish the use of the means of grace, and cease preaching the gospel: how many people would be converted and saved? Perhaps none at all. How, then, can we expect the heathen, who have much less light, a much lower sense of duty to God, much less of religious influence, and none of the quickening and saving teachings, promises, and hopes of the gospel, to "live up to their light?"

The fact is, it is by the preaching of the gospel, and the influence of the means of grace, that men are induced to repent, and not by their knowledge of right and wrong. If such knowledge would save men, then all would be saved. If the doctrine implied in this objection be true, there is no use for the preaching of the gospel any where. The objection has much more force in reference to preaching the gospel in Christian than in heathen lands.

Why is it that men do not imbibe knowledge naturally, or, at least, obtain it without the help of instructors? The materials are all furnished to them. The heavens are above them, filled with worlds and suns and systems; why do they not all become astronomers? The earth invites them to the study of her hidden treasures; why do they not all become geologists? The plants and animals of the earth are before them; why do they not all become botanists and natural historians? The world is full of books; why do they not all become linguists, philosophers, and men of letters? When men answer these questions, they will understand why it is that men without the preaching of the gospel do not become Christians.

And the case is even stronger still: it is not teaching alone that men need in religion; they need preaching; and preaching is not mere instruction; it is authoritative enforcement; it is passionate appeal; it is encouraging sympathy and promise; it is conscience-searching logic; it is personal faith, experience, and love, poured forth from a full heart; it is the Holy Ghost speaking through the thoughts, affections, and sympathies of human nature.

MISSIONARIES TO CHINA AND JAPAN.

It has been published throughout Christendom that Japan, by recent treaties, is now open to the Christian religion. Japan and China, both thrown open to the gospel at the same time, together constitute the grandest invitation to missionary effort that has ever been offered since the beginning of Christian history; they contain nearly half the population of the globe. It is to be seen whether or not the Christian Church fully appreciates the prophetic import and solemn responsibility connected with these events. The reformed Dutch Church has appointed one missionary to Japan; the American Board has appointed another; and the Presbyterian Board has appointed still another. The names of the first and the last are Rev. Mr. Brown and Rev. Dr. Hepburn. Will the Southern Methodist Church take steps for a representation in that great field? The men and the money have been found in North Carolina for another missionary to China; and Mississippi and Memphis Conferences will probably furnish one each, and support him. Who will break the ice in reference to Japan? We trust that the Bishops and Missionary Board, soon to assemble at Nashville, will resolve definitively in favor of reinforcing China, and occupying Japan. Give the people special missionary objects, and they will respond. The absence of this has been the cause of our missionary management.

Since writing the above, we have received a slip from our Missionary Secretary.

Two of our own brethren, as we learn from Dr. Sehon, Rev. Young J. Allen, of the Georgia Conference, and Rev. Mr. Woods, of the North Carolina Conference, are to leave in June for China. The farewell meeting is proposed to be held in Wilmington, North Carolina. We had hoped that a similar movement would be made in the Mississippi Conference. It is not too late yet. Our present missionary to China from that Conference, Rev. J. W. Lambuth, writes a very urgent appeal, which will be found on our first page. Let us have an annual Conference there as soon as possible. We begin to realize that the country is not only open, but the prospects of success are now greater than ever before. This is evident from the tone of the letters from our missionaries. A weak force in China will struggle for years with but little success. When it reaches a certain strength, it will go forward of its momentum. Our missionary authorities should immediately endeavor to strengthen our force in China to that point—the point where the tendency will be in our favor—where the up-hill, struggling toil will have been finished.

A New York contemporary says:

"One of the most popular and successful lawyers at the New York bar is about to give up a large and lucrative profession, and enter the ministry; and not only so, but he has chosen as the field of his labor, not some eligible field in or around New York, where his talents and local position would, no doubt, command a fine and welcome spot of labor, but he has resolved to devote himself to the work of foreign missions. The new field of Japan has just been opened to the heralds of salvation, and this gentleman has concluded to enter that field. He is a member of one of the Dutch churches in New York, and that church has just resolved to appoint a mission in that newly opened field. But at no man's charges, other than his own, will this gentleman go out. He will bear his own costs; and the gain he has accumulated in many years' successful practice in New York, he will now devote to the noblest and the holiest of purposes."

Discourse in speech is more than eloquence.

REV. WILLIAM TENNENT'S TRANCE.

We republish the following from the correspondence of the Southern Christian Advocate. It is from the pen of "C. N. D." (Hon. Gabriel P. Disosway, we suppose). We have often heard the story before, and the facts are well established. Mr. Tennent was a Presbyterian minister of eminent talents and piety, and an ancestor of our friend, Col. Tennent Lomax of Alabama.

The Rev. William Tennent, so remarkable for piety and devotion to the Cross, for a long period was pastor of this Church. His history was wonderful: Whilst studying divinity, under the care of his brother, the Rev. Gilbert Tennent, at New Brunswick, he was thrown into a trance, remaining apparently dead for a number of days. He was conversing with his brother in Latin on the state of his soul, fainted away, and apparently died. The usual preparations were made for the funeral, his person presenting the appearance of a dead man, "the eyes being sunk, the lips discolored and the whole body cold and still." Still the doctor insisted that he should not be buried, from some unusual warmth "under the arm." Three more days of intense suspense passed on, and the people again assembled for the funeral. Still the doctor objected, asking a delay of an hour, then an half, and next only a quarter. At this critical moment, to the great alarm of all present, the body opened its eyes, gave a dreadful groan, and once more sank into apparent death. In another hour, the same solemn scene occurred—when after the flight of a second similar period, a complete revival of animation returned to the great joy of his surrounding and mourning friends.

In twelve months Mr. Tennent was completely restored. He had lost his memory, and was taught to read and write a second time, but one day while reciting a lesson in Cornelius Nepos (Latin), he, suddenly starting, clapped his hands to his head, and his former knowledge all returned! Mr. Tennent manifested great reluctance, to explain his perceptions and feelings whilst in this extraordinary state of suspended animation. At length, however, he partially consented. He "behold," he stated "at a distance an ineffable glory * * * I saw an innumerable host of happy beings, surrounding the inexpressible glory in acts of devotion and joyous worship * * * I heard things unutterable. I heard their songs and hallelujahs of thanksgiving and praise with unspeakable rapture, I felt joy unutterable and full of glory." The three days of his lifeless appearence, seemed to him not more than ten or twenty minutes.

This event, of course, created much excitement at the time, and has ever since been a subject of serious contemplation to devout Christians. Mr. Tennent promised to leave among his papers a more full and perfect account of his affecting trance, but these were taken, after his death, by his son to Charleston, S. C. Removing into the interior of that State, this person died suddenly among strangers, and no traces of his father's papers were discovered.

PROTESTANTISM IN BUENOS AYRES.

A letter from Rev. W. Goodfellow, (Methodist) in the Northwestern Christian Advocate, says that the English Church, the Church of Scotland, and the Prussian state Church (Lutheran,) have each a Church. The American Board have also a Missionary, Rev. Thomas L'Hombral, who is a Frenchman, and labors among his countrymen. The form of faith is Presbyterian.

"The Independents of all lands find their way to us. We have in our congregation converts of the Evangelical Baptist Church of Dr. Oncken, of Hamburgh, members of Dr. Payson's Church in Portland, persons baptised in infancy by Dr. Adam Clarke, descendants of Livingston and Langdon who were signers of the Declaration of Independence, hearers of the fulminations of Chalmers and of Guthrie in Scotland, associates of Dr. Rule in his Gibraltar Mission, as well as cultivated minds from New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Portland, Chicago, and St. Louis, as well as other parts of the United States, and from all parts of the United Kingdom.

"The high aims of the Catholic Church at the conquest of this country led here men of genius and of learning. Here was a free course for all the agencies of Italy, modified by Castilian refinement. Accordingly, schools, colleges and universities were matters of early care. Libraries, too, sometimes the care of years, and of great value, were built up. The ecclesiastical literature of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, can be gathered by the cartload. The casuistical and theological disquisitions of those times are very abundant in all the old libraries. The state library here is a very valuable collection of books, though the issues of the modern press have, not inundated it.

"In this city there is a State Museum, intended to preserve the specimens of natural history belonging to this country. In the gallery of the arts appended there are found some ancient Peruvian paintings, made by in-laying mother of pearl. These have an age counted by centuries; but how many, who can tell?

"Of libraries for the use of strangers, there is no scarcity. Here is the British library of about 1,600 well-assorted volumes; the Scotch Church library, of about 2,000 volumes, and the English Church library of about as many. We have what is small compared with these, but a good beginning. Besides these, there is a British and Foreigners' Reading-room, embracing the idea of club, commercial rooms, and a supply of periodicals from Europe and the United States. This is a place of frequent resort. The news of the world is gathered here. In the permission for its existence the natives of this country are forbidden to become members. Rosas, who was the author of this arrangement, gave, as a reason, that it was to give stability to the association."

THE DEPOSITORIES.

Of the four Depositories in short travel of New Orleans—Vicksburg, Mobile, Memphis, Galveston—we have heretofore said but little, excepting the one in Mobile. Being the youngest, and aspiring to rather larger proportions than any other, it has claimed corresponding attention. Dr. Dorman, in his letter on the outside, confirms our statement of last week. The announcement of the arrival of books, will be found in the notice of the President of the Board of Directors, under the head of "Special Notices."

Meanwhile, the Vicksburg Depository is not idle. They have two Agents at work. Rev. H. H. Montgomery has a notice in this paper under the head of "Special Notices," entitled "Worthy of Imitation." We have just received his catalogue, announcing a large number of all kinds of books on sale. He is working with commendable energy.

The Memphis Depository, we are afraid, is to be considerably delayed by the recent fire, the particulars of which we have not yet received. The Agents speak of encouraging success in raising funds.

The Galveston Depository, with Rev. J. W. Shipman at its head, is under way. Among other publications, it announces for sale a poem untitled "Use," by Rev. J. E. Carnes, editor of the Texas Christian Advocate.

Of the New Orleans House we have heretofore said nothing; we refer to the notices of the Agents under the usual head: They speak for themselves. Whenever knowledge of its affairs is desired, the "Special Notice" column will furnish it. They have all our books, and others. The have now a clerk specially devoted to that establishment.

The Depositories of the Conferences patronizing this paper have the use of our "Special Notice" column gratis. But brevity is indispensable.

Rev. E. B. Duncan, one of our Missionaries in the Indian Mission Conference, gives $100 annually, and this year $200, to the China Mission. The spring-time of that Mission is budding forth.

REVIVALS.

Revivals are beginning to appear in many parts of the Church. A wonderful work of grace has occurred in the Southern Female College, Mississippi, under the conduct of Rev. Thos. H. Capers. May it set the whole Conference in a flame! The St. Louis Christian Advocate says, that most gratifying intelligence comes up from the Churches in almost every quarter. A revival influence is abroad, and to a greater or less extent pervades the Church, South, in all the Conferences. O, that the love of perishing souls may burn in the hearts of all our ministers and people, and lead them to seek with unremitting diligence for the lost sheep wandering in the mountains of unbelief and impenitence.

It is to be regretted that there is so little revival power and preaching among us. Though much was accomplished last year in the Southern Church, for which God should be unceasingly praised; yet a general, all-embracing revival, has not been experienced in many years; and the revivals vouchsafed to particular sections of the country are too short-lived. They do not continue through the Winter. No Church remains permanently in the revival state—a state which is more easily maintained, by proper faith and means, than is the realization of the revivals we are accustomed to witness. A loose general practice through the year, relieved by a revival lasting a few weeks, is too common among us, and the evil is growing. There must be a more undeviating devotion to a habitually holy life among our people, and a more constant and exclusive preaching to convince, edify, and save souls, among our preachers.

ORGANIZE! ORGANIZE!

Let temperance societies be organized. In all the country, wherever the demon of the dram-shop has appeared—and where is it not? Let the friends of humanity organize and intensify the temperance element. [Pittsburg Christian Advocate.

We had thought the Christian Church in general, and the Methodist Church in particular, was at least as good an organization against intemperance and all other sin, as could be formed, and that all who have joined it, had already "organized." What better authority for an anti-liquor and anti-sin organization, than divine institution and investiture? What better foundation than that of "the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone?" What better encouragement than, "Lo, I am with you always;" "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it?" What better "pledge" than, "I renounce the devil and all his works; the vain pomp and glory of the world; and the carnal desires of the flesh, so that I will not follow, or be led by them?" What better "ceremony of initiation" than baptism "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost?" What better "degrees" than "reception into full connection," and the sacrament of the Lord's Supper? What more encouraging and profitable meetings of the "order" than the public worship of the Living God? What better "lecturers" than the divinely-called, commissioned, anointed ministers of the word of life? What better reformation of the inebriate than sound conversion and a holy life?

THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST.

Two Democratic Candidates—Graves and Howell.

In the last issue of our contemporary, the Mississippi Baptist, we find the following stirring intelligence, under the head, "What shall be Done?"

"From many private communications, as well as from public indications, we are likely to have trouble at our Biennial Convention in May next. The respective friends of Brethren Graves and Howell indicate that each will be run for the Presidency of that body. Under the present state of public feeling, this would produce a state of things much to be regretted."

Really, the telegraph has brought us nothing spicier. When Douglas and the Administration are at open war, we may look for lively times. The Administration has the majority, we believe, and the Douglas delegates from Nashville were rejected recently, and the Administration delegates admitted to seats; but the "little giant" is "pluck to the bottom," and will trouble the (editorial) "office-holders" mightily before he is done with them.

We cannot sympathize with our brother editor of the Mississippi Baptist in his deprecation of the coming "race." The Baptist Church government more nearly assimilates to that of the government of the United States, we are informed, than that of any other Church. Let us have the "Presidential contest" then; that is the way they do in the United States.

THE TWIN POWERS.

We have seen, for some time past, notices of a machine for addressing newspapers and other papers, invented by Mr. Spencer, of the Christian Guardion (Wesleyan Methodist) Toronto, Canada. The last issue of the Christian Advocate and Journal gives notice that it is to be exhibited in that office in a few days.

Rev. C. K. Marshall, D. D., of the Mississippi Conference, has invented a similar machine, which is said to be in successful operation somewhere. Which was first, or which is best, we have no means of deciding. The complete success of such a machine would be one of the greatest improvments of the time, as the labor of directing newspapers by pen or by pencil is immensely burdensome, and increases with the rapid increase of newspaper circulation.

That two Methodists, one in the extreme North and the other in the extreme South—should, simultaneously, conceive the same improvement, is quite suggestive of the sagacious earnestness with which Methodism has laid hold of the newspaper press as the twin-brother of the itinerancy in the great work of evangelizing the world.

Since writing the above, we have received the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, with a printed address, by a machine invented by Messrs. Henderson and Hutchingson, of Allegheny city, Pensylvania, which, the Advocate says, is capable of printing five or six thousand addresses per hour.

SACRILEGIOUS SPECULATION.

The blasphemous practice of trading in sacred things, the equally wicked credulity victimized by it, and the necessity of sound instruction and intelligent religious faith, are as apparent now, and here, as in the days of Simon Magus, or that of his Romish disciples in mediæval times—and in modern times, among certain classes. Immediately after the hart-rending sacrifice of life on the Princess, the following infamous advertisement appeared in the city papers. (Do they do well in publishing such things?)

"The Explosion of the Princess.—This lamentable catastrophe was predicted by Madame Caprell, on Friday, and seen by her at the very moment of the disaster. The testimony of this she can produce at any time.

"Madame Caprell can tell exactly the position and situation of every body lost. This extraordinary sybil was the person who found the body of the famous Emma Moore, who was murdered in the city of Rochester, New York, in 1854 and thrown into a mill pond. Rooms of consultation 127 Custom-house street. m1-2dp3t."

LOSS OF THE MEMPHIS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Just after we had gone to press last Wednesday morning, we were amazed and grieved to learn, from the telegraphic dispatches from Memphis in the evening papers, that on the night before, a fire broke out in that city which destroyed the following newspaper offices—the Memphis Christian Advocate, the Eagle and Enquirer, the Avalanche, the Ledger and the Presbyterian Sentinel, besides much more property. About half a square in the centre of the city is burned.

It is unnecessary to assure our brother editor, Rev. Samuel Watson, and the friends of the Memphis Christian Advocate generally, of our sincere sympathy with them in this great loss and affliction. They have struggled for years, surrounded by great difficulties, with a heroism that seemed to deserve a better fate, for the establishment of their favorite paper.

REV. DR. LOVICK PIERCE.

We were gratified to welcome again, the other day, our venerable father in Israel, on his return from Texas. Notwithstanding the tossings of the Gulf on the route to Galveston, and then the awful staging from Hempstead to Shreveport, hundreds of miles, he had borne up with remarkable vigor for a man of his years. Having preached at Huntsville on the route going, to the great delight and profit of the people, he was induced, by earnest letters, to go back from Rusk, eighty miles—the return making it one hundred and sixty—to preach to them again; and when he left, a gracious revival was in progress. We had the sad task of informing him of the death of his youngest son, Dr. Hamilton R. Pierce, in Georgia—the first death among his large family of children, who have lived to grow up. Our venerable friend was deeply depressed; but we trust that God, who has preserved him in a healthful cheerfulness through the sorrows of a long history, will cause the sunshine of his life to continue until its

Sun in smiles decline,
And bring a pleasing night.

"The Churches of Scotland," recently published in our paper—a communication from Rev. Jas. McLennan—is republished entire by the Presbyterian Herald, Louisville, Kentucky. The editor remarks that "it is alike creditable to the head and heart of the writer."

LITERARY.

The "Life of James Madison," by the Hon. Wm. C. Rives, is now ready for the press.

Chinese Literature.—One of the best compendiums of American history and geography (if allowance be made for the distance and the prejudices of the writer,) is the work of a learned Mandarin, and designed for educational purposes in the Celestial Empire.

Nine of the Burns Poems sent in to the English Prize Committee were from the United States. The second poem in the estimation of the judges was written by a boy of fifteen, named Myers, and is considered quite as extraordinary a performance for a boy of that age as anything of Chatterton's.

The Dog-Star.—The largest star seen in the sky is one in the South, called the Dog-star. From calculations, it is known that its distance from us is not less than nineteen millions of millions of miles. Other stars have been calculated to be forty-two thousand times more distant than this, and light which travels at the rate of a million of miles in five seconds, must be sixty-three thousand years in travelling from them to the earth.

Atlantic Telegraph.—A novel proposition for the construction of a Transatlantic Telegraph Cable is made in the New York Observer by Mr. Sydney E. Morse, the senior editor of that paper. He proposes to "place at proper intervals along the ocean telegraph like air buoys, submerged to the depth of ten or twenty fathoms from the surface, and held at that depth by cables attached to anchors on the bottom; small buoys, at short intervals, to be used as props for the telegraph wire, rendering it easily accessible for renewal or repair; and large buoys at long intervals, to be made the foundation of a platform or frame from which pillars, rising above the tops of the waves, will support their telegraphic station-houses."

A new room has been opened at the British Museum, devoted chiefly to the vegetation of Southern climates, including plants and seeds, sections of trees, showing their structure; and specimens of woods, rough and polished—an exceedingly interesting collection.

Stevens' History of Methodism, of which the London Watchman contains a lengthened and laudatory review. The reviewer states that for some years he has regarded Dr. Stevens as one of the ablest, most attractive, and most English in style, amongst his brethren of the American Methodist Episcopal Church. He affirms of Dr. Stevens that he possesses a true historic gift and faculty; and of his work, that it cannot but become a classic among religious histories on both sides of the Atlantic. At the same time, the reviewer gives a gentle warning to Dr. Stevens to leave the history and the development of English Methodism during the last fifty years to the able hands of Dr. G. Smith.

University of Mississippi.—We learn from the Oxford Mercury that Hon. R. M. T. Hunter of Virginia, has been invited to deliver the Literary Address before the two Societies at the next commencement, and Hon. William L. Sharkey has also been invited to deliver the Address before the Law Class.

Audubon's Birds of North America.—A new edition of this magnificent work on the birds of North America, is to be issued by a son of the author, in forty-four monthly numbers, at $10.00 each, just half the original price.

L'Empire Francaise, a new French journal, is about to be started in New York. It is to be the special organ of Louis Napoleon, and to be supported by a subsidy from the Imperial Treasury. L'Empire Francaise will make the third French journal published in that city, all three representing different shades.

Journalism in Russia.—Since the relaxation of the censorship in Russia by the present Emperor, more than two hundred papers, dailies and monthlies, have been started. This is besides the journals issued by the government and amounting, under various names, to about eighty.

Millman's "History of Latin Christianity" has been completed in six volumes, and is for sale by Charles Scribner of New York. This work is supplementary to the author's "History of Christianity from the birth of Christ to the abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire," which was published in three volumes, in 1840.

Leigh Hunt, now in his seventy-fifth year, the author of fifty or more books, has commenced a series of papers commenting on men and things—a kind of British "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table"—in the London Spectator. He entitles these articles "The Occasional."

The second volume of Mr. Henry Buckle's "History of Civilization," on which the author has been engaged for the last fifteen years, will shortly be issued in England. The Appletons will reprint it at once.

Religious Newspapers in England.—A London correspondent of the New York Christian Advocate gives the following as a circulation of the organs of the different religious denominations and schools in England:

Record (Church of England, evangelical)	4012
Guardian (Church of England, high Church)	3466
Clerical Journal (" " broad Church)	1524
British Standard (Independent)	2052
Watchman (Wesleyan Conference)	2026
Freeman (Baptist)	1544
Christian Times (Evangelical Alliance)	760
Wesleyan Times (Methodist Reformed)	430
Witness (Free Church of Scotland)	1009
Scottish Presbyterian (United Presbyterian Church)	733

The Empress Eugenie is busily engaged in collecting autographs of the Bonaparte family; she collects everything they wrote, everything belonging to their history, and has already assembled enough to fill twenty-two volumes, which she has richly bound in her library.

PERSONAL.

The French Emperor is encouraging telegraph lines connecting with Ireland, Germany, Russia, and all Europe.

Gen. Lamriciere is said to have offered his services to the Emperor, in case a war against Austria be really intended.

Gen. Wm. Walker, accompanied by Col. Bruno Von Natzmer, is en route for California.

M. Gustave de Rothschild, youngest son of Baron James de Rothschild, is about to marry a bride who has only a dowry of $40,000. The daughter of Joel Aspanch, a judge of the Court Imperial. He was born at Metz, and is the only Jew on the Paris bench. M'lle Aspanch is a beautiful Jewess.

Judge Watrous.—The Senate Committee reported verbally against the bill to abolish Watrous's District, (Twenty-third,) without reference to the facts of the case. If they had acted on the bill, and failed to pass it, they would have disqualified themselves from trying him on an impeachment.

Rev. F. A. West, ex-President of the Wesleyan Conference, is preparing for his official visit to Canada and Nova Scotia, and his friendly visit to the States. He is expected to set sail about the same time with Mr. Spurgeon, and Mrs. West accompanies her husband.

Rev. Alexander McWhorter, of New Haven, widely known as a scholar and a writer, and especially as the author of "Yahveh Christ," has been appointed Professor of Metaphysics and English Literature in the Troy University.

Judge Rowles, of Cleveland, Tennessee, has received and accepted the appointment of United States Judge for the State of Oregon.

Miss Burdett Coutts has given $125,000 for the endowment of the Church in British Columbia. This is the third Bishopric she has endowed.

Bishop De Lancey.—The Gospel Messenger says: It appearing from recent advices that Mrs. De Lancey's health does not continue to improve, a letter, signed by a number of the clergy of the diocese, was forwarded to the Bishop by the last steamer, expressing their cordial sympathy, and assuring him of their conviction that could an expression of the wish of the diocese be obtained, it would be that he should not consider his visit abroad limited by the terms of the resolution passed at the last convention—three months—and requesting him, in reference to the time of his return, to be guided by his own feelings and the advice of physicians.

Abbott the Historian.—The Rev. J. S. C. Abbott, of Brunswick, has been supplying the pulpit of Congregational Church at Farmington Center since November last; during which eighteen members have been admitted to the Congregational Church in that place. A subscription is being obtained for the purpose of securing Mr. Abbott's labors for the ensuing year.

The Rev. H. G. Guinness.—Dr. Montgomery, the leader of the Arian Presbyterians of Ulster, having attacked the preaching of Mr. Spurgeon and Mr. Guinness, the Rev. Dr. Cooke, Presbyterian, has delivered and published a lecture in defence of gospel truth, as preached by these popular young Independent and Baptist ministers.

Death of a Venerable Minister.—The Nashville Christian Advocate announces the death of Rev. John Carr, in Sumner county, Tennessee, in the eighty-sixth year of his age, and the sixtieth year of his membership in the Church. "The members of the last General Conference will remember that he was introduced to them by Bishop Paine, and said a few words, touchingly and to the point. Time was when he, with his rifle on his shoulder, guarded the pioneer preacher in Tennessee from fort to fort."

Sir Christopher Wren was the architect of William and Mary College, lately destroyed by fire. It was probably the only building in this country that could claim so distinguished a source.

The wise Men of Prussia are predicting a grand future for the little Prince of a week, because his birthday is the same as that of Frederick the Great; because the constellation known as "Frederick's honor" stood in the zenith of Berlin at the moment of his entrance to light; and because, half an hour later, another constellation, "The Stars in Crown and Sword," culminated over Berlin.

On the occasion of the marriage of Prince Napoleon with the Princess Clotilde, the Empress Eugenie sent the bride a ring, with this pretty letter. "It is customary in Spain, when a young person takes a husband, for her best friend to offer her a ring. A Spaniard by birth, I wish to observe towards you the tradition of my country. Will you, then, receive this ring, and permit me, while wishing to embrace you as a cousin, to call myself your best friend?"

The New Belgian Minister.—We understand that Mr. Edward Blondeel de Curlebrock, whose appointment as Minister Resident of Belgium in the United States, was announced more than a year ago, will shortly leave Brussels for Washington. It is rumored in diplomatic circles, that Mr. Blondeel will obtain the rank of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary before his departure, and that he will be entrusted with some very important negotiations with our Government relative to the commercial relations of the United States and Belgium. The new Belgian Minister is said to possess considerable talent, is somewhat distinguished as a scholar, and is supposed to belong to the ultra clerical party in Belgium. [N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

Montalembert has had two silver statuettes made, representing Demosthenes and Cicero, intending to present them to the two counsel who conducted his defence in the late trial.

Gen. MacMahon, the commander in chief of the French armies, was born of Irish parents at Autun, in France. That city, justly proud of his prowess, has commissioned the famous battle-painter, Horace Vernet, to make a picture representing one of MacMahon's proudest moments.

Kossuth.—A London letter-writer says: It is seven years since Kossuth left the United States—but he looks twenty years older now than he did then. His flowing beard, then jet black, is now plentifully sprinkled with gray. He has grown very bald, and conceals his baldness by combing his hair over the top of his head. His face is marked with deep wrinkles, and the impress of care, and grief, and hopes long deferred, is deeply stamped upon his features. But his smile is as sweet, his voice is as deep and melodious, and the light of his dark eye is as soft and as tender as in the days when they so won the heart of our people, and made the soul of this nation vibrate like the strings of the lute to the touch of genius and of skill.

RELIGIOUS AND ECCLESIASTICAL.

The minds of many ministers of the Gospel, as well as of private Christians, are now especially occupied with the subject of the Person and Work of the Holy Spirit. The Rev. Dr. Hamilton, the Rev. Dr. Weir, the Rev. W. Chalmers, and other ministers of London Free Church Presbytery, have commenced a series of sermons on the Holy Spirit. The Rev. J. Bloomfield, of the Baptist Chapel, Soho, has also begun a series of discourses on the Person and Work of the Spirit; and everywhere we hear of especial attention being called to the subject in the pulpits of all evangelical denominations.

Protestants in France.—The Annuaire Protestant for 1858 contains the following information: The Reformed Church of France has 105 consistories, 1965 places of worship, of which 826 only are Churches, and 1139 schools. The Lutheran Church possesses 44 consistories, 403 places of worship, of which 344 are Churches, 95 of which submit to the Simultaneum Act (that is, serving both for the Protestant and Catholic worship); and 699 schools.

The Jews of New York proposes to erect a temple that will rival in extent and magnificence, the Catholic cathedral now in course of erection in that city.

The Weekly Register, a Roman Catholic journal, asserts that Dr. Pusey has married Miss Sellon, the Superioress of a Protestant Convent, a charming lady, and it is presumed that his notions of Catholic celibacy will not be heard of again.

BISHOP SOULE.

Saturday afternoon, says the Nashville Advocate, we rode out on the Gallatin pike, with Dr. Sehon, to see Bishop Soule. He was very sick last week, and we found and left him in his bed. The mind is clear, the spirit strong and well-assured in Christ, though the outward man perishes. Let the Church who has so long served, continually pray that the Lord would strengthen him upon the bed of languishing, and make all his bed in his sickness.

The Bishop has many letters on hand unanswered. He requests us to say to his correspondents that he is unable to answer them. And, as his correspondence is extensive, our Church papers will oblige the Senior Superintendent by extending this notice.

Dr. Shumard, the recently appointed Geologist of the State of Texas, the Louisville Journal says, commenced his geological studies and researches when a very young man in Louisville, and for more than twelve years past he has been actively employed in the field in connection with one and another of the corps engaged in the geological surveys of our States and Territories. He has taken a leading part in the exploration of Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Missouri, Nebraska and Oregon. He is throughly versed in the science of geology, one of the most accurate and learned palæontologists in the United States, and with his enlarged experience, the great and arduous work upon which he is about to enter will be accomplished in a masterly manner.

The Sunday School Convention of the South Carolina Conference is like to be an imposing as well as an important movement in behalf of that great interest. In response to the suggestion of this paper that it be made general for the benefit of the whole Church, the Southern Christian Advocate thinks the time is too short; and, upon mature reflection, we admit it. That paper however, adds: "May it not be better to have such a Convention this year in each Conference, and to appoint delegates to a General Convention, to be held next year. The South Carolina Convention might take the initiative in the matter, as it is the first called."

Very Liberal Missionary Collection.—The annual missionary services of the St. Paul's M. E. Church in this city were held yesterday. In the morning, a sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Durbin, and in the evening appropriate addresses were delivered by the Revs. A. C. Foss and Dr. McClintock, and by Messrs. Cummings, of Philadelphia, Bishop of New Jersey, and H. J. Baker of this city. The result of the appeal was the contribution of ten thousand dollars to the missionary cause, in addition to a very recent contribution at the same Church of twenty-five hundred dollars. Spectator.

Death of H. T. Curd.—Our readers have been informed, says the Nashville Advocate, of the affliction that befell this worthy Christian gentleman of Louisville, in having his hand crushed so badly that amputation had to be resorted to. We are pained to inform them now of his death. On Thursday, 24th February, at twelve o'clock, his second daughter was married in his presence—at five P. M. he died of lock-jaw. He was, for nine years, the Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South. A man of incorruptible integrity, and a Christian of simplicity and purity of character, was H. T. Curd. Honor to his memory.

Robbery of a Bishop.—At the close of last week the Rev. Bishop Baker, of the M. E. Church, while on his way to the South, was robbed of his pocket book, containing $150, and a number of outline sermons, which he had prepared during the winter. The Bishop was at the ticket office, at the foot of Courtland street, and had taken out a port-monnaie to pay the fare, a crowd being around the office at the time. The pocket book taken was in the breast pocket of the coat.—Spectator.

McKenzie Institute is one of the best Methodist institutions in all the South-west, little as is heard of it. It is private property, under the principalship of its founder and owner, Rev. J. W. P. McKenzie, and is situated near Clarkesville, Red River county, Texas. And yet it is devoted to the Church. Its graduates are all over Texas, and many elsewhere—some in California. Its influence, educationally and religiously, is most excellent. Its establishment, so long ago, in that new country, is a remarkable providence.

Central College, a Methodist institution in Missouri, is succeeding in a very encouraging manner, as we learn from the St. Louis Christian Advocate, in both its building and endowment funds. Let all Methodist Colleges be first-class, well endowed. Inferior colleges are a curse to any Church or country. Endow them or kill them off.

No Methodist Schools in St. Louis; is the text of a very just lamentation by our St. Louis cotemporary. The other denominations are well supplied. St. Louis is not the only place where our people are able, and ought to have, good schools, but yet neglect to establish them. And some are built when and where they are not needed.

Centenary College of Louisiana is prospering in a manner highly gratifying to its friends. It has a larger number of students than usual at this season of the year, and, a private letter informs us, new ones are coming in constantly. We acknowledge the reception of a polite invitation to attend the semi-annual examination on the first of March.

Bishop Pierce, we learn, will go to California by the overland route, via San Antonio. He will leave in the month of April, accompanied by his wife. This looks like preparing for a preaching campaign in California. We hope God may enable him to preach all over California and Oregon, and give him great success.

Pike's Peak, the golden El Dorado of Kansas, to which thousands are flocking, is attracting the attention of the Methodists of Missouri and Kansas, and they are about to send a preacher there. They should do so by all means. The gold is there—people will go—and preachers must follow.

Dr. Mortimore continues, in another column, the evidence in favor of his cure for rheumatism.

Coleman's Farm Mill, advertised in another column, is said to be very valuable.

J. E. Elam's Law Card is in another column.—Resides at Baton Rouge.

NEWS FROM THE INTERIOR.

ARKANSAS.

Lester, a Georgian, was recently assassinated by Colgrove at Little Rock.

The Little Rock Gazette says, the County Court of that (Pulaski) county has subscribed for $100,000 of stock in the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad.

A bill has passed the Legislative Chambers of Arkansas requiring the consent of Congress to be asked to enable the State to enter into any compact that she chooses to make with the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky and Missouri, relative to the making of cut-offs on the Mississippi river, from its mouth to the city of Cairo, in the State of Illinois, with the view of reclaiming the swamp and overflowed lands in the valley of the Mississippi.

The Arkansas Legislature has elected the Hon. E. W. Cotton, of Dallas county, Associate Judge of the Supreme Court in place of Judge Batson, resigned.

The bill to remove the free negroes and mulattoes from the State, has passed both houses of the Arkansas Legislature.

A bill has passed the Senate of Arkansas consolidating the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company and the Little Rock and Fort Smith Company into one, to be called the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

ALABAMA.

The Cotton crop for the season, now closing, is said to be the largest ever made in the State. Its estimated value is two hundred millions of dollars.

The Mobile Advertiser says, the Washington and New Orleans Telegraph Company have chartered the steamboat Octavia for the purpose of laying the telegraph cable which may be necessary in the new line between Mobile and New Orleans.

FLORIDA.

Major Rector, Indian Agent, who went to Florida to induce the Indians to join their brethren, has succeeded to a certain extent. He was announced last night as coming up the river on a vessel from Florida, accompanied by 71 Indians.

TENNESSEE.

The first consignment of Tobacco, by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, was received at Nashville on the 24th ult.

LOUISIANA.

Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad.—The Shreveport South-Western says, that Dr. Young, President of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad, has gone to New York for the purpose of purchasing iron to complete the road from that place to the Texas line, and from Bœuf river to the Mississippi. As a number of liberal-minded gentlemen have each advanced $5000 in cash, and the President has the privilege of using the first mortgage and the State bonds, we have no doubt but that he will readily effect a negociation for all the iron and rolling stock the company may need.

ILLINOIS.

The Great Fraud in Illinois Stocks.—The Committee on Finance of the Legislature of Illinois are still investigating the circumstances of the great fraud practiced upon that State by the re-issue of canal scrip or checks which had been redeemed, and upon which boads had been issued to ex-Governor Matteson. The amount of bonds and moneys obtained from the State by this transaction is stated to be not far from $223,000. Gov. Matteson has addressed to the committee an explanatory letter, by which it appears that he is unwilling to retain these bonds, and makes a proposition to return all the money and evidences of debt he has received for them.

OUR CLAIMS ON CHINA.—The losses sustained by American merchants in Canton, emounting to $700,000, have been recognized by the Chinese government, through the efforts of Mr. Reed, the American Minister, and are to be paid from the Custom-house receipts.

AGRICULTRAL COLLEGE.—The House passed the bill as amended by the Senate. It gives to every State 20,000 acres for every Representative in Congress it may have after 1860, amounting in all six millions acres. The President vetoed it on the score of dearth in the national finances.

The Mobile Tribune learns, "from reliable authority, that a party of some two hundred and fifty men left New Orleans a few days ago to assist the Liberals under Juarez in Mexico.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

"THEY ARE ALL PLEASED."—One of our faithful Agents writes, recently—and the same language comes in from all quarters—"every body is pleased with the Advocate." How pleasant to hear it. Are they pleased enough to induce each one to get a new subscriber? We sincerely hope so. Many subscribers have already sent in a new one each. It is a little thing, but it would double our list. That would be about the largest tree from a grain of mustard seed we have heard of. The sprout is already above the ground. Grow, little one.

"THEIR BEST WISHES."—One of our brethren writes: "All are pleased with the Advocate, and with their money send you their best wishes for success." The very thing needed most is such a general interest in the Adocate as will pour in streams of good wishes from all parts of the country for its success. The "best wishes" are always accompanied by help—cash, new subscribers etc.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Argus Circuit—Bible Class.—REV. J. W. SOLOMON, writes: "Argus Circuit, is a very pleasent work of twelve appointments, embraces a part of Montgomery and Lowndes counties, Alabama. The brethren, not numindful, have purchased a lot, and fit a parsonage in the pleasant and beautiful village of Athens. They hear the center of the Circuit, appointments all convenient. We have a beautiful Church in the village, the Baptists also have a good church, with a Masonic hall nbove. We have a good academy in the village and another near by, all of which show a determination of the citizens to stand in their place in the great work of moral, religious and intellectual culture. The locality, health, character of the citizens, and fertility of the surrounding country all tend to make Athens a desirable place. I am not able to say, much concerning the spiritual condition of the church there are some signs of good; we are looking and praying for a good revival on the Argus Circuit. When I first came on the Circuit, being convinced of the great importance of reading the sacred Scriptures, I made a proposition to the young people to rend the Bible through this year, a great many have acceded to the proposition. God grant that they may be armed with its' benuty, with its divinity, and as they study the character of the blessed Savior, be induced to "commit their lot into his hands."

Warrington Mission.—REV. D. B. LYNE, writes: "I am happy to state that n revival of religion is going on at this place: about or ten have been converted, several backsliders reclaimed, recently united with the Church. Zion has fastened the stakes and she is extending the cords here. We hope this is only a beginning which will last nll the year, and even for years to come."

A New Church. To cost nbout $12,000 dollars, is being built at Unlontown, Alnbama Conference. It will be dedicated a month or two. Rev. J. B. Bancroft is Pastor. Our Unlontown friends have set a good exnmple. We trust that a Church building revival will commence among our people generally—the old log-pens, covered with clap-boards, held down by weight-poles," and the shabby and dilapidated frame-houses, well enough in their day, when our people were few and poor. But now, we are able to have good, beautiful, tasteful churches, and we should not rest until they dot the country from end to end and side to side.

Rev. J. B. Powers says, he thinks he will get us twenty new subscribers this Spring. If every preacher would do so—well we should enlarge and improve our paper to the highest degree within our means.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

IT IS STATED that at a recent ball at the Tuileries a lady fainted, or, from some cause of a similar nature, confusion ensued. The Emperor and Empress fled from the throne, and made their way as precipitately as possible across the saloon, the Empress gathered up her petticoats with her hands as best she could, and looking so pale that her best friends said "it was deathlike to look at."

MR. FIELD, it is said, paying teller of the Atlantic Bank, Brooklyn, New York, who is reported a defalter to the nmount of $60,000, and has fled, lost the money by gambling.

THE CELEBRATION of the 166th anniversary of William and Mary College took place on the 19th inst., notwithstanding the late calamity.

TUSCANY, with a population not much greater than that of Virginia, has a standing army as large as that of the United States, or something like 18,000 men.

VISITING the House of Representatives, which I found in session, says the correspodent of the Columbus Times, writing from Washington, I never witnessed so much inattention, disorder and want of dignity. The speaker was discussing the question of retrenchment in public expenditures, and his voice was scarcely heard above the conversation and noise in the Hall. Five minute speeches only are allowed, and nt the end of that time, no less than twenty voices are heard crying, "Mr. Speaker!" The truth is the most unruleably body I ever saw in session, the South-ern Commercial Convention not excepted.

DR. BROCKETT, charged with forgery at Hertford, Connecticut, has been committed in default nf $5000 bail. His forgeries amount to from $10,000 to $20,000, on various banks and individuals. The Hartford Journal says: Dr. Brockett was a man highly respected in this community for his supposed piety, his talents as a writer for various periodicals, including the Press of this city, to which he was a regular contributor. The community will feel the greatest sympathy for his family, particularly for his father, a worthy clergyman in Weathersfield, now in his 71st year.

AS MISS SUSAN SHUCK, a daughter of John Shuck, Esq., of Lebanon, Kentucky, was about to be led to the altar of marriage by Mr. John Thomas, her veil caught tire, and she was so severe burnt that her life is very much in danger. Her hair and face, together with nll the upper part of her dress were much injured. The ceremony, however, was performed a few hours afterwards. She has since died.

PRESIDENT BUCHANAN uses no tobacco; Gen. Cass drinks no Bourbon;" Senator Douglas uses no pepper, and the Postmaster-General eats but two meals a day. N. P. Willis eats his own Mr, Caleb Cushing shaves himself and wears no beard. Rufus Choate and Henry Ward Beecher are dear lovers of coffee. E. P. Phillips rarely breakfasts before ten, though he begins business at eight: Edward Everett writes his extemporaneous addresses; Ralph Waldo Emerson often dines at Parker's, but rarely takes tea; William Cullen Bryant finds inspiration in two or three cups of green tea, and Longfellow smokes a Meerschaum. The smallest sized poet in America is Holmes, the best looking one, Fields, (and he is as good as he looks,) and the biggest one, Pike, of Arkansas.

BY A RECENT LETTER from La Rochelle, France, the State Department at Washington learns that the yield of the grape has been more abundant than drinkable water. Coopers were employed night and day, but, being unable to supply the demand for casks the wine had to be converted into brandy.

VARIOUS MINISTERS, it is said, have been invited to preach in the Music Hall during the absence of Theodore Parker; among others Dr. Chapin and Henry Ward Beecher. Ralph Waldo Emerson has also been invited. Last Sunday Rev. A. H. Fuller, who belongs to the extreme "right wing" of the Unitarians, preached there a sermon on the excellency of the gospel of Christ.

THE TURKISH CRESCENT.—The Crescent was the ancient symbol of Byzantium, now Constantinople. Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, in besieging that city, set his workmen to undermine the walls by night, that his troops might take it by surprise, but the moon suddenly appearing, discovered the design to the besieged, who succeeded in frustrating it. Grateful for their deliverance, the Byzantines erected a statue to Diana—the moon—and took the crescent for their symbol.

A SAD MESSAGE BY THE WAVES.—On the 24th ult., a bottle was picked up from the sea shore at Allenby, by the coastguard stationed there, containing a paper upon which was inscribed the following: "Off the Scillies—blowing a whole gale—mast gone by the board—water six feet in the hold—making fast in spite of all hands to the pumps—master and three of the crew overboard. God help us. James Hurris, mate, American ship Jane, from Boston, December 24th, 1858. If this should happen, by God's assistance, to reach land, telegraph to Lloyd's, in London, immediately.—Cargo thrown overboard. 'No hopes for the ship." [Carlisle Examiner.

A SAD EXPERIENCE.—The rich young girl, Miss Judson, of Detroit, who recently eloped with and married a filthy old fugitive negro slave, has already obtained a divorce in Indiana—a State in which hasty marriages may be repudiated as easily as formed. She has probably had all her foolish romance dissipated, but at the cost of reputation and happiness for a lifetime.

A DISPENSATION from the Pope was necessary to enable the marriage of the Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clatilde to be celebrated on a Sunday. His Holiness not only granted it at once, but accompanied it with his congratulations.

THIN HOUSE.—On Tuesday of last week, Father Boyle, a Catholic clergyman, opened the Senate session with prayer. Not a Senator was in his seat, and the only man on the floor went into the lobby. The Vice President and the clergyman had ample space and elbow room.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

LOCAL.

The Crescent impugns the Canals returns in its "Talk on 'Change," in the following allusion to the pursuits of yesterday: "The talk was, the census-takers made a great error in their figures and accounts in taking the late census. The inquiry was made, if there was not a population of over 150,000 inhabitants represented by the immense concourse of people on the streets yesterday: yea, nearer 300,000 is the present population of New Orleans than 152,000."

EXTRAORDINARY INCIDENT.—On Monday evening, the day after the Princess disaster, an infant, about seven months old, was picked up in the river, at Mr. Peabody's plantation, below the scene of the explosion, floating, with a life-preserver made fast to it. It was alive and is now in a healthy condition, having been delivered to its mother.

At the Custom-house of this city yesterday, there were cleared eight vessels for the ports of Illinois, having on freight 21,538 bales of cotton—an unusual occurrence in the annals of our commercial relations with that empire.

THE PARADE OF THE FIREMEN on the 4th, was one of the grandest effairs of the sort ever witnessed in New Orleans. Besides the grand array of the New Orleans Department—which cannot be surpassed, if equalled, anywhere in the world—there were several companies from other places participating in the celebration; including several from Mobile, and a very beautiful and efficient looking company from Jackson, Mississippi. Our own companies were out in unusually large number, and with a splendor of ornamentation and all the other appliances of a splendid spectacle, not to be surpassed.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, March 2.—Developments of Corruption.—The debate yesterday upon the charges of corruption made by Mr. Wilson, of Mass., and substantinted by Mr. Cameron, of Pa., in regard to the contract with Wm. Rice, of Pa., for printing blanks for the Post-office Department, occasioned much excitement in the Senate.

Mr. Mason asked, "Did Mr. Rice tell the Senator (Mr. Cameron) that he had divided the profits of this job as had been represented here, and that the President was cognizant of the transaction?" Mr. Cameron answered: "The way to get this information is to appoint a committee of investigation, or one me for slander. That will bring the evidence before you in an attenticated form."

"I am responsible for all I say here or elsewhere.

"Just bring Billy Rice and the President here. They know all about it, and I think my colleague (Mr. Bigler) knows something about it too."

Mr. Mason—"Did Rice tell you so?"

Mr. Cameron—"I don't speak to Rice."

Mr. Mason—"Then you bring here rumor of hearsay to make grave charges of fraud."

Mr. Bigler, of Pennsylvania, said the printing of the blanks was executed in accordance with law, and went on to explain the details of the affair.

He added, that his colleague was scurcely justified in making these insinuations against the President.

Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, considered the price paid for printing these blanks altogether too high, but could not believe the imputation cast upon the President and others by Mr. Cameron.

Mr. Johnson had no doubt that Mr. Cameron believed what he had stated, but he (Johnson) would not give credence to such charges.

Mr. Cameron replied that, to show his sincerity in the matter, he would move for a Committee of Inquiry to examine the case.

The report presented yesterday, of the Committee appointed to investigate the accounts of the Superintendent of Public Printing, further states that several hundred reams of paper are unaccounted for.

It says there is a singular fatality about the books and accounts of Mr. Seaman, as in every case yet discovered the errors found are in favor of Mr. Seaman and against the government.

The Committee traced between thirty and forty thousand dollars that have gone into the hands of the Public Printer, and about ten thousand dollars into other hands.

About thirty thousand dollars the Committee trace to Seaman's hands, most of which sum they have ascertained came to him by way of bonuses from various contractors.

ST. LOUIS, March 2.—Pro Slavery Law.—The Santa Fe mail has arrived, bringing a copy of very stringent laws, passed by the Legislature of New Mexico, providing for the protection of property in slaves. These laws entirely prohibit the emancipation of slaves in that territory.

FOREIGN.

Great Britain.

Mr. Dallas gave a dinner to Lord Lyons, the newly appointed envoy to Washington.....The Daily News says that the Government has given orders for constructing sixteen engines, destined for war steamers.....It had been noticed that the number of Italian refugees in London had considerably diminished the last few years.....John Orrell Lever had been elected member of Parliament for Galway, without opposition.....Attorney-General Whiteside had also been elected to Parliament, unopposed, by the Dublin University.....The London Times has a playful editorial on the proposed appropriation of thirty millions of dollars by the United States for the purchase of Cuba, and strongly recommends the system to the notice of the Emperor Napoleon. It says that America has certainly deepened the science and enlarged the jurisdiction of money.....It was reported that Archbishop Allen would be made a cardinal, to permanently reside at Rome.....The Prince of Wales had paid a visit to the Pope.

France.

The Emperor's Speech.—The session of the French Legislature opened on the 7th with an important speech from the Emperor. He commenced by referring to the existing agitation, stating that it was excited without any apparent and imminent danger, and after expressing regret at the disquietude, and pointing to his peaceful policy as a proof of his moderation, he said: "Why this anxiety?.....To-day it is my duty to explain again to you that which it appears to me you have forgotten. What have ever been my principles? To reassure Europe, to restore France to her true rank among the nations, to reunent closely our alliance with England, and to regulate with the continental powers of Europe the extent of our relations, according to the conformity of our views and the nature of those relations toward France. It was to that spirit that, on the eve of my third declaration, I made, at Bordeaux, this declaration. 'The Empire is peace.' I was anxious to prove by that expression that, although the heir of Napoleon I., had ascended the throne, he would inaugurate a system which could only be disturbed for the purpose of defending great national interests.....' With respect to the alliance with England, I have used all my perseverance to consolidate it, and I have found on the other side of the channel a happy reciprocation of sentiment on the part of the Queen, as on the part of all statesmen of every shade of opinion; also to attain that end so valuable to the peace of the world, have I thrown aside all opportunities of reviving irritating remembrances of the past, the calumnious attacks dictated by prejudice, even the national antipathies of my own country. This alliance has borne its fruits. Not only have we acquired together a lasting glory in the East, but at the extremity of the world we have just opened an immense empire to the progress of civilization and of the Christian religion.....Since the establishment of peace, my relations with Russia have assumed a character of the frankest cordiality, because we are agreed upon all the points in dispute.....I am equally justified in congratulating myself an my relations with Prussia, which have never ceased to be animated with mutual good will.....The Cabinet of Vienna and that of France, on the contrary, I speak it with regret, have disagreed upon important questions, and it required a most conciliatory spirit to succeed in arranging them. For instance, the reconstruction of the Danubian Principalities has not yet been completed without many difficulties which diminished the full satisfaction of their most legitimate desires; and if I were asked what interest France has in those distant countries, watered by the Danube, I should reply that the interest of France is everywhere where there is a just cause, and where civilization ought to be made to prevail.....' In this state of things there is nothing extraordinary that France should draw closer to Piedmont, which proved herself so devoted during the war, so faithful to our policy during peace. The happy union of my well-loved cousin Prince Napoleon with the daughter of King Victor Emanuel is not one of those usual facts to which some hidden reason must be attributed, but the natural consequence of the community of interests of the two countries, and of the friendship of the two sovereigns.....' For some time past, the state of Italy and her abnormal position, where order can not be obtained except by foreign troops, gives just cause of anxiety to diplomacy. This, however, is not a sufficient motive to give rise to the belief in war. Some may invoke it with all their hearts, without legitimate reasons; and others, in their exaggerated fears endeavor to show to France the dangers of a new coalition; but I shall remain firm and invulnerable in the path of right and justice, and of national honor, and my Government will not allow itself to be led away or intimidated, because my policy will never be provocative or pusillanimous.....' Far be from us, then, these false alarms, these unjust suspicions, these interested apprehensions, no peace, I hope, will not be disturbed. Resume, then, calmly, the usual course of your labors. I have explained to you the state of your foreign relations, and this explanation corresponds with all that I have made known during the last two months, both at home and abroad. You will find, I flatter myself, that my policy has never ceased to be otherwise than firm, but conciliatory. Therefore, I confidently rely upon your support, as well as upon that of the nation that has intrusted its fate to me.....' It is well known that never shall personal interest or petty ambition guide my actions. When, supported by popular sentiment, we ascend a throne and acquire so grave a responsibility, we rise far above that inferious region where vulgar interests are debated, and the first motive of our actions, as our last judges are, God, conscience, and posterity.....' The allusions to peace in Count de Morny's speech to the Legislative Corps were received with reiterated cheers.....The number of ships of war in commission in the French ports was two hundred.....The latest correspondence of the London Press looks warlike. There was great diversity of opinion, and it is believed that hostilities will commence before the end of the year. The Herald's letter says that affairs stand just as they did before the Emperor's speech. Great difficulty exists; and, if diplomacy fails, war must ensue.....Six floating batteries are to be constructed in the French ports, to be navigable like ships.

Hayti.

Soulouque's Property Confiscated.—New York, March 2. Later advices have been received here from Hayti. Gen. Geffrard had disarmed and abolished the National Guards, which served under the ebony majesty, Soulouque. He had also ordered the confiscation of all Soulouque's property, and recalled all exiled persons who have been banished by Soulouque for political purposes.

By the Steamship Jura.

French Newspaper Warned.—The French newspaper La Presse has received a warning from the prefect for an article of a similar tenor to those it has been publishing for weeks past, including towards the Austrian view of Italian affairs. It is supposed that these articles have been published on the representations of the Austrian Ambassadors at Paris.

Sardinian Extension.—The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that the King of Sardinia is determined to drive the Austrians out of Italy and make a kingdom (which shall include Venice and twelve millions of subjects,) strong enough to resist Austria and France also if need be. The correspondent says that the Count of Turin thinks that France will hold Piedmont in carrying out this plan against Austria. It is thought that Russia would ally with Austria passively if Austria were left to fight alone, but would actively and openly co-operate with Austria if any other power interfered. It is expected, however, that England and Russia will remain neutral. The King of Sardinia is determined to carry out this plan, it is said, unless France withdraws her support.

Arrival of the Europa.

NEW YORK, March 7.—The Cunard steamship Europa brings one day later dates than the Jura.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 19.—The rumors circulated on the Continent are of a more warlike aspect.....It is reported that a camp of one hundred thousand men is soon to be formed at Toulon.

France and Austria.

The French Government is preparing a memorandum of grievances against Austria. France will frankly demand explanations of Austria as to the course she intends to pursue in relation to the subjects to which the memorandum refers. The Austrian journals have been ordered to assume a more moderate tone in their articles in relation to France.

Offensive and Defensive Alliances.—Austria has proposed to the secondary German powers treaties of alliance offensive and defensive.

Austrian Deserters.—Sardinia is enrolling two regiments of deserters from the Austrian army, and it is believed a large number more may be obtained by desertion from the Austrian ranks.

Napoleon's Warlike Intentions.—It is asserted that the Emperor Napoleon's intentions are decidedly warlike. The French letters from Vienna published in the papers are full of accounts of the warlike preparations being made on the Continent.

Reduction of the English Army.—In striking contrast with the warlike preparations on the continent, the English army estimates show a reduction in the home and colonial forces of 8000 men, and no increase in the Indian army of 14,000 men. The total force of the present standing army of England is 220,000 men, of which number 106,000 are for the Indian service. This is considered as strongly indicating the faith of the English Government in the maintenance of peace.

Sardinia.

After a stormy discussion the new loan for fifty million livres was voted by the Sardinian Chamber of Depository, by 110 yeas and 35 nays.

Italy.

Milan letters describe military preparations on a large scale, especially in artillery.

Spain.

In the Lower Chamber a Deputy asked the Government if it knew anything of the bill presented in the United States Congress relative to the purchase of Cuba, and it would communicate to the Chamber any correspondence which might have taken place with France and England on the subject.....The Minister of Finance replied that he could not answer the inquiries without consulting his colleagues.

Austria.

A Vienna dispatch says that Austria has consented to withdraw from the Roman States on condition of a similar step on the part of France.

Russia.

It was stated that the Russian army would shortly concentrate on the Austro-Gallician frontier, and that the tone of the Russian journals toward Austria was daily becoming more severe.

The Ionian Islands.

The reply of the Queen of England to the petition of the Ionian Parliament for a union of the islands with Greece is, that she declines to accede to the request.

Persia.

It was reported that the pasnlace at Herat had expelled the English Commissioner.

India and China.

The Calcutta mail of January 9th, and Hong Kong of December 30th, had reached England and the American portion of the same is on the Canada. The campaign in Oude was considered nearly over. The rebels were hopelessly beaten everywhere. The Governor General had issued a decree for disarming the whole of Upper India. Small fortifications are to be erected at every station in the North-west, so as to render the seizure of treasury simultaneous, and the massacre of Europeans both difficult and hazardous. The Calcutta Produce market was inactive; saltpeter was dearer. Imports were quiet, and stock increasing. Freights were gradually improving.....The latest telegram via Galle reports an improvement in Manchester goods.....At Foo-Chow-Foo tea had further advanced; the supply was slow, and sold badly. At Shanghai also a rise was established, and the tea men were holding for higher rates.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, March 8, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current of Saturday the 5th inst. Quite an active movement has taken place in Cotton, enebling factors to realize an advance in the rates. In Sugar and Molasses, however there has been a falling off in both the supplies and the demand, and some reduction in prices, while Tobacco has maintained a steady course, though with moderate transactions. In Western Produce there was rather more firmness for some articles in the early part of the week, but within the past few days prices have been unsettled and drooping.

COTTON.—Business was somewhat interfered with by the rainy weather for the first two days of the week, but on Tuesday buyers came forward and operated to the extent of some 23,000 bales. We have since ascertained that the sales of that day reached about 27,500 bales, being the largest day's business of the season, and making the sales of the first three days of the week 46,000 bales. This large amount of sales left the market with a comparatively poor assortment on Wednesday, and buyers were also met by higher claims on the part of factors. They again however transacted business to a fair extent, the sales reaching about 14,000 bales, and at prices which indicated an improvement of ¼ to ⅛c. per pound in most qualities. On Thursday, with a still more meagre assortment of desirable lists on sale, and more full prices claimed, the business fell off to about 6000 bales. Under smaller circumstances, and with later European advices due, the business of Friday was about 6500 bales; making a total for the week of 72,500 bales; the receipts during same period, 49,321; and exported, 60,825 bales. Stock, in Presses and on ship-board, not cleared on 4th inst. 508,250 bales. With respect to prices, we have to remark that considerable irregularity has prevailed, but an nlvance of fully ⅛c. per pound has been realized within the week in most grades, and still further advanced rates have been claimed by many holders within the last day or two, which had the effect to check operations.

The market, closed with an active demand, at the following quotations:—Fair, Orleans 7¾, Uplands 7 1-16d.; Middling, Orleans 7 1-16, Mobile 6 15-16, Uplands 6¾d. The stock of Cotton in Liverpool is 362,000 of which 304,000 are American.

Manchester, Feb. 19.—Advices from Manchester continue favorable. The market for goods and yarns closed with an active demand and prices were firm.

Havre, Feb. 18.—Cotton has advanced 1 to 2f. during the week. The sales of the week amount to 9000 bales. Orleans tres Ordinaire closed at 91f.

San Francisco, Feb. 11.—Business is brisk; and an active demand prevailed for provisions, coffee, candles, etc.

New York, March 1.—The Cotton market closed firm; Middling Uplands 12¼. The dura's news had little influence, and that by the Europa arrived too late to effect the market. Flour closed buoyant—sales to-day 16,500 bbls. Wheat closed with an advancing tendency—Western white, $1 55 to 1 65. Sales of 30,000 bushels of Corn to-day at $1 00 for yellow, an advance of 1c. Lard, dull at 11¾ to 12c. Sugar quiet, at 7 to 7¾. Molasses closed at 38 to 40c.

OUR OWN BOOKS.

Whenever we see a good thing we like to circulate it, to wit:—

"Mind your Own Business, is an old injuction which cannot be too scrupulously observed. Especially would we urge it upon our Church in regard to our publishing interests. The time was when we had to depend upon others for our religious literature, not having a book or paper in the land that we could call our own. But our circumstances have changed: we now have an ample supply of weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies, the largest list of general religious reading books and Sunday school books printed in this (Southern) country, many of which have reached to an almost unparalleled circulation. Besides we have multiplied greatly in our numbers and wealth. Only let us purchase, read and circulate the issues of our own press first, and as largely as they deserve, and we shall extend our achievements beyond the highest expectations of the most believing ones among us. Scarcely a day passes which does not reveal some new success of our press. Let us be of good cheer then, and push on in our "great work;" rejoicing always and heartily in the great good being done by others, but standing faithfully to the peculiar work which God in his wise providance has assigned to us."

NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

All the Books Published by the Church, South—that is, the Books in the First Part of the Catalogue issued at Nashville—we have, and sell at NASHVILLE PRICES. Of the SECOND PART, we have only the following Books, which we sell at the prices annexed, less 20 per cent. ob time, and 25 per cent. for cash.

Of these Books we have not time now to speak particularly. Suffice it at present to mention "Bledsoe's Theodicy" at $1 50, and in Turkey at $2—the greatest thunderbolt forged against Calvinism in three centuries. It has proved itself exceedingly troublesome to all of that faith; in fact, as "horrible" to them as the Decree was to Calvin.

Worthy of Imitation.

When at Jackson, Mississippi, second Sabbath in January, a proposition was made to raise one hundred dollars, to make the Methodist Church of that place a Shareholder in the Book and Tract Society. The Bible to be for the pulpit, and the Annuities to go to the Sunday-school. It was responded to fully.

Since then, a response from three other Churches has been made. Are there not several other Churches in the Mississippi Conference that will contribute one hundred dollars for the same purpose?

I think at least one hundred congregations can be found to respond to this proposition, if the Preachers will bring it before them. Will they? I wait th hear.

COLEMAN'S METALLIC FARM MILL IS PERfectly simple in construction; its durability has been thoroughly tested, by between two and three years constant use; its great capacity is the wonder of all who see it, (grinds from 5 to 15 bushels of corn per hour, according to speed); it grinds corn and cob, or any kind of grain for food—boulay of any grade, or the finest family meal, and superfine flour into equal facility, bolting or sifting while grinding; it can be used by one, two, three or four horse, or by steam or water power, or, if necessary, by hand.

The Mill can be seen in active operation every day, Sundays excepted, from 8½ o'clock, A. M. to 6 o'clock, P. M., at the SOUTHERN MACHINERY DEPOT, No. 73 CAMP STREET, New Orleans.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

Blowing up of the Princess.

Dear children, you have heard, no doubt, of the blowing up of the Princess, a large and beautiful steamer, on the Mississippi river, about ten days ago. O what a horrible affair! So many people hurried into the eternal world without a moment's warning. We should all be ready to die at any moment.

The Gazette and Comet says: The Princess was unusually crowded. The remark was made by the clerk, to several persons at the landing, that "never before did the boat have such a crowd of passengers—there must be," said he, "at least 150 women and children on board."

When the fire was discovered by persons on the landing to be on the Princess, the wildest consternation seized our people; they ran to and fro, hastily counselling what to do. All had friends aboard, and many relatives. Every carriage, horse, buggy and vehicle to be had was brought into requisition, and many on foot walked the entire distance, through mud and water. The hour for the steamer Natchez to come up had already passed, and the hope was indulged that she might have been near by to rescue the passengers from the burning wreck.

The only boat at our landing that could afford assistance was the steam ferry. The crowd rushed to her, but as she had not commenced the morning crossing, she did not have up steam. After necessary delay, she left the landing. Arrived at the scene of disaster, she crossed over to West Baton Rouge, where it was supposed some of the passengers and crew had been picked up. She landed at several places, but found none of the sufferers except at Mr. Levesque's, where there were five deck hands of the boat, two white men and three colored men, four of them very badly scalded. The ferry brought up the Hon. F. C. Laville, member of the Legislature from New Orleans, both legs broken and otherwise dangerously injured. He was taken to the house of H. V. Bakin, where every attention is being bestowed. The ferry brought up Mrs. Wm. Stephens and her son, of this parish, the latter severely scalded; also a white man, slightly scalded, but so severely cut about the head as to be unable to give any account of the affair or to tell how he escaped; two negroes came up on the ferry, one who says he belongs to Mr. Robertson, of this place—neither injured.

As soon as apprised of the fact, we repaired to the scene of disaster as fast as horses could take us. On the way we met the wounded, in charge of their friends, too much appalled to speak, and tell us of the terrible calamity. The wreck had floated off about a mile from the place of accident, and was throwing up its lurid flames and black smoke of death! The noble hearted citizens by the way side had thrown open the gates leading to their homes, and the doors—had not only sent out their servants with horses and hacks for the wounded, but themselves were on the spot—men and women. Such a scene! There is no language to portray it.

The steamer McRae had left the scene when we arrived. Capt. Tobin, of that boat, deserves the grateful remembrance of this community, for his noble efforts, to take care of the dead, administer to the dying, and provide for the rescue from the wreck. The Pearless, bound up for Red river, rendered valuable assistance, and the steamer Natchez, from social hall to ladies' cabin, was strewn over with mutilated bodies—all blackened, lacerated and deformed, as not to be recognized. Mr. Gilbert L. Sess, whose home was nearest the point where the Princess touched shore, gave up his entire premises to the suffering, who were taken there, before the boats coming up had arrived.

When the Natchez came along—to rescue the wounded the doors and window shutters, were taken off Mr. Sess's house, and they were borne to the boat on them. In the cabin of that boat such a scene of intense agony and suffering never was encompassed in the same space before. Here were wives bending over husbands and fathers, wild with the agony of intense excitement—brothers, mutilated and dying friends and relatives were here, only known when they could tell their names. "Is there a lady who will give her state room to this poor creature?" said a stalwart man, as he cleared the way for a young woman buried in blankets on a door borne by others—"I will," said several voices, and down few upon with the words. Did not the strong arm tremble and eyes fill with emotion? Ay, there was no one there unmoved—it was a scene to melt all into one bond of love and tender emotion.

It were impossible to hint at the many acts of Christian charity and philanthropy called forth on that occasion. How like to ministering angels did our daughters appear! How noble and exalted would all appear who stood upon that bank! Mr. W. M. Boswell, at Conrad's plantation, deserves a special notice. The force under his command, some fifty hands, were taken immediately to the river bank after the explosion. One of the hands, a negro man, swam some fifty yards into the stream, caught the line, brought it to the shore and made the boat fast, but it burnt off, without allowing time for many to escape. Several ladies and children were saved and brought ashore safe by servants on board and the hands of Mr. Conrad on shore. Mr. Boswell threw open all the houses on the plantation, and the hands of the place cheerfully furnished their articles of wearing apparel to clothe those who had their clothes torn from them.

Letter from a Little Mississippi Boy.

Dear Mr. Editor: I have been thinking for some time of sending you a little letter, for I am so much pleased with the "Children's Column." But, sometimes, I think somebody has told you all about me; for sometimes I forget, and shut the door too hard or walk a little too heavy across the room. I think it wrong, and I will try to do better; I thank you for your kind reproof; and hope it will do all the little boys good that read it. I have no brother, but I have two sweet little sisters; their names are Mary and Martha; those were the names of Lazarus' sisters. I go to Sabbath-school. Our teacher is so kind, and tells us about the door-keeper. That he loved little children, and took them in his arms and blessed them. She tells us a great many pretty Bible stories; my lesson this week is about the Savior's Sermon on the Mount: when he said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." My Mamma helps me to get my lessons, and tells me a great many things about the Heathens, and how they worship Gods that are made by hands. I feel sorry for them. I think if I were a man, I would like to go to the heathen country and tell them it is wrong: and they must worship the true and living God, or they can never go to heaven and live with God and the angels. I think sometimes I will be a preacher when I get to be a man and tell sinners to go to Christ and be saved from their sins. I am a member of the Church and want to be an humble useful Christian. I was baptized by Father Lane, that good man that is in bright glory now. I often hear my papa talk about him and that he preached to sinners, and told little children that they must love God. O, I want to be good like he was. My pa is a preacher. I like to go with him to the protracted meetings in the warm weather. I now close my little letter, thinking you like a short one best. Pray for my little sisters and me, that we may be good children. Good night. Your little friend,

WORTHA.

The Singing Student Boy.

Many years ago a student boy was seen and heard in the streets of an ancient town, singing. He was a stout plainly-dressed boy, but his face was pale and his eyes were sad and tearful. His notes were most musical, and the songs he sang were in beautiful words, and about sacred things. Every time he finished a song, he stopped to the door of a house, and gave a gentle tap. When it was opened, he said in gentle tones:

"Please give a poor student boy a morsel of bread."

"Begone with thee! thou beggar child," was the rough reply that met his ear as the poor child shrank from the door step.

Thus driven from door to door, he sang his sweet songs until his body was weary and his heart sad. Scarcely able to stand, he at last turned his steps homeward. Striking his noble forehead with his hand, he said:

"I must go home to my father's house, and be content to live by the sweat of my brow. Providence has no loftier destiny for me. I have broken out its paths by aiming higher."

Just at that moment, Ursula Cotta, a burgher's wife, who had heard his songs, and seen him driven from a neighbor's door, felt her heart yearn with pity towards the helpless boy. She opened her door, hastened to the young singer, spoke sweetly upon him, with tones that sounded like heavenly melodies in his ears, and said:

"Come in, poor boy, and refresh thyself at my table."

Happy little singer! How he enjoyed the delicious meal. And when the good dame and her husband told him to make their house his future home, his heart melted. With eyes half blinded with tears he looked in the face of his friends and said:

"I shall now pursue my studies without being obliged to beg my bread from grudging hands. I shall have you, sir, for a father, and you, sweet Ursula, for a mother. My heart will once more learn to love. I shall be happier than I can express."

After that day the singing boy studied hard and well. Years afterwards the world heard of him, for it was he who uttered his voice against Popery, and became the chief of that Reformation which gave an open Bible to the world. His name was Martin Luther.

Courage, then, poor boy! You may be friendless and unknown to-day—you may have to plod through trials and toils, unobserved by the smiles of even a sweet Ursula. But never mind. Plod away. Stick to study and duty. God cares for you. He has a work for you to do, and if you are faithful and true, he will, in due season, put you in your proper place. Toil on.

An Ossified Man.

The Marietta (Ohio) Journal mentions the case of a man, Jonathan Perkins, whose body is gradually changing into stone. It began at the age of eleven. His jaws have been set and motionless for thirty years, and his front teeth have loosened and come out, forming an aperture through which he talks and receives his food. His food is all prepared for him in a suitable manner, and he always have retained a good appetite, though he is not gluttonous. Twenty-four years since he became blind in one eye, and for twenty-three years he has been totally blind. All his other senses remain as perfect and acute as those of any person. His limbs remain near the size they were when he was hurt. His head, neck and body have attained full size. His neck is nearly as large as his head, and measures nineteen inches in circumference, while his wrist measures only four and a-half inches. His weight is about one hundred pounds.

Humorous.

The Family opposed to Newspapers.

The man that didn't take the papers, was in town yesterday. He brought his whole family in a two-horse wagon. He still believed that General Taylor was President, and wanted to know if the "Kamkatkians" had taken Cuba, and if so, where they had taken it. He had sold his corn for thirty cents—the price being fifty-five—but on going to deposit the money, they told him that it was mostly counterfeit. The only hard money he had was some three cent pieces, and these some sharper had "run on him" for half dimes. One of the boys went to a blacksmith's shop to be measured for a pair of shoes, and another mistook the market-house for a church. After hanging his hat on a meat-hook, he pleasly took a seat on the butcher's stall, and listened to an auctioneer whom he took to be the preacher. He left before "meetin' was out," and had no great opinion of the "sarmint."

One of the girls took a lot of "seed onions" to the postoffice to trade them for a letter. She had a baby, which she carried in a "sugar trough," stopping at times to rock it on the sidewalk. When it cried, she stuffed its mouth with an old stocking, and sung "Barbara Allen." The oldest boy had sold two "coon skins," and was on a "bust." When last seen, he had called for a glass of "sody and water," and stood soaking gingerbread and making wry faces. The shop-keeper mistaking his meaning, had given him a mixture of sal-soda and water, and it tasted stoongly of soap. But "he'd beam tell of sody and water, an' he was bound to giv it a fair trial." Some "town feller" came in and called for a lemonade with a "fly in it," whereupon our soaped friend turned his back and quietly wiped several flies into his drink.

We approached the old gentleman and tried to get him to "subscribe," but he would eet listen to it. He was opposed to "eternal improvements," and he thought "larnin' was a wicked invention and a vexation." None of his family ever learned to read, but one boy, and he "teached school awhile, and then went to studying divinity!" [Exchange.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

GRANDMOTHER LOIS.

How little is revealed in the Scriptures coecerning grandmothers! Much is related of mothers, whose names are familiar to every reader of the Bible. There was Eve, Sarah, Rebeckah, Leah, Rachel, Naomi, Hannah, Ahigail, Elizabeth, Mary, and many others, whose maternal influence we can trace through the faithful record that is given of their lives. But little is said of grandmothers as such. Only one, besides Lois, is spoken of definitely as sustaining this important relation. Probably it is not because this class have oo mission to perform; nor because no eodearing tie unites them to the family; for what more charming portrait than that of a wrinkled, bowed, cap-crowned old lady, whom the little folks delight to call "grandma," especially if she be one of the pious women of Israel? There is interest in all her movements; even her infirm, totteriog step, so like that of a little child beginning to walk, makes an appeal to the heart. Her smile is a ray of the old familiar sun—her voice the music of an old, but pleasant instrument. When she speaks of her blessed Lord and her hope of heaven, it is in no modern way; and it reminds us of the patriarchs, and "times of old." She is waiting for the Master's summons; but she does not wait like the pious oees of later generations. If it were announced to her some bright morning, that the angels and Christ were at the door waiting, she would smile a beautiful farewell as she rode away to glory.

But we lotended to say, a graedmother is an indispensable part of the household. The discipline of childree is aided by her genial presence; for it is a happy culture for them to wait upon her feeble steps, to run to her aid when necessity demands, to bring her the needed chair, to pick up her cane or crutch, and to perform those other little acts leeidental to her happiness. Then, too, how felicitously her occasional moral counsels fall epon yoethful ears! So unstudied and simple, it really seems as if God spared her on purpose to talk to the grandchildren! Her example, also, falls as light upon their young hearts. They do not perceive that it is moulding their lives, and bringing forth rich froit in noble, geeerous acts, that otherwise might not appear. But it is so. Many a saieted grandmother has perpetuated her influence to children's childree, so that she will be called and blessed at the judgment. Paul reminded Timothy of his indebtedness to his grandmother Lois, and affirmed that the "unfeigned faith" that was in him dwelt long before in her. He, indeed, ascribes much to his excellent mother, Eunice, but implies that she received the pith of her pious life, through grace, from her mother Lois. It would not be strange, if the latter mainly saved young Timothy from the corruptions of the heathen city in which they lived. It is certain, that all the good lessons which he received in youth were imparted by her and his devoted mother. We would add another to the beatitudes in the fifth chapter of Matthew; namely, Blessed be good grandmothers.—Congregationalist.

READ THE BIBLE THROUGH.

Will you begin to-morrow, and go on—if God spares your life and your reason, and your eyesight—with the purpose of reading the blessed volume through during 1859? It is very easily done.

But don't begin merely for the sake of reading it through, as a mechanical labor, and that you may be able to say that you have read it through in one year. And don't read it mechanically but read it determined, so far as you can, to get a good common sense meaning attached to your mind to every verse, and every word. Read it, therefore, in connection with some brief, yet good commentary; but above all, read it with much prayer to the Holy Spirit to enlighten you in all its affluent significance.

We have a proposition to make to all our readers. We invite them to begin on New Year's with us, and read the Bible through together according to the table appended. And we will go along with them, and engage, God permitting, to write a brief editorial each week upon some passage of the weekly portion, or some thought suggested by it.

How many of our forty or fifty thousand readers will thus accompany us through the good Book?

Here is the programme:

Read 3 chapters daily, and 5 oe the Sabbath;—that is 2 chapters every day in the Old Testament, and 1 every day, and 3 on the Sabbath, in Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Solomon's Songs, and the New Testament.

The Old Testament, without these four books, contains 2 chapters a day for the year; and the New Testament, with the four books, has 1 chapter a day, and 3 for Sabbath days, minus 8 chapters.

Read Psalm 119, as 11 chapters of 3 divisions each, and connect the short Psalms 117 and 131 with the next, and 133 and 134 together, thus adding 8 chapters to complete the year.

MARRIAGE OF PRINCE NAPOLEON AND PRINCESS CLOTILDA.

A letter of the 30th January, from Turin, published in the New York Times, gives the following description of the marriage of Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clotilda, of the House of Savoy:

"The marriage was celebrated this morning at a quarter past ten o'clock. The chaplain of the chapel royal celebrated mass, at which the Archbishop of Vercelli and other high prelates were present. The august couple stood before the altar in the centre, the King being on the right and the Prince de Carignan on the left; next were the Count de Cavour, the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, the Knights of the Order of Annunciada, and the persons attached to the suites of the King and the Imperial Highnesses. The Princess Clotilda had near her the Countess de Villamarina, her gouvernante, and M'lle Salasco, her sub-gouvernante. At the conclusion of the mass, the Archbishop of Vercelli put the usual questions, as to the consent of the parties, and afterwards gave his benediction. In a pew on the right, were Prince Humbert, Prince Amadeus and the Princess Maria Pia, who appeared to be much affected at her approaching separation from her sister. The whole party afterwards breakfasted at the palace, and at half past one o'clock the Royal and Imperial party proceeded to the railway station, the National Guard and the troops of the garrison being drawn up on either side of the streets. An immense crowd greeted the illustrious party with the loudest acclamations. The railway station was filled with elegantly dressed ladies, who had been admitted by tickets. The King accompanied by the Minister of Public Works, took his seat in the first carriage, followed in others by the Prince and Princess Napoleon, the Prince de Carignan, and the other illustrious personages who had been present at the marriage.

The train was composed of six Court carriages and two others. The first carriage was ornamented with the flags of France and Piedmont, and with a quantity of flowers. Gen. Niel wore the military medal of Savoy, and the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne wore the grand cordon of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus. Prince Napoleon had distributed a certain number of decorations of the Legion of Honor. Among the recipients were Count Nigra; M. Lanzi, one of the Ministers; Gen. Chaldini; the Chevalier Nigra, chef de cabinet of Count Cavour; M. Massari, director of the official journal, etc. The signal having been given, the train took its departure amidst the shouting of the multitude.

"The Paris correspondent of the London Daily News writes, on the evening of 3d inst.: "The entry of Prince Napoleon and his bride took place to-day. Instead of taking the expected line of march by the Boulevards, they went to the Tuileries by the shortest route—the Rue de Lyon and the Rue de Rivoli. I had an opportunity of seeing the young Princess very well. She is a pretty girl, fair, with light hair, a nez rétrousse, and a striking family likeness to her father. She looks what she is, a tenderly nurtured child, fresh from the nursery. Her appearance is even more juvenile than the register of her birth would indicate. She looked pale and embarrassed. Her eyes wandered out of the close carriage windows, seeking opportunities to bow to the populace, but she found few. By her side was the Marchioness de Villamarina del Campo, who will pass a month with her in Paris. Prince Napoleon, in the uniform of a General of Division, sat opposite to her."

REPEATING HEARSAY SLANDERS.

In the last volume of Gray's Massachusetts Supreeio Conrt Reports there is a noticeable decisioa.—It seems that a woman uttered a slander of another, and when sued for it, her defeese was that she only reported what was currently reported; that she had eo malice, and therefore was not liable to an action. Judge Thomas gave the decision. The story, he says, uttered or repeated by defendant, contains a charge against the plaintiff of a nature to destroy her reputation. It was e false charge. It is no answer to any forum to say that she only repeated the story as she heard it. If the story was false and slaaderous she must repeat it at her peril. There is safety in no other rule. Often the origin of slander cannot be traced. He who gives it circulation gives it its power of mischief. It is the accessive repetitions that do the work. A falsehood often repeated gets to be believed. A mae cannot say there is a story in circnlation that A poisoned his wife, or B picked C's pocket, and relate the story, and, when called upon to answer, say, "There was such a report in circulation; I but repeated what I heard, and had no design to circulate or confirm it;" for two very plain reasons—that the repetition of the story must, in the eatere of things, give it currency; and the repetition, without the expression of disbelief, will confirm it. The danger is an obvious one, aed long since pointed out; aed it is, that bed men may give currency to slanderous reports, and then fled in that currecey their own pretection from the just consequences of a repetition. Let scandal-mongers look out.

THE CLERGYMAN'S WIFE.

It is often said that a minister's wife "should be a help-meet for him, and therefore should assist him in his pastoral duties." The premise is true, but the conclusion iecorrect. Upon a parity of reasoning, the lawyer's wife should be his clerk, the physician's wife should aid in attending to his patients, and the wife of the merchant is under solemn obligations to do duty behind the counter. We have no objections to a minister's wife being a general visiting committee, and presiding over all the societies and meetiegs of her sex in the congregation, if it properly belougs to her to be in this position, and if it can be done without the sacrifice of those duties which she owes to her family; but we protest against these thiegs being required of her upon Scriptural authority, as none can be given.

With the small salaries of most of our ministers, their wives are bound dowe to a system of the closest economy. The whole burden of domestic cires rests upon them. Their hearts are not gladdeeed, eor their hands strengthened, by the prospect of better days.

Frequently, rigid economy and the want of meny of those comforts almost essential to a wife aed mother undermine their health and leave them to drag out a sickly and dyleg existence. To require of them, under such circemstances, the lebors often demanded of pastors' wives, and to harrass their minds with continual complaints for the neglect of them, is eot only unscriptural but hihumae. From our investigations into the teachings of Scripture, we learn these three things:

First—The relation of a pastor's wife to a congregatiye is the same as that of every other woman; her marriage with a minister invests her with no office, and gives her eo pre-eminence.

Secondly—Her duties are the same as those commanded by the Apostle Paul to be performed by every other Christian woman in the married state—no more and no less.

Thirdly—When she performs these to the best of her ability, nobody ought to complain.

A PERPETUAL CHARITY.—The Hon. Theodore Atkenson, formerly ono of the most wealthy men of New Hampshire, und who died in Portsmouth in 1799, left a legacy of $1000 to the Episcopal church in Portsmouth, to be expended an bread to be distributed oe Sundays to the poor of the Parish. The distribution of more than a dollar's worth of bread each Sabbath has eow bepe regularly made for about 60 years. The memory of Mr. Atkenson is thus kept green in the parish where he lived.

Garden, Farm, and Plantation.

Grape Culture.

The Agricultural Report of the Patent Office contains much information valuable to all biterested in the products of the soil. In Missouri the grape culture appears to be exceedingly successful. In some parts of the State a clear profit of $400 per acre is realized. The average yield of the vineyards since 1849, has beeo about 250 gallons of wine per acre, which would give an income of $400, or $300 profit. There are in the highlands of this State 5,000,000 of acres which offer rare inducements to the vine-dresser. Were these covered with vineyards, employment would be given to 2,000,000 of people, and the yield of wine would be 1,000,000,000 gallons, worth el the lowest estimate $50,000,000.

Within the territory of the United States there are upwards of oee hundred varieties of native grapes. Although among these there are only ten or twelve adapted to table use, yet more than half of them can be converted into wholesome wine. Cuttings have already been selected from the native vines of Arkansas, Texas and the neighboring Territories, and placed in proper hands for direct experiment in various locations, in order that they may take root preparatory to future distribution.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS JULIET F., wife of Dr. L. L. Sturdivant, in the 27th year of her age, died at Summerfield, Alabama, at the residence of Bishop Aedrew, her stepfather, on the 2d ult. The subject of this notice was trained up from early childhood in the way she should go, by an intelligent, pious mether, whose unremitting toil and care was crewned with the coeversion of her child at the early age of ten years. She soon joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and continued a consistent member till death. Being naturally of a lively, cheerful disposition, few loved or enjoyed life more, or did so with greater artlessness and innocence, or a higher respect for her religious professioe. Her fondness for class-meeting, reading the Bible, aed private prayers was marked. For some years, while her health was feeble and declining, when alone, most of her time was spent in readieg the Bible and in prayer. The last time she attended class, oe being asked of her state, replied, "My heart is fixed! O God, my heart is fixed!" Her last visit was to the house of God, shortly before her death. Her great sufferings were borne with patience and submission. We are deeied those pleasant words that often fall from the lips of loved ones as they near the border of the glory-land. Her condition had but just excited serious alarm, when her brain was found to be deeply implicated, for hours she was in a state of coma, from which she did eot recover till death closed the scene. A lifetime of faithfulness to God, is more reliable than even dying declarations. A fond mother, a devoted husband, a dear little son and many others, relatives and friends, are sorely bereaved and afflicted; but they bow in humble submission to Him who is too wise to err. Farewell gentle one, we hope to meet thee where sorrew, pain, and death, can never come.

W. MCARAN.

Summerfield Ala., Feb., 22d 1859.

MRS. MARY HAMET, died near Raymond, Hinds county, Mississippi, on the 19th January 1859, in her 71st year. She had lived the life of the righteous; she died the death of the righteous. She died, writes her son-in-law, the Rev. L. Wiley, "in great peace, without a struggle or groan." Mother Hamet was born in Tennessee, and emigrated with her mother in early youth to Mississippi, and settled near Natchez. She has lived for many years in Wilkinson and Hinds counties. I became acquainted with this venerable lady in the earlier years of my ministry, and have known her as a true friend, a devoted Christian, a friend of the poor and distressed. She was a woman of strong understanding and indomitable energy of character, diligent in business, fervent in spirit.

F. G. BOOTH.

MARY C. DACUS, wife of John Dacus, and daughter of Rev. Lovick P. Ramsey, was born Feb. 27, 1834; and died December 2, 1858. Of the time of her conversion, the writer is not informed, but she had been for some years an acceptable member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. About three days before her death, she exhorted her husband to meet her in heaven, and when near her end endeavored to sing praises to God.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 16 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and

ARMINIANISM AND CALVINISM.

Armlelanism, in its proper sense, is to be considered as a separation from Calvinism with regnrd to the doctrines of unconditionnl election, particulnr redemption, and other points necessarily resulting from these. In our last week's article wo showed, by quotations from an acknowledged standard, that the Calvinist held that God had elected n certain portion of the human race to eternal life, passing by the rest, or rather dooming them to everlasting destruction; that God's election proceeds upon no prescience of the moral principles and character of those whom he has predestinnted, hut orlginates solely in the motions of his free nnd sovereign mercy; that Christ died for the elect only, and therefore, that the merits of his death can avail for the salvation of none hut them; nnd that they are constrained, by the irresistible power of divine grace, to nccept him as their Savlour. To this doctrine, that of Arminius and his legitimate followers, stands opposed.

They do not deny an election; hut they deny that it is absolute nnd unconditional. They argue that an absolute and unconditional election is inconsistent with the character of God, (as God has himself revealed it); that it destroys the liberty of the humnn will; that it contradicts the languege of Scripture, and that it tends to encourage a careless and licentious practice in those by whom it is believed.

They (the Armlnians) hold, that God has elected those only who according, not to his decree, hut to his foreknowledge, and in the exercise of their powers of self-determinntion, acting under the lnfinence of his grace, would possess that faith and holiness to which salvntion is nanexed in the gospel scheme. And those who are not elected are nllowed to perish, not because they were not elected, hut merely and solely in consequence of their infidelity and disobedience being foreseen hy God, their election did not take plnce.

They hold that Christ died for all men, in the literal and unrestricted sense of that phrase; that his atonement is ahle, both from its own merit and from the intention of him who appolnted it, to expiate the guilt of every individual; that Christ "made (hy this oblation of Himself once offered) n full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world;" and that every individual is invited to partako of the benefits which it has procured; that the grace of God is offered to make the will comply with this invitatiou, but this grace may be resisted and rendered. ineffectual hy the sinner's perversity. Whether true believers are necessarily preserved, or whether they might fall from their faith and forfeit their state of grace, was a question which Arminius left in a great measure unsolved, but which was soon determined by his followers in this additional proposition: that Saints may fall from the state of grace in which they nre placed by the operation of the Holy Spirit. This, indeed, seems to follow as a corollnry from what Arminius maintained respecting the natural freedom nnd corruption of the will, and the resistibllity of divine grace.

It may be necessary nnd proper just here to mention some tenets, with regard to which Arminianism has been much misrepresented. For example: If a man hold that good works are necessary to justification; if he maintain that faith includes good works in its own nature; if he reject the doctrine of original sin; if he deny that divine grnce is requisite for the whole work of sanctification; if he speak of human virtue as meritorious in the sight of God; it is very generally concluded that he is an Arminian. But the truth is, that a mnn of such sentiments is properly a disciple of the Pelagian and Socinian schools. To such sentiments pure Arminianism is as diametrically opposite as Calvinism itself. The genuine Arminians admit the corruption of human nature in its full extent. They teach that we are justified by faith only; that our justification originates solely in the grace of God; and that the procuring and meritorious cause of our justification is the righteousness of Christ. They teach that justification implies not merely forgiveness of sin, hut acceptance to everlasting life. They teach, in fine, that the work of sanctification from its very commencement to its consummation in glory, is carried on by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift of God by Jesus Christ.

It will appear from the nbove views, that there is a marked and irreconcilable difference between Arminianism and Calvinism upon points of grave importance. The belief or denial of which must (in our apprehension) very seriously affect our views and estimates of the character and government of God, and our views of the liberty and consequent accountability of man.

But as I propose short articles, I will leave the discussion of this point for my next number. VERITAS.

CIVILIZATION IN JAPAN.

NINETEEN centuries ago the citizens of Rome were one morning astonished with the news that Cæsar had landed his legions in Britain. Separated from the whole world, the Ultima Thule of the human race, and known only by the report of Tyrian merchants and Gallic peddlers, it added a new world to the horizon of Rome. All eyes turned to the white cliffs that rose in those stormy and monster-haunted seas—now for pearls and pretty slaves, rings and bracelets of spun gold, curious baskets, tin and copper to cheapen bronze, magnificent Britons to figure in processions or at ball doors, and perhaps, in the lapse of ages—but it must be very distant—fresh readers for Virgil and Horace. They imagined all this with prophetic sagacity, hut little did they imagine that present England and Rome which need not be described, and which passes description. Yet Rome, on the whole, played a great, nnd by no means a brief part in this isle. She nobly met her mission. For nearly five centuries she was giving us her arms and her arts, her language, her laws, and finally her religion. It is our turn now to hear that remote empires and vast portions of the human race, hitherto as separate as if they belonged to another sphere, have suddenly been added to the community of nations. After China, with its three hundred millions, Japan, with n popnintion no larger than that of these isles, may seem no such hulky addition to the humnn brotherhood; but if China was separate and unknown, Japan was ten times more so. That, liko China, it was once nearly Christian, that the Portuguese spoilt that Promise, that the Japanese had a strong family resemblance to the Chinese and made the same sort of ware, that they had an ecclesiastical as well as a Civil King, and two capitals, one of which was as populous as our London, was nearly all we knew yesterday. A little more might have been known on inquiry, but we, most of us, preferred the Japan of the imagination to any particulars that might have transpired through Dutch merchants and American shippers. Neither of these were likely to solve the thick mystery that hung over those strange islands of Niphon and Yeso, and others with unpronounceable names. There was a sacred volcano, a sacred city, and n sacred King, a sort of Pope, dwelling in a Rome of his own, and getting on very amicably with a Cæsar in arms. How did Church and State hit it off so pleasantly? Even the British Constitution might get another "wrinkle" from such clever politicians. Then the Japanese were traders and men of peace; their islands and their climate were not so unlike our own; nor was their personal aspect quite so Tartaric as that of the Celestial neighbors. They were said to be prosperous and peaceful; to want nothing, and in general to be every thing that the rest of the world is not.

However, we don't stand exclusiveness. We hold that the world is made for us all; and so we have gradually edged, and finally pushed our way close up to the city of Jeddo, through rows of junks, abreast of green batteries, and dropped ashore where berbarian ship was never seen before. We took advantage of a panic, and did it with a rush. While we were concluding matters up the Peiho, the Russian and American Plenipotentiaries were off with breathless haste to Nagashi, to reap the first fruits of our harvest. They got start enough to get all they wanted, and give time for a reaction. However, Lord Elgin was not far behind; and when he came up, he capped the achievements of his brother plenipotentiaries, and got for them more than they had ventured to ask for themselves.

Had we thirty years to prepare for angelic visitors, we should never get London as ready as Jeddo appears to have been without any warning at all. Every street, every body clean, washing and bathing as regular institutions as meat and drink; no beggars, no cripples, no squalor, no poverty, no drunkenness, no fighting, no bad smells—in fact, nothing to remind the Englishmen of their own beloved city. Yet it would be difficult to find a closer parallel, in natural circumstances, than that between the Japanese and the British group of islands; the same area, same population, same climate, same insular position between a great continent and a maritime metropolis, with the same population. How is it these semi-barbarians manage these things better than we do? When we are taunted with the thrift and industry of the Chinese, it is a comfort to think that, after all, they are ugly, disgusting brutes, with but the dregs of a religion, and the bare threads of an old civilization. What can we throw into the scale against Japan? They shame us at every point. Not a word yet about opium. They were all seen drinking tea in pleasant tea-houses, to be found wherever a spot of natural beauty attracts the eye, and gives an opportunity of landscape gardening on a reasonable scale. Graceful and neat-handed lmaris wait on the tired traveler. But unless our informants are very blind or very sly, even here Japan shames us, in the utter absence of prudery is the best proof of their innocence. The most unadorned beauty disturbs not the well-regulated Japanese mind. Our poor countrymen were carried through scenes that an Italian poet might have delighted to imagine, but an Englishman hardly ventures to describe. In all these novelties this is the newest and the strangest. [London Times.

CHALMERS AS AN EXTEMPORANEOUS SPEAKER.

THE editor of the British Standard recently published a series of letters in favor of preaching extemporaneously, which be considered the only simple, natural, and truly effective style of pulpit oratory. Our readers will be curious to see how he disposes of the greatest apparent exception to his rule, in the Prince of Scottish preachers, the most remarkable exmnple in modern times, of effective written sermons.

I have heard all the greatest Pulpit Readers of my time, and not one of them has formed an exception to the rule. Even Chalmers, their chief and head, whose mighty ministrations I have very frequently attended, matchless reader though he was, came most fully within the rule. That distinguished man, indeed, made no attempt to look at his audience, such as is made by a multitude of readers; the fieger of either hand was never for a moment removed from the MS.; there was nothing beyond a passing flash of the eye as he occasionally darted his head upwards. Once fairly in motion, he rushed along like a locomotive of the highest power at full speed, heedless of every thing before, behind, or around him, with a sort of blind, though inspired, fury. He could, I verily believe, have performed the magnificent feat equally well in Westminister Abbey alone, and with the doors shut! The fires which, on these occasions, raged so strongly within him were wholly independent of external circumstances. As a consequence of this, power, all-subduing power, was the prime characteristic of the achievement. He was generally altogether wanting in pathos, that ethereal something which, proceeding from a melted heart, has the power of melting all around it. The effect of his sublime effusion was a feeling of intense excitement, oft times of overwhelming admiration, from which the auditor was often strongly tempted to clap his hands and shout applause; but he was rarely visited with compunction or moved to tears. Even in his death-scenes he awakened in the assembly scarcely any emotions other than those of awe or horror: the most sympathetic even of the gentler sex seldom wept. The most striking exception I ever remember was on the occasion of his fare well sermon on leaving Glasgow for St. Andrews. The discourse on that occasion was a sublime affair, not in its matter, for he was obviously by no means well prepared, but in its delivery; and the prayer was even more touching than the sermon. The discourse appears in his Collected Works, where it occupies but a very secondary place.

How great soever, in a certain way, Chalmers might be with his manuscript, he would have been incomparably greater with free speech; he was so in his partial attempts at extemporizing. Nothing I ever listened to might be likened to his off hand-flights, whether in the pulpit or the class-room, the social meeting, or the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. The style was then much more natural and idiomatic, much less figurative, and the matter much more simple, condensed, and business-like, and the intonation in keeping with it. It was nature perfected. On these occasions he was scarcely at all Ciceronian, oft times quite Demosthenic.

Again, in the case of Chalmers, there was a most material circumstance which greatly abated the offensiveness of the manuscript to the public, as well as lessened its inconvenience to himself. His discourses were written in short-hand, which he read with a faculty almost miraculous, on a sheet of foolscap, folded into eight pages, so that there were only four leaves to turn during the entire exercise—a progress barely perceptible. One of these short-hand manuscripts, a much-prized treasure, is now before me, consisting of only eight pages, although it occupied forty minutes in the delivery.

The power of Chalmers with the manuscript, however matchless in its own way, was, I repeat, impotence compared with the might of his extempore bursts. The difference was early perceived by discerning men. His memoirs contain a singularly interesting passage in relation to this subject. The celebrated Andrew Fuller, during one of his Scottish journeys on behalf of the Baptist Mission, before Chalmers had become famous, having spent some time with him at Kilmany, laboured hard to wean him from the habit of reading. Dr. Hanna, his son-in-law, says:

"Under the very strong conviction that his use of the manuscript in the pulpit impaired the power of his Sabbath addresses, Mr. Fuller strenuously urged upon his friend the practice of extemporo preaching, or preaching from notes. 'If that man,' said he to his companion, Mr. Anderson, after they had taken leave of Kilmany manse, 'if that man would but throw away his papers in the pulpit, he might be King of Scotland.'"

A SKELETON IN THE STUDY.

WHAT! In the pastor's study? What could the pastor have to do with such a repulsive and odious an object as that! Is he fond of Anatomy? Has he left spiritual things, and even fleshly things, and got down to bones, even dry bones? The pastor seems to be a kind, genial, cheerful sort of a man! But how could he be, if he had such a soul-freezing sort of a thing in the place where he spends so much time? It would seem such a spectacle would take the flesh off from his own bones, and make a skeleton of him; so that he would come among the people himself a frightful spectre of a man, instead of the quiet, comfortable looking being he appears to be. If there is any such thing in his study it must be in some old box locked up, and seldom seen by mortal eye.

No such thing. The moment the door is opened, there it stands, face to face with the observer. No mortal can pass the threshold without seeing it. The pastor, poor men, has to live with it, and feel the influence of it so long as he occupies the place, and no wonder he should be willing to flee the place, to get rid of the sad sight, and the chilling influence it has over him.

The news flew about the parish, that the pastor kept a dreadful looking skeleton in his study. The people had a good opinion of the man. They never conceived that so pleasant and amiable a man could have anything to do with such ghastly things as dead men's bones. Rumor, next to never, had had such a chance for raising the wind in the perish. Therefore on went his boots, and away went he in the hottest activity, and gave himself not a moment for napping, scarcely for breathing, till the whole parish knew, and were moved by the terrible truth that the pastor kept a grim skeleton in his study!

The grave men and women were made more grave, and the young people began to have associations of terror with the pastor's house. Every sort of thing, any sort of body, that at any time seen in and about the house, was mused upon and talked over. Still, however, no strange noises had been heard in the house by day, and no ghostly apparitions had been seen by night. The pastor's family seemed a quiet, peaceful and happy family, and gave no signs of disquietude and sadness, as though any terrible deed had been done under the roof, or they were conscious there was any such terrible object in the chamber as a skeleton! People looked at the dear little ones of the household expecting to see them little daguerreotypes of fleshless bones, or at least, wan and terror-stricken, as though they lived where there was something awful. But they frolicked like lambs. Not a merrier laugh than theirs rang through all the play-ground. Their happy faces indicated as happy a home as any other faces that were rudely smitten by the blasts of winter, or gently kissed by the breezes of summer. Keen and searching eyes too, were upon the pastor himself; for after Rumor's day's work was done, everybody wanted to see how the man looked who was not ashamed nor afraid to have so horrible a thing as a skeleton in his study! They thought he would have a sort of a sepulchral look, as a man ought to have who lived among dead men's bones, and perhaps one might be seen sticking out of his pocket! But bland and cheerful was his countenance as a cloudless June morning, and nothing in his deportment gave the sharpest discernment the idea that the pastor had any more to do with the appropriate contents of tombs than any other respectable man in the perish.

Things could not remain in this state long. That mysterious chamber! That skeleton! The whole parish was in the state of fermentation. The mystery must come out. And, by common consent, two venerable men waited on the pastor. They had never approached the parsonage in greater anxiety. What might not be disclosed! They knew that specious appearances had often covered, and had long and well concealed, frightful enormities. Judas had a fair name with the other disciples. All was seemingly fair with the pastor and his house. But then that skeleton! Its image haunted them. They seemed to see it when the gate closed behind them, when they approached the house, and when they pulled the door-bell. Terrific thought! Might it not meet them on the threshold and stretch out its fleshless fingers for salutation!

But the pastor himself opened the door, and a kinder welcome could not have pierced the gloomy December of their souls with a more cheerful voice. They had a delicate and difficult mission to execute, viz, to talk with such a man on such a subject. And all the more so for the genial, warm-hearted welcome they had received. But after long and difficult navigation, backing and filling, the bolder of the venerables gave utterance to the idea, "that the whole parish was in a ferment by the rumor that the pastor kept a hideous skeleton in his study! Could it be so?"

The pastor mused for a moment. A quiet smile on his lips was in danger of a more marked development, but was refused. "Brethren, do me the favor of a call with me at my study. There is indeed something there which I wish you to see." The door was soon reached, and they were all within the portals of this mysterious chamber! As nothing very ghastly or terrific at once met their vision, the visitors breathed more freely. "Now brethren," said the pastor, "inasmuch as the rumor of the skeleton in the study has actually resulted in your being here, I think something can be offered to your consideration which will justify a reasonable excitement in our parish. You see these shelves, brethren, they were made for books, but what a picture of emptiness! There are Dr. Wood's works trying, by recumbency, to fill a shelf that would hold twenty other good men also. Edwards's works are doing a similar office on another shelf. Barnes's Notes fill the only shelf that is full in the case where they are, and they can do it only by each volume spreading its wings right and left to meet its fellows. And now run your eyes, brethren, along the cases, and see how sad it is to have each good men so far apart. The chasms are so great between them that they can impart no warmth to each other, or have any fellowship one with another. They are very quiet and uncomplaining, though I seem to think I heard, lately, one stanza of a mournful song one of them used, expressive of his loneliness,

> Oh solitude! where are the charms
> That sages have seen in thy face;
> Better dwell in the midst of alarms
> Than reign in this horrible place.

There was scarcely any one near enough to overhear the lamentation and join in it; and the only musical character in the region was an old copy of the Temple Melodies, which did good service, by lying flat on its back, and thus eking out the lack of service of a file of small books, which were making the effort that at least one shelf in their case might be full. Now, brethren, as you have seen these empty shelves, and surveyed the sad vacuities that abound here, you can see there is a humiliating lack of flesh upon these bones. And what other report can you bear back to the people, than that beyond mistake there is a skeleton in the pastor's study, that your own eyes have seen it."

Rumor was astir at the crack of the next day, booted and spurred too, this time; and he caught only now and then a breath in the swiftness of his zeal, as he hastened to have the whole parish know what kind of a skeleton it was that had been found at the parsonage.

Would there be any such spectacle there long? Would the people suffer such a thing as that to be another month in their pastor's study? Brown, the blacksmith, said no! with a ring of his sledge upon the anvil, that was a clincher to that negative. B——, the butcher, surrendered the best quarter of the beeve he slew next day, to the enterprise. Gripe, the lawyer, opened his shell, and a five dollar gold piece swelled the stream that was to sweep the skeleton out of the parsonage. Judex, the judge, sent four fat octavos off in the same direction. M——, the merchant, would give a lot of Scotch divines no pence till they had marched into the study, and taken their proper places there. C——, the captain, did not know much about books, but an eagle that had been some time confined in his purse, was let loose, and flew away in the right direction. F——, the farmer, on his way from the city, stopped old Dobbin against the parsonage and made Robert Hall's works and a file of German divines jump out and report themselves in the room where "he had heard tell" there was a skeleton. Dr. Pestle knew something about skeletons—thought the veritable one in his own shop was enough for the parish—and therefore took strong ground against the other. B——, the bookseller, made a fearful chasm among his best books to fill one he had heard of at the parsonage. The matrons and the maidees caught fire in the general blaze, and a wheelbarrow full of larger and lesser divines was tilted over on the verandah of the pastor's house. The purse-strings of the young men snapped in all directions, and more than forty of the soundest theologians of the land had orders to hasten to the parsonage with the least possible delay. The little children got over the fright the first rumor about the skeleton gave them, and went with all glee and gladness into the enterprise that had set the parish into such an excitement.

A skeleton in the study now? Not the shadow of the shade of one. The recumbent divines have leaped upon their feet in joy at the coming of their brethren. Ponderous quartos and massive octavos have put to flight the pamphlets and newspapers that strove to hide the nakedness of the land, and now, in solid columns, cheer the eye of the observer. And the narrative I have given brings the information, if any desire it, in what way any parish in the land can drive so uncomely a spectacle as a skeleton out of the pastor's study. SIMON.

DOUGLAS JERROLD'S DYING MOMENTS.

IN THE LIFE of Douglas Jerrold, by his son, we have the following touching account of the great satirist's last moments in this life: When the doctor presently suggests that he must not despond—that he might be well again—those blue eyes seemed to borrow a last flash, and to express almost scorn. He saw the falsity spoken in kindness, and repelled it, for he had no fear of death. Then a faintness came upon him again, and he gasped for air, motioning all from the window. "Let me pass—let me pass!" he almost whispered. But not yet. He was carried to bed—the sun went down. Dr. Wright had determined to remain with his patient throughout the night. He was easier—but slaking now—beyond all doubt. You could hardly believe it, in the night, when his calm voice sounded again to speak of friends, to remember everybody, and to send kind messages to all. One child was away in America, and he sent him his blessing. Then in the depths of the night, during the intervals of applying bags of hot salt to his feet, he even talked of his newspaper, and bade me endeavor to carry on his name in it. Then he would lie back and murmur prayers; and then, as the kind physician hung over the bed, he would cry again and again, "Dear Doctor! dear Doctor! but it's no use." And then he would ask the hour—for he had a belief that he should not die at midnight.

Midnight came, however, and the grey dawn crept coldly into the sick room, and still the sufferer lay, begging for fresh air. We cast the window open, but this was not enough; we seized every fan that could be found, and waved them before him. "Why tease a dying wretch?" he said, presently, to the doctor, who was insisting upon giving him medicine. Then, when the breath got worse, and it appeared that in the next minute he must be suffocated, he cried "Christ! Christ!" The sun mounted the heavens slowly upon some most unhappy people that day. Wife and daughters had passed the night sitting, sobbing, in the dressing-room, the open door of which led to the sufferer's bed. He could not bear their tears; but at frequent intervals asked for one, then the other, and clasped them to his heart. In the morning, his sister arrived from the country. He kissed her—then looked over his shoulder. He could hardly speak above a whisper now; but he was seeking the second sister, to whom he had always been tenderly attached. She was not there. With a son on either side of him, with the kind doctor still leaning over him, he seemed at perfect peace—resigned. Still we waved the fans about him, giving him air; and still, at intervals, he talked faintly, but most collectedly. The dawn grew into a lovely summer morning. At 10 o'clock the patient was supped. He could hardly move in the bed, and said again, "Why torture a dying creature, Doctor?" But the cupping took no effect, and the doctor went away, to return in a few hours.

We were left alone with a dying father. Friends were hushed in the room down stairs, listening for a faint word of hope. Daughters, sister, wife, were sobbing in the dressing room. For a moment, to fetch something for the patient, my brother left me alone in the room. My arm was about the dear sufferer, propping his pillow as he moved restlessly. He looked with a terribly eager look at me, then at the opposite side of the bed, for the moment without the face of the dear boy, who had watched there night and day. His mouth moved, and I could read the deep emotion that possessed him. He said again and again, "Yes, yes," still looked at me, and then at the opposite side of the bed, I bent down to listen, but he said no more. Then, as I raised a spoon filled with iced water to his lips, his eyes for the first time wandered. My brother returned and held him with me. We saw a dreadful change. We called to the dear ones in the next room, and in wild agony they gathered about the bed. For a moment, again his eyes regained their light; he saw all about his death bed; his head leaned against my breast; he looked up, and said, as one had fell in mine, and my brother took the other, "This is as it should be." In a moment, without a struggle, peaceful as a child falls asleep in its nurse's arms, he fell into his long rest, with a smile upon his face.

THE FIRST STATE PRISONER.

BY GRANT THORNBURN.

I landed in New York, June, 1784, by trade a rough nailmaker, in the 22d year of my age. In October following, (at that time the Park was out of town, and only 50,000 inhabitants,) with ten thousand fools, some bigger and some smaller than myself, we stood watching the vibrations of the rope and iron hook, during two long hours. Then the Sheriff stood on the scaffold and read a reprieve. I confess I was much disappointed. I expected to see a hanging, but no hanging was there.

The man was Noah Gardner. He kept a large shoe store in New York. He committed forgery, which at that time was death, by the laws of these United States. The State prison of New York was in the course of erection at this time; this was the first prison erected in the world for reform, instead of hanging. The Society of Friends were the chief promoters of this humane system. One room in the prison was near ready to receive criminals. The Friends procured from the Governor a commutation from death to State prison for life.

Being a shoemaker by trade, they gave him a stool, wax, lasts, and awls, and here commenced the State prison shoe manufactory. Next court, six vagabonds were sent to keep him company, whom he learned to make shoes. I visited the prison three years after this. In one large room sat three hundred shoemakers. Noah was provost marshel, walking through the ranks with cane in hand, punishing evil doers and praising them that did well. Seven years having passed over him, the Friends waited on the Governor. "Friend," said they, "seven years ago you would have hung this man—now here is a reformed member saved to society."

He received an unconditional pardon, and came out. The Friends found him a store on Pearl street, found him money, endorsed his notes, and gave him their custom. Immediately he was in a thriving way. He joined the Society of Friends, and said thee and thou with the best of them. He had a wife, and children arrived at maturity.

His journeymen were chiefly men of family, and wrought at their own homes. One day he gave to a man a pair of boots. "Now, friend," said he, "thee must bring home these boots on the evening of the fourth day." Says he, "You shall have them."

The boots did not come home until the evening of the fifth day. Noah was wroth. He gave the man a long lecture on the evils of disappointment and want of punctunlity. When he drew up to breathe, the man replied;

"Sir, I am a poor man—have three children—the youngest forty-eight hours old. I had to attend to my wife and cook for my children. It was not in my power to finish the boots sooner." Noah still continued to magnify the horrors of disappointment. The man grew angry—the Scotch blood boiled in his veins—he struck the counter with his fist like a sledge hammer, and answered:

"I know," said he, "its a terrible thing to be disappointed. I remember going up to the Park to see you hung, and I never was so disappointed in my life as when I saw the reprieve."

Now this was a knock down argument, as an Irishman would say. It was a case in point, as they would say in court, and a fact beyond all controversy, as they say in Congress. Noah was dumb, he opened not his mouth. He gave the man another pair to make, kept him in his employment, treated him kindly, but, as the man said, he never heard the word disappointment drop from his lips thereafter.

Noah went on prospering and to prosper. One day he borrowed various sums of money, and obtained a number of endorsements. The bills he changed for gold; the endorsements he got shaved, in Wall street. That night he was off for parts unknown, taking with him a dear sister, the wife of a young friend, to cheer him on the way. The story is true to the letter, and being the first subject of State prison reform, the day dreamers of the present time may settle the question, whether hanging or State prison reform is the surest way of curing a villain. His family and friends never heard from him.

STORMY SABBATHS.

THE Vermont Chronicle states, on the authority of a meteorological journal kept for ten years past, at Dartmouth College. 1. That nearly one-fourth of the Sabbaths are stormy; 2. Nearly one-sixth are excessively hot or cold; 3. Considerably more than one-third are, from all causes, inclement. Except in 1845, no other year of the ten has had so many such Sabbaths as 1852. Those individuals or families that excuse themselves from the house of God, because of unpleasant weather—and they are not few—lose the benefits of public worship nearly half the year! And the loss is a most serious one to themselves, to the community, and to the ministry. We once knew a good man, who lived more than three miles from the house of God, and was often tempted by the "signs of the sky," to stay at home with his family on the Sabbath; he sometimes yielded to the temptation, not without an occasional twinge of conscience. At length he resolved that he would never absent himself from the house of God on account of weather, unless it was so bad as to prevent his going to the village where it stood, for the addition of his purse. "Never," said he, towards the close of his life, "never, after making this resolution, did any Sabbath occur so hot or so cold, so windy or stormy, that I could not attend with my brethren the public worship of God." This man lived to be eighty years of age, had a family of thirteen, "sons and daughters,"—all of them as regular attendants as himself at the village Church—two of them became ministers of the Gospel; all of them gave themselves to the Lord in their early days; and their descendants are now scattered everywhere, diffusing the spirit of their parents over the communities where their lot is cast. So much for honoring God, by not forsaking the assemblies of the saints, on account of murky or inclement Sabbaths.

RELATION OF THE LOCAL AND ITINERANT MINISTRY.

THERE is nothing more uncalled for and absurd than the idea of rivalry between these brothers in a common cause. And I am strongly inclined to think that it is often represented to be greater than truth will justify. As a general thing, there is really very little antagonism of interest or of feeling between them.

But where it does exist, it is sufficiently inconsistent and unwise. The two classes frequently change places. One exchanges his ledger, plough or plane for the Bible and discipline; and the other leaves his circuit or station, and retires to the local ranks. If, as Methodists generally believe the itinerancy offers the widest field of usefulness, every local preacher is an itinerant at heart—wishes, to do the greatest possible amount of good; and every traveling preacher is liable to feel compelled to locate. How much would each, in such circumstances, be ashamed of the foolish jealousies he may have felt towards the other. He would then feel that they are really one—that they are only in different positions on the same battle-field and that they are bound to co-operate with and love each other. And, I believe, this is the real state of things almost everywhere. A different view is encouraged only by those who would rather see men damned, than to see them saved by increasing the numbers of the Methodist "Society." JUVENIS.

DE QUINCY.

The North American Review for January, contains an article on De Quincy, from which the following description of the man is taken: In person he is anything but prepossessing, being diminutive in stature, and awkward in his movements, with a shrivelled, yellow, parchment skin. His head, however, is superb, and his face remarkably sensitive and expressive; the eyes sunken, but brilliant with the fire of genius and the illuminations of opium. In manners he is a model of decorum, urbanity, and natural, unaffected gentility. He is a magnificent talker, and a fine reader; which last quality he notes as a rare accomplishment, whether among men or women. He is genial and hospitable in his household. He performs set tasks of walking, day by day, in his garden, and marks his progress by deposits of stone. He has offered his body, after death, to the surgeons for dissection, as his contribution to physiological science. He seriously believes that the dreadful gnawing of the stomach, already alluded to, which arises, perhaps, from the collapse and impotency of that organ through the use of opium, is caused by the ravages of a living animal. He is singular in his habits, often disappears from his home for days together—no inquiry being made after him by his friends—and returns as mysteriously as he went. He has two daughters, one of whom is married to an officer in the Indian army; the other, and eldest, presides over the house, and acts as his amanuensis."

THE DEFENCES OF NEW ORLEANS.

A correspondent of the New York Times, writing from this city concerning Lieut. Gen. Scott's visit to the Southern seaboard, gives a long and interesting description of the works by which the approaches to New Orleans are to be defended. We make the following extracts:

I will now speak of the system of defense which our engineers have adopted to narrow down, as much as possible, the natural exposure of New Orleans. To defend the principal approach—that by the Mississippi—two forts are being constructed, on opposite banks, one lower down the stream than the other, that their batteries may not rake. Fort St. Philip is a reconstruction upon the foundation of the old Spanish fort which held the British fleet at bay in 1814, with the addition of the exterior batteries. It is being built in an irregular star form and will mount 125 guns in barbette, of which ten will be Columbiads. The scarp walls, as of all our forts here, are made of brick, with earthen parapets and glacieres. It can be completed in a few months.

Fort Jackson, commenced in 1827, is being constructed on the pentagon plan. It will carry 150 guns, 100 in barbette and 50 in casemate. Of the former, 25 are to be Columbiads; the rest 42, 32 and 24 pounders, with furnaces for heating redhot shot. This fort is near completion, and its exterior battery could be finished in one month. Between these forts a system of two lines of chained rafts has been perfected, and could be carried out immediately upon a declaration of war, or on the appearance of a hostile fleet off the mouth of the river. The principal approach to the city is, then, almost as well defended as the Narrows at New York.

There is but one channel to enter Barataria Bay, and that a bee line heading due north, directly upon Grand Terre Island. The soundings show nine feet of water into the bay, where it deepens considerably; but the channel is every year becoming deeper. Lafitte showed his sagacity by selecting this island as the seat of his operations against the customs, landing his cargoes here and sending them up the bayous in boats to the city. The oyster boats now come up the same route to within a few hundred yards of the river, opposite the Fourth District of New Orleans. Here they are attached upon a rude car, which draws them up an inclined plain, over the levee, then down into the river, where they again find themselves afloat. This shows what an excellent base of operations against New Orleans Grand Terre Island would be. But upon the rude foundation of Lafitte's battery, raking the channel, is Fort Livingston, commenced in 1848, and now progressing under the superintendence of Lieut. Stevens, of the Engineers. It is built square with a land counterscarp, the two water sides playing diagonally down the channel. Its armament will consist of 8 guns in casemate and 28 in barbette; of the latter, 22 will be 24 pounders and 6 ten inch Columbiads, for long range.

The approach by way of the lakes Borgne and Pontchartrain can never be thoroughly defended by permanent fortifications. It has been proposed to build large works at each end of Ship Island, with armaments of monster Paixhans; but this would be as expensive, difficult and uncertain as the plan for defending the outer bay of New York by a fort at Sandy Hook. If the enemy attack us through the lakes, we must rely upon courageous breasts and strong arms, only partially aided by the small works thrown up.

Considering the enemy at anchor in their transports and light vessels within Lake Borgne, we will look to the most feasible routes for their descent upon the city. They could enter Lake Pontchartrain by either of two passes—Chef Menteur or the Rigolets—and land immediately in the rear of the city. They could pass their troops in boats through Bayou Dupre into the Mississippi, twelve miles below the city, or through Bienvenu Canal, eight miles below. The latter was the one the English selected in 1814. Another route, and perhaps the best of all, would be to land their forces at Proctor's Landing, on Lake Borgne, and march into the city along the ridge upon which is now laid the track of our Mexican Gulf Railroad.

To defend the last named, a fort is being constructed at Proctor's Landing, consisting of a brick tower and exterior battery. Its armament will consist of 20 guns in barbette, of which 8 will be Columbiads, and the balance 42, 32 and 24 pounders. This work work was commenced in 1856, and could be completed in a few months.

Tower Dupre guards the bayou of the same name, mounting 14 guns, and the Bienvenu Canal is defended by a battery of the same strength. These little works, however, might be easily carried by a determined enemy, and are only armed with light guns, such as could be quickly handled to rake approaching boats. Both of these are completed, but need repairs to place them in effective condition.

The two passages from Lake Borgne into Lake Pontchartrain are each guarded: the Rigolets by Fort Pike and the Chef Montlaur by Fort McComb, late Fort Wood. Each of these works carry some forty guns, a few casemate, and it is intended to replace some of their thirty-two pounders with nine inch Columbiads. In the last report to the Chief of the Engineer Bureau at Washington, [illegible] each work, the required time to put forts Pike and McComb in readiness for an attack, was given as thirty minutes. The surprise of Gen. Scott can be imagined, then, when, on passing through the Rigolets, in the mail steamer on his late visit to this city from Mobile, Fort Pike was unable to give him the number of guns his rank entitles him to, on account of a scarcity of powder.

The long continued stay of Lieutenant-General Scott in New Orleans has probably been a subject of comment with many, as he has already been with us six weeks. He started on his tour with especial thought to the sea coast defenses of our Southern ports. If the Gulf of Mexico is to be the seat of a war, how necessary to the success of all offensive operations on our part is it that the harbors of Key West, Tortugas, Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans should be rendered impregnable to attack. The first four named, and particularly the first two, would be indispensable as depots and rendezvous, but New Orleans must perforce be the basis of all operations. Down the great Mississippi would be brought all our stores and ammunition as well as troops. Here must be the army concentrated, should the invasion of Cuba be determined upon, particularly if the ocean was swept by foreign navies. Mobile, Pensacola and Key West would be the stepping stones—nothing more. Water is preeminently necessary to extensive army transportation, and by water can the immense resources of the great West be brought to New Orleans. Steam, too, is now indispensable to the naval warfare of the prominent maritime nations; and to what other port of the gulf coast can our disabled steamers retreat for repairs than New Orleans?

All this is patent to the experienced mind of General Scott. He found Key West and the Tortugas American Gibraltars. Pensacola almost impregnable, and Mobile well guarded. He quickly passed on to the principal object of his care—New Orleans—and here he rests, dissatisfied with its exposure to attack. The Engineer Bureau felt the need of directing the greatest skill and talent the country could command at this point of our national defense when they first placed Major Barnard in superintendance, and afterwards Major Beauregard, who is still remaining. Doubtless the system originated and perfected by these talented officers is as excellent a one as the monster obstacles nature threw in the way of defending New Orleans would admit; but General Scott clearly perceives the present defenselessness, almost, of our city.

The operations on all of the works I have spoken of are now at a stand, from want of funds. Estimates of the appropriations necessary to complete them are made annually, but not acted upon by Congress.

CURIOUS HISTORICAL FACT.

DURING the troubles in the reign of Charles I, a country girl came to London in search of a place as a servant-maid; but not succeeding, she hired herself to carry out beer from a brew-house, and was one of those called tub-women. The brewer observing a good-looking girl in this low occupation, took her into his family as a servant; and after a short time married her; but he died while yet she was a young woman; and left her the bulk of his fortune. The business of the brewery was dropped. The young woman was recommended to Mr. Hyde as a skilful lawyer to arrange her husband's affairs. Hyde, who was after wards the great Earl of Clarendon, finding the widow's fortune very considerable, married her. Of this marriage, there was no other issue than a daughter, who was afterwards the wife of James II., and mother of Mary and Anne, Queens of England.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1859.

MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY.

Mr. Editor: I am informed by a letter just received from Dr. Schon, that the Board of the Parent Missionary Society, has accepted the invitation of the Alabama Conference, to hold the next anniversary of the Society in Mobile. It will accordingly be held here on the first and second days of May, being Sunday and Monday.

The speakers selected for the occasion are Drs. Parsons, Wightman, and Hamilton. Dr. Schon will be here of course, and take a part in the exercises. It is also expected that one or more of the Bishops will be present. We anticipate a grand occasion, both for Methodism in this Conference, and for the cause of Christ in general.

J. HAMILTON.

THE ADVOCATE.

Meeting of the Publishing Committee.

The Joint Publishing Committee of the Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi Conferences, for the New Orleans Christian Advocate met on Wednesday, the 9th instant, in this city, according to notice.

Present: B. M. Drake, W. H. Watkins, and J. J. Wheat, of the Mississippi Conference; J. T. Heard, and M. S. Andrews, of the Alabama Conference; and J. C. Keener, J. B. Walker, and L. Parker, of the Louisiana Conference.

By the action of the last General Conference, the paper, its press, engine, type and subscription books have become the property of the three Annual Conferences, represented by the Committee.

The Advocate is out of debt; its weekly impression is 7,200 copies. It occupies a part of the Depository building of the Southern Publishing-house, 112 Camp street, so that hereafter it will be free of expense for rent.

The Committee think it practicable to keep the expenses of its publication strictly within the amount of its receipts, and intend so to do; at the same time they believe that it is possible to improve the paper both in form and in the value of its matter. As the receipts increase they hope to be able to secure the services of the best writers in the Church, and believe the true policy of the publishers of a religious Journal is, to expend all profits of publication upon the paper itself. This view they think accurately reflects the object which the Annual Conferences had before them in establishing the paper.

They also think, that it is not the wish of those whom they represent, that this paper should adopt the system which others have adopted of paying agents a percentage upon subscriptions. As a wise pecuniary transaction, that system may be the better for the paper; but the present system, it is believed, better suits the temper and purposes of both ministers and agents.

The Conferences represented desire ... shall in all points fill their ... religious weekly should be, it is ... power to secure it. The present list of subscribers ... to give the Advocate a positive and ... but scarcely more. But, if the list ... fifteen thousand, then they will ... the best position in the Southern States ... an interesting and highly effective ... to do it with. Up to this time, it is ... that the former publishing committee, ... present editors, have published a paper ... as they themselves wish to publish, ... if the subscription list had been double ...

... for those who have labored to secure ... the paper to reflect that it is a perma... secured. As a general thing, subscribers ... continue to take the paper ... in securing a subscriber, ... religious paper not merely to an individual, ... to shape the opinions and senti... give a religious tone and cast to ... members.

... already come to be a powerful arm ... service of the Methodist Church, and every Methodist preacher in the South-west cannot but feel that it is a valuable aid to him in his effort to spread the knowledge of the Redeemer's kingdom, to plant and fix in the minds of the people principles and morals of the Christian Religion. This the committee are assured will continue to be the case so long as the Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences heartily unite in its support.

NEXT NUMBER OF THE QUARTERLY.

Having labored hard at the last General Conference for the preservation of the life of the Quarterly, it is no small gratification to learn that it is prospering in a most encouraging manner. The best of all is, its prosperity seems to be a matter of general joy among our people—a proof of the hold it has upon their affections, and of the interest they feel in whatever concerns the welfare of the Church. Let all unite to increase its circulation. The next number will present an intellectual and spiritual feast. We have the privilege of informing our readers, in advance, of its contents.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL INTEREST.

A Church that neglects her children is doomed. Such a Church ought to be doomed; for it is a curse to the world, a dishonor to God and his Gospel. Such a Church has no future—only a decaying present, and a ruin-strewn past. Such a Church connives at the damnation of souls; for she neglects the true season of discipleship and conversion—infancy and childhood—and commences her work upon adult sinners, when heavy loss is inevitable. And all ministers and members who neglect the Sunday-school interest of the Church are helping to bring these woes upon her.

We are led to make these remarks, at this time, in view of the fact that Dr. Taylor, our Sunday-school Secretary, is now out on his Mission, striving to raise funds to endow our Sunday-school society, so that it can both increase its catalogue, and cheapen its publications. This is the great nursery of the Church—its sacred University. Let it be endowed. Let our wealthy men be liberal to the Secretary. This is the greatest enterprise of our Church. This is the most important item in the endownment of the Publishing-house. So important is it, that a great society, the American Sunday-school Union, has its agents all over the United States seeking to take this important interest out of the hands of the Churches. Let Dr. Taylor have individual donations of a thousand, five hundred, one hundred, fifty, ten, and five dollars, and let him take up collections in every place. Let him have a collection at the "gathering" here on the 20th. We call attention to the Circular of the Board of Managers of the Sunday-school Society at Nashville. It will be found below.

"At a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Sunday-school Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, held at the Publishing-house, on the 31st of January, 1859, the undersigned were appointed a committee to address a letter to the ministers and members of the Church throughout the connection, on a few points involving the interests of the society.

"In discharging this important duty, they would, first of all, thank God for his blessings upon the efforts of his servants in the organization and support of Sunday-schools in many portions of the Church. Much fruit, rich, ripe fruit, has already been gathered. Thousands multiplied, taught in the Sabbath-schools of the Church, have become ornaments of the house of God—yea, have become pillars in the Temple of the Most High. Enough has been accomplished to strengthen the faith and augment the zeal of every genuine Christian.

"It is not, however, our purpose at present to dwell upon these pleasing points. We wish to present the subject in another aspect. We begin by stating a few facts, which are worthy the consideration of the whole Church. And,

"First. It is a fact, that thousands of children connected with Methodist families are utterly destitute of Sunday-school instruction. By the neglect of pastors or parents, or both, or by the indifference of Churches, or the negligence of those who call themselves Christians, many neighborhoods are without these nurseries of piety. The children are, in a measure, left ignorant of the teachings of God's word, and are growing up without the restraints of piety. We speak this to our own shame, as a professedly Christian people.

"Second. It is a fact, that in many other places, the children of our Church are thrust, from choice or by necessity, into other Sunday-schools, where they are taught doctrines and usages at variance with what we regard to be the truth as it is in Jesus; thus alienating those baptized in our Church from our own communion, and building up those who in years past stood in opposition to the progress of our beloved Zion.

"Third. It is a fact that, while other associations are liberally aided in their pecuniary resources, thus enabling them to publish, at cheap rates, Sunday-school books and papers, our own people have contributed but very small sums to help in the dissemination of light and knowledge through the medium of the press. While the American Sunday-school Union, for example, receives, annually, hundreds of thousands of dollars by contributions, bequests, etc., the Methodist Publishing-house, in its infancy, has been left almost without any help, and, at great pecuniary sacrifice, has been compelled to supply the Church with Sabbath-school publications. Thousands of dollars have been spent, which have never been returned, in order to meet the wants of the Church in the South. And when appeals have been made, the response has been but faint.

"Fourth. It is a fact, that, after all this cost and sacrifice of money to supply the Church with a sound juvenile literature, many of our people purchase and use in their schools the publications of other societies, allowing the superior works, prepared with labor and care by their own brethren, to lie on the shelves, because, perchance, they might save a few pennies in the price of the books or papers offered, or because some agent approaches their doors and solicits their patronage. The Sunday-school Visitor, one of the most beautiful and useful child's papers in the land, goes almost begging, while inferior Northern publications are circulated all through the South.

"These are facts—evils, over which many of the friends of the Church mourn—evils that should be remedied.

"The late General Conference, after mature deliberation, determined to give, if possible, a new impetus to the cause of Sunday-school instruction. Hence they appointed a Secretary, who should take a general oversight of this great interest of the Church and of the country. It is made his duty to aid in the organization of Sunday-schools, and to collect funds to enable the Publishing-house to send forth such publications as shall be acceptable and profitable to the children of the Church. The Rev. Charles Taylor was appointed to the office. He has visited several of the Annual Conferences, and has met a cordial welcome wherever he has gone, yet he has not, up to this time, realized a large amount of pecuniary aid. He has received large promises, and witnessed many strong resolutions: these, however, unless carried out and amply sustained, will be of no practical utility in the end. It will be impossible for the Secretary to visit every portion of the Church, and to present the claims of the cause before every congregation. He must have the hearty co-operation of his brethren, both of the ministry and laity: the friends of the Church and of moral instruction must everywhere rally to the cause.

"The Board respectfully suggest—

"1. That in every neighborhood accessible a Sunday-school should be speedily organized.

"2. That the preachers should present the claims of the Sunday-school cause to every congregation in the Connection, and take up collections for the purpose of procuring libraries and the Sunday-school Visitor for the use of the schools established.

"3. They suggest that an effort be made in all the more wealthy congregations to procure aid in behalf of the poorer neighborhoods, that those who have not the means may be supplied with books.

"4. They suggest that efforts be made to enable the Society to liquidate a large debt due the Publishing-house, incurred by its attempt to supply the Church with suitable publications.

"One united, strong effort would insure success, and strengthen the Secretary in his work and labor of love.

"The hope of the Church is in the children of the Church. These, consecrated to God, properly matured and trained, will constitute the glory of the Church in after-generations: neglected and turned over to the world and Satan, the Church will be prostrated, and sin and infidelity will have a complete triumph.

"Methodists! Southern Methodists! Do you love your children? do you love the Church—the Church which, in the hands of God, has been made the instrument of your conversion—your salvation? Are you willing to see your children neglected and led into the snare of the evil one? Are you willing to see your little ones baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, baptized with your tears, turned away from your Church and into the world, or into those Churches whose doctrines and polity you cannot approve? We appeal to you by the love you have for Christ, for his Church, for your children, for your race, to rally to the support of the Sunday-school cause. Open your hearts, your mouths, your pockets. Feel for this glorious organization—speak in its behalf—give your money in its aid, pray for its success, and the blessing of Heaven shall crown your efforts.

"To our ministerial brethren we would say that much is expected of you. It is a settled principle that Protestant ministers are to look after the lambs of the flock; and that pastor who neglects this portion of his charge, forfeits the confidence of his brethren, and destroys, in a measure, his usefulness. Methodist preachers, presiding elders, preachers in charge, helpers, and local brethren, all are expected to look after the children. Let each look to the teachings of God's word, the instructions in the Discipline, and to his solemn vows when he entered upon his work, and his zeal will be stirred. Let Quarterly Conferences, old men and young, matrons and maidens, all engage in the blessed work of Sabbath-school instruction, and a brighter day will dawn upon the Church.

"Praying the blessing of God upon our brethren, and especially upon the children, we subscribe ourselves your brethren and fellow-laborers in the kingdom and patience of Christ.

"In behalf of the Board of Managers."

OUR GENERAL MINUTES.

These will be out soon. By the General Recapitulation below, our readers will be gratified to learn that the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has now about seven hundred thousand members, and that the increase for the past year has been about forty-four thousand. May it be one hundred thousand during the present year.

[The transferred preachers are reckoned with those of the Conferences to which they belong. The six bishops are not counted. Their addition would make the number of travelling preachers, including those on the supernannuated list, 2577. The preachers who located (77) are not counted. On the other hand, the preachers who were admitted on trial (224), and those who were readmitted (58), are counted among the travelling preachers, though many of them are also reckoned with the local preachers. The members in several charges in the Kentucky Conference, as well as those in China, are not counted, not being officially reported—these would make the total number of ministers and members about 700,000, and the increase about 44,000. As we have received no official statistics of the Pacific Conference, we insert the numbers as we gather them from the Church papers. We think the number of local preachers in that Conference is not so great as is here stated; though the gross number of ministers and members may be correctly reported. The apparent decrease in the North Carolina Conference is accounted for by the transfer of several charges to the Virginia Conference. We have taken great pains to approximate correctness.]

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI.

MR. EDITOR:—I am gratified to learn that my series, which lately appeared in the Advocate under the above title, was noticed by many of your readers with considerable interest, and that quite a number have preserved copies for future reference. I have also been requested by an accomplished historian to permit their use, as to proper names, dates and facts, in a work on "The Men and Times of the Mississippi Territory," which he is now engaged in writing. This being the case, I request the correction of a few typographical errors as to dates and proper names; other errors in orthography and punctuation can be easily corrected by the reader.

In No. II, for "in 1776 the Province passed under Spanish rule," change the date to 1779.

Near the close of the same number, for Coleman say Colemon.

In No. IV, twenty-first line from top, for Mrs. Jones, say Mr. Jones.

In No. VI, eighteenth line from top, for 16th of April, say 6th, etc.

In No. VII, for Col. Elliot, read Ellicot.

In No. VIII, in the couplet of poetry, for "no board embalms," say "no bard embalms."

Since writing this number I have ascertained that Rev. Richard Curtis died October 28th, 1811.

In the beginning of No. IX, following the Annalists of our Church, I say that "Methodism was first introduced into the city of New York in 1766." In this I think it more than probable that we all are mistaken, and that the date should be 1760 instead. Read the article in the January number of the Southern Quarterly Review for 1859, on the "Introduction of Methodism into America," by Geo. C. M. Roberts, of Baltimore.

Near the close of No. IX, for "Rev. John Buller, say Bullen.

It is my purpose, the Lord willing, at some future day, when I can find leisure from "field operations," to continue my reminiscences of early Methodism and Methodist Preachers in the South-West; but for the present I have other work to do. Yours affectionately, Bellegrove, March 9, 1859. J. G. JONES.

HAVE WE A PRELATE AMONG US?

A writer in one of our Northern Methodist exchanges, in giving an account of a service in which Bishop Baker participated, says: "Bishop Baker selected for his text on this occasion Jude 3: "Ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." It is not our purpose to lay before your readers the prelate's discourse, or even the merest outline thereof, for it is possible we may at some future day feel disposed to make use of his admirable thoughts for the special interest and benefit of our own congregation."

We had been led to believe, heretofore, that Southern Methodists were a little more "high Church" in their estimate of the episcopacy than their Northern brethren; we think so still, and are pleased that it is so. But this writer certainly has notions not at all in harmony with received views. Prelatical episcopacy is unknown to Methodism.

THE MAILS! THE MAILS!

The Demon of Discord seems to have gotten possession of them. We mail our papers regularly and carefully, and yet complaints of irregularity and non-reception come in from all quarters, particularly from Mobile, Natchez, and all along the Jackson rail-road. Heavy complaints are made against our friend, Col. Marks, Postmaster of this city. We know not who is to blame. We are doing all we can to find out. Meanwhile we are heavily censured for what we cannot help.

REV. C. B. PARSONS, D. D.

Of this distinguished divine and preacher, who is stationed in Louisville, Ky., a correspondent of the North Western Christian Advocate, Chicago, has the following:

"Though as sedate as Bishop Morris, Dr. Parsons sometimes indulges in anecdote, which he tells with an arch humor which cannot but excite, as well as please. We give one which we heard him tell a few days since, which may serve to show my old friend "Buckeye," and such like men, that they are not alone in "matrimonial fortunes." "Last year, when I was stationed in St. Louis," said the doctor, "I was called upon one evening to go away out a number of squares in the city to marry a couple of old folks, who had concluded to close the evening of life together. After ten I started, and following the directions given, I soon came to the dwelling where the nuptials were to be celebrated. The children and grandchildren of the bride and groom, with a number of others, were present, and the spirits of bride and groom, children and all, appeared to be most joyfully elevated.

"I entered, and in a few moments called the interested parties to the floor. I began the usual ceremony, and asked the gentleman if he would take this lady to be his wedded wife, etc., etc. Making a very polite bow, the groom responded, 'Well, sir, I won't do nothin' else.' I turned to the bride and asked her 'if she would take this gentleman to be her wedded husband,' etc., and she responded, most heartily, 'Yes-sir-ee.' The assembly was moved, you may be sure, and, as soon as I could, I was for moving, too; but just as I was leaving the gate, one of the sons of the groom hailed me with, 'Oh, say, Mr. Preacher, tell me, did the old cock pay you?' I could but smile as I gave him an affirmative answer, and hurried home, thinking, all the way though, of the strange combinations of Cupid and Hymen."

The Northern and Southern preachers in that region seem to be very pleasantly associated, and to work harmoniously. The same correspondent, a Northern preacher, continues:

"On the first Thursday morning of each month, the Methodist preachers of Jeffersonville, Louisville, and New Albany, meet in one of these cities to hold a religious and social meeting. They all seem to be Methodists of one common stripe and spirit, and certainly no one can doubt but the feeling is fraternal and Christian. They all have the essential requisite—"the true Methodist preacher's heart." We talk about "the vexed question," as we do about politics generally, but our work and faith as Methodists form the chief object of our thoughts and labors. Brothers Owings, Bristow, Wellborn, and Dr. Parsons have rendered very efficient services in the revival. Their labors have been highly blest, and they hold a warm place in the hearts of the people. The sermon of Dr. Parsons, last night, was one of the noblest efforts of the pulpit. The house was crowded, and after the sermon was over the altar was pretty well filled with seekers of salvation, though the meeting had been in progress six weeks. Brother Sullivan reports over one hundred and eighty recruits during the meeting."

RELIABLE SUBSCRIPTION.

The principal objection to conducting a newspaper on the credit system, is the alleged comparative worthlessness of debts for newspaper subscriptions. An experienced newspaper clerk told us, a few days since, that 40 per cent was the usual discount for loss. On the same ground a friend advised us to conduct our paper strictly on the cash-in-advance system. Now we believe that our subscribers will pay their just debts. Brother, subscriber, shall we lose anything by having trusted you? "In our imagination we hear you say—"no!" In our mind's eye we see you counting out the money to send and pay your arrearages. "By the eye of faith," we see you paying the amount to an agent, or dropping the letter containing the remittance into the post-office.

TEXAS AND NEW ORLEANS RAILROAD.

This is the name by which the "Sabine and Galveston Bay Railroad and Lumber Company" is in Texas almost universally called. It is a work of great importance to this city as well as to Texas, and is in process of active prosecution, though many of our citizens probably are scarcely aware of its existence. Its design is to connect New Orleans with Houston, which is the railroad centre of Texas. The Company has a liberal charter from the Legislature of that State, and has the whole road under contract from Houston to the Sabine river, a distance of one hundred miles. The iron for the whole distance has been purchased in Wales, and enough to lay forty miles of the track is now afloat, and will be laid down upon its arrival, the track-way being in readiness to receive it.

Col. A. M. Gentry, the energetic and indefatigable President of this Company, visited London last fall for the purpose of making arrangements to buy the iron for the work, and notwithstanding all the discouraging circumstances by which he was met—which need not here be recapitulated—he succeeded fully in his object, and of course returned home in high spirits. He has just left with us an interesting printed document containing a vast amount of information, concerning not only this road, its charter, etc., but of the resources of Texas and her general railroad system.

Up to the present time the Company's operations have been confined to the territory between Houston and the Sabine river. The construction of the railroad to that line having been placed beyond reasonable contingency, it now wishes to cross the Rubicon—we mean the Sabine—and continue the railroad through Louisiana territory to our doors! Bravo for Texas in general, the Houston and New Orleans Railroad Company in particular, and Col. Gentry especially! We have been sitting quietly and coolly by, as unconcerned apparently about the matter as any old Turk might be supposed to be who should witness the burning of his house, only exclaiming, Allah is Great! We presume there will be no serious objections made to the continuance of this road to New Orleans on the part of our citizens, though we would not like to be too sanguine on this point. Col. Gentry has gone up to Baton Rouge to find out, and intends asking the Legislature for the desired information. He does not ask the Legislature for a dime either in money or bonds. All the Company he represents, asks, is to be recognized as a corporation in this State, for the purpose of building this Texas and New Orleans Railroad, from the Sabine to the terminus of the Opelousas Railroad. If any of our people should wish to subscribe to the stock subsequently, we presume the Company will give them a chance; if not, why then it will go right on and build the road—unless it is absolutely stopped "by authority," just as though we had no interest in the matter whatever!

One cannot but admire the energy which our Houston friends have exhibited in this business, and the quiet, unostentatious manner in which they have pushed it ahead to its present forward condition. It has been but a little over two years since the inception of the idea. Now, forty miles of track are ready for the iron; the iron for the whole distance has been provided for, and the whole work is under contract, and it will be pushed onward to an early completion. We doubt not the same energy will characterize their operations on this side of the boundary line. The whole distance by the proposed line from New Orleans to Houston is 337 miles. The Opelousas Railroad, on which the cars run daily, extends 81 miles, and as we have before said, the provisions have been completed for 100 miles between Houston and the Sabine, leaving a gap of 156 miles to fill up. The Texas Company contemplates uniting with the Opelousas road at or near New Iberia, in the Parish of St. Martin, a distance of 113 miles from the Sabine. From Berwick's Bay, the present terminus of the Opelousas Railroad, in the Parish of St. Mary, to New Iberia, the distance, we believe, is 41 miles.

At another time, we shall refer to this subject again, and show the vast interests that depend upon filling up this gap of 156 miles of railroad between Berwick's Bay and the Sabine river, which will thus make a continuous line of railroad, on nearly an air line; from New Orleans to Houston.

The Legislature will, of course, promptly grant the requisite authority to the Houston Company, by giving a legal existence to the "New Orleans and Texas Railroad Company." It is difficult to tell whether New Orleans or Texas is more deeply interested in this work. The interests in it of each cannot well be over-estimated.

CLOSER UNION WITH THE WEST.

A movement has been made in St. Louis to effect a closer commercial communication with the cities of the South. The opinion begins to gather unity and force that the true interest of the West is nearly identical with that of the South, and it is an omen of good in these troubled times.

A closer commercial connection only is needed between the important shipping points of the West and the commercial cities of the South, to destroy the spirit of sectionalism that has prevailed throughout the country for many years. Intercourse destroys unfounded prejudices and harmonizes conflicting opinions. Mutual business dependence produces concert of action on great national questions that involve the peace of the country.

The great contrast between the solvency of the South and other parts of the country during a period of commercial disaster, the thrift and prosperity manifested South of Mason and Dixon's line, and the recuperative power of the cotton States, have given them a most enviable position in the commercial world. These tangible proofs of power, and the closer contiguity of the West with the South by the gradual completion of great lines of railway, are presenting new political combinations which the statesman would profit by studying.

Ten years hence, New Orleans and St. Louis will be brought into the immediate neighborhood of each other. The dependencies of the latter city will become tributaries to our metropolis. The territories now comparatively a wilderness to the South-west of St. Louis, stretching away to the Gulf of California, will be connected with us by a multitude of lines, over which the steam-horse will daily sweep with his rattling trains, bringing all of their vast population and accumulating wealth to increase our prosperity, making this whole region dependent on this Southern city, and gradually identifying its interests and harmonizing its opinions with ours.

The true policy of the South—the duty of patriotism—is to speed the connections now in progress. Union of the South for the prosecution of her great works of internal communication is a guarantee of the perpetuity of the republic, and the acknowledgement of the rights of the slave States.

Who does not feel a degree of astonishment when he witnesses hostility in a resident of the South, to any one of the great enterprises of the day that are on Southern soil? Who is not willing even to sacrifice something to accomplish the supremacy of Southern opinion produced by the agency of commercial intercourse?

The Southern road, extending from the Atlantic to a junction in Texas with the Southern Pacific; the Memphis and Fulton road, meeting the same great trunk line hundreds of miles this side of the Staked Plains; the St. Louis road, connecting with the Fulton and Memphis; and the projected enterprise from Kansas, in the same direction, and uniting with the same great thoroughfare; the Opelousas and Western road, striking it almost on the Texas line—together form a network of communication, mainly on the West of the Mississippi, that bring territory sufficient to form an empire into the closest possible connection commercially with this city and with Charleston. Can any one doubt that here is building up a foundation of political power, that will in the not distant future be irresistible.

It matters not whether this territory shall be free or slave territory—relations which the laws of climate, productions and soil, will settle; the unity of interest produced by contiguity and mutual business relations, will effect a union of sentiment on the great questions of political polity that now agitate, or may hereafter convulse the Republic.

Do not these suggestions make plain the path of duty of all men who love their own institutions and cherish, with equal affection, the Union of the States? Can we be apathetic—still less hostile to any enterprise that promises so much in the future—without the suspicion of narrow views or doubtful friendship to the South. [Picayune.

THE GREAT WEALTH OF LOUISIANA.

In the present confused and incomplete state of our census returns, we have no reliable data by which to estimate the proportionate productions and wealth of this State; but we think that enough is ascertained to justify the assertion that Louisiana, regarding its population, is the richest agricultural State in the Union.

Taking our total population at 630,000, and subtracting one hundred and thirty thousand for the population of this city which is exclusively engaged in mechanical and commercial pursuits, we have, as a very high estimate, the number of 500,000 engaged in agriculture, which may be equally divided into free and slave. Considering the latter as capital, and dividing the amount of surplus products of the State by the number of whites, some very extraordinary results will follow. They will demonstrate our proposition that this is the wealthiest State in the Union. The surplus in exportable production of the agriculture of this State may be thus stated, rather under the real figures:

Sugar 350,000 hhds. valued at	$21,000,000
Molasses 450,000 bbls	4,500,000
Cotton 550,000 bales	22,500,000
All other products valued at	5,000,000
Total	$53,000,000

Dividing this sum by the white population, would give over $200 to each man, woman and child, or one thousand dollars to each adult male. This is a result that few communities, if any, in the world can present.

We are not considering the total production or wealth in the State, but only its surplus, the profits of its industry, that which remains after the consumption by our whole population. It is a common fallacy of some of the Northern politicians and statists, in order to exaggerate the wealth and importance of Northern States, to include in their estimates of the production of their States, everything that is raised or that grows. Thus a great deal is said of the value of the hay crop, which is all consumed by their own people; of their lumber, their cattle, their cordwood, and even their poultry, which are all in like manner consumed.

Of these various articles Louisiana produces quite as much as any other State in the Union. The article of wood alone, as fuel for the hundreds of steamboats that ply our rivers, is one of great value, and would, if we could ascertain the figures, tend greatly to swell the sum of our wealth. Of corn, too, there is raised in the State quite as much, if not more, than is consumed; and as for hay, our prairies yearly produce crops which we are not required, on account of the geniality of our clime, to gather quite equal to the boasted production of Northern States.

And this enormous production of Louisiana still leaves one half of the area of our State uncultivated, undisturbed, unoccupied. The best of our lands have yet to be drained and developed. Others have not been brought into cultivation on account of their inaccessibility and the scarcity of labor. What are now cultivated, are, beyond all question, the most productive and valuable in the United States. [Delta.

CHRISTIANITY IN CEYLON.

According to a correspondent of the Univers, the population of Ceylon amounts at present to 1,680,000 natives, and nearly 9000 Europeans. Of these 144,000 are Roman Catholics, belonging to two Vicariates-Apostolic, and 46,000 Protestants, who receive their missionaries from five societies, namely, the Society of the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the Church Missionary Society, the Baptist Missionary Society, the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and the American Missionary Society. About 100,000 are Mohammedans, and the rest Hindoo or Buddhist. According to this statement the number of Roman Catholics must be decreasing, for in 1840 it was estimated at 150,000. Ceylon has recently gained a new importance by the immigration of Coolies. In the first eight months of 1858 nearly 84,000 of them arrived, and only 38,000 left. Those who returned to the continent of Asia take with them new ideas, more energy, and frequently the germs of the Christian faith.

An Omitted Article.—The venerable missionary Spaulding in a recent letter to this country, says: "In writing to friends many years ago, I mentioned the necessity of each and all denominations adding an article to their Confession of Faith, to this effect—we believe that the Church of Christ is to become universal, and that every professing Christian is bound by his covenant with God our Savior, to consecrate himself and property, and do all he can, to forward this object."

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ENDOWMENT OF CENTENARY COLLEGE.

CAYUGA, MISS., MARCH 10, 1859.

Mr. Editor—Permit me to say to the people of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences, through your paper, that Rev. Thomas Owens, who was a member of the first Conference held in Mississippi, proposes to be one of a hundred to give one thousand dollars each, for the purpose of endowing Centenary College, and dares them to come up to it. Can there be more not be found? We think they can. Look us, brethren, and have your hearts and purses open to give largely to this great and noble work! We have been engaged in the work ever since our appointment, and are encouraged. The people are giving nobly, and, by the blessing of God and the hearty co-operation of the people, we will be able to pay off the present pressing liabilities, and endow the college; and, when done, will leave a legacy to the rising generation, the blessings of which it will require more than time to tell. Come, brethren, we are able to do the work—let it be done—let's say; it must be done—let's do it at once.

Any one desiring to write me on this subject will address me at Cayuga, Hinds Co., Mississippi. We would be pleased to hear from you—especially to the tune of thousands.

V. H. JOHNSON,

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Eufaula District.—Rev. J. W. Laney, P. E., writes that the District is in a flourishing condition. Although the round had not been finished at the time of writing, several hundred persons had been found, in different sections, seeking the salvation of their souls. A gracious revival is looked for.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Attala Circuit.—Rev. L. Encanbrack writes: "The Quarterly meeting in Kosciusko, Feb. 12, was an interesting meeting. Two were converted and eight joined the Church. Many of the old members were much revived. Our new preaching Elder, Brother Wade, made a very favorable impression on this community. His pulpit labors were much appreciated. We would fain hope that this may be but the beginning of better times in this place, and on the Circuit generally."

Philadelphia Circuit.—Rev. K. A. Jones writes that the prospect for a revival is good. The Advocate and other religious periodicals are being widely circulated.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

New Iberia Circuit.—Rev. T. B. White writes: "Our Quarterly Meeting just passed in New Iberia—a pleasant and profitable meeting—took some steps towards erecting a new and more commodious house of worship. We have fine prospects for good, all around this large work. It may be emphatically here, "The harvest truly is great, and the laborers are few." Three men could not more than supply the fields that the Conference has assigned me. How my heart yearns with yearnings for the salvation of souls! "O! Then pray the Lord of the Harvest, send forth more laborers into the vineyard."

Fifty Subscribers.—Rev. T. J. Upton writes: "I think this makes me ten new subscribers. I do not intend to relax my efforts to obtain fifty. I consider the Advocate a great amount in the accomplishment of good on my work, and is but little trouble to find those who desire its weekly visits."

A Newspaper Wanted.—A correspondent from Washington, Mississippi, writes that a newspaper is much needed in that town, and that any one starting one there can make it profitable, as many of the adjoining counties has a paper, and there is much legal advertising to be done in each, all of which could be had by a paper established in Washington county, together with a sufficient number of subscribers.

The above we clip from an exchange, for the purpose of saying that the New Orleans Christian Advocate office has for sale all the type and other materials necessary for the establishment of such a paper, at a low price. Apply soon.

the author of "Bulls and Bears," now publishing in the Atlantic Monthly; Mr. Edmund Quincy, Professor Felton, Mr. Dwight, of the Journal of Music, with others equally agreeable or distinguished. Emerson read a strangely beautiful poem, suggested by the event celebrated. Dr. Holmes read another, and Mr. Lowell replied to these compliments in verse. Several charming birth-day gifts were presented to the poet Professor by his friends, among others a picture by Silliman. Mr. Lowell is contemplating a further instalment of his Bigelow Papers. He intends to carry Mr. Birdo Freedom Sawin to Kansas. Saxe has a poem in press with Ticknor & Fields, entitled "The Money King."

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE LARGE COTTON PLANTERS.—A few days since a paragraph was published, giving some account of the cotton crops of Col. Bond, of Georgia, which amounted last year to 2100 bales, and was the largest seot to market by any planter of that State. A Vidalia correspondent of the Natchez Free Trader contrasts the planters of Mississippi and Louisiana with the Georgia celebrity as follows: There are half a dozen planters in Concordia Parish and Louisiana, as also many more in Mississippi, that make a far higher mark than this. Not to make a thing invidious, the names of A. V. Lewis, Esq., of Concordia Parish, who makes all his cotton there, chalks up several hundred bales above the Georgia planter; so does L. R. Marshall, Esq., in the State of Louisiana, raising in that State alone more than three thousand five hundred bales; so is John North, Esq., of Hard Times, fill as much if not more; so did Frederick Stanton, Esq., but a few weeks deceased, raise twenty-eight hundred bales the present year—all in Concordia Parish—and even more than this figure in 1855—all in Louisiana; and there are numerous others that come up, or nearly so, to the Georgia highest notch. For instance, L. R. Marshall, residence Natchez, a planter three States, Louisiana, Mississippi and Arkansas, is more than a four thousand bale producer; so is Dr. Stephen Duncan more than a three thousand bale grower in the State of Mississippi, besides being an opulent planter of Louisiana—more than four thousand bales in all. The great estates of the two princely planters of Mississippi and Louisiana, the late Samuel Davis and Francis Surget, Esqs., always produced from three to five thousand bales each until their deaths divided the estates among the heirs.

COFFEE TRADE OF THE UNITED STATES.—The New York Shipping and Commercial List of the 19th inst., publishes its annual statement of the Coffee trade of the United States—exclusive of California and Oregon—for the year ending December 31, 1858. The tables show that the total receipts in the United States for the year ending December 31, 1858, were 1,631,229 packages, weighing 227,650,186 lbs., against receipts in 1857 of 1,505,038 packages, ar 217,871,831 lbs., while the consumption in 1858 was 251,255,090 lbs., against a consumption in 1857 of 172,505,934 lbs., being the very considerable increase of about 46 per cent. Not only have the whole receipts the past year been absorbed, but the stock has been reduced more than twenty-five million pounds. This unexampled consumption, the Shipping List remarks, is accounted for by the fact that, during the last quarter of 1857, the business in this, as well as most other articles, was very limited. The severe revulsion of that year having for a time annihilated credit, and occasioned a very great scarcity of money, stocks in distributing hands throughout the country became reduced to a very low ebb; consequently, the quantity withdrawn from the ports for the past year, though nominally showing the consumption of but twelve months, is in reality the consumption of at least fifteen months. The annexed statement shows the receipts and consumption for the past five years:

	Receipts.	Consumption
1858	lbs 227,650,186	251,255,090
1857	217,871,829	172,505,931
1856	230,913,150	218,225,420
1855	288,214,683	210,378,287
1854	182,473,853	173,481,053

The stocks at all the ports on the 1st of January, 1859, were as follows: New York, 97,502 packages; Boston, 53,335; New Orleans, 38,500; Philadelphia, 20,054; Baltimore, 4500; and other ports 9000—making a total of 193,991 packages, equal to 19,486,564 pounds, against a stock of 51,590,240 lbs. on the 1st of January, 1858.

THE LAST OF THE HOUSE OF TIMOUR.—The King of Delhi and his family have now finally disappeared from the scene. On the 3d of December they were carried on board the Magiera, which immediately steamed down the river, on her way to the Cape. The King is accompanied by two of his wives, his son, and his grandson, the only members of the race alive, except one or two still in arms. The old man seemed thoroughly content, stretched himself upon his pillows, and asked two of the officers their rank in the vessel. Two hundred years ago, the agents of the East India Company stood before the man's ancestor, then the absolute ruler of 100,000,000 of people, with folded hands, begging permission to exist at a single town upon the coast. As the natives say, it was the foolhold granted to a giant. The extinction of this house leaves but two Mussulman sovereignties of the first class in existence in the world. One of these is tottering, and if Mahomotanism, as a creed, is not declining—it certainly increases in India—its temporal power would appear to be rapidly passing away. [London Paper.

LOSSES OF TERRITORY BY SPAIN.—At one time the Spanish Empire occupied the eighth part of the known world comprising a space of 800,000,000 square miles, with a population of 70,000,000. Of this vast territory more than two-thirds have been lost. In 1506 Spain gave up the Isle of Malta to the order of St. John. In 1620 the Lower Navarre and Bearne were yielded to France, and in 1640 the Rousselon. In 1640 Spain lost Portugal and her colonies. In 1648 she recognized the sovereignty of the Netherlands. In 1020 the English wrested the Barbadoes from her, in 1655 Jamaica, in 1704 Gibraltar, in 1718 the Lucas, in 1759 Dominica, and in 1797 Trinidad. In the seventeenth century France took possession of Martinico, New Granada, Gandaloupe, and half of the isle of San Domingo, and in 1800 Louisiana. In the eighteenth century Spain yielded up Sardinia to the Duke of Savoy, and to Morocco her rights on Mazalquiver and Oran. She ceded Parma, Placencia and Luca, while other dominions in the North af Italy, to the princess of the house of Bourbon, and in 1750 Naples and Sicily were emancipated from Spanish government. In 1810 she sold Florida to the United States; in 1821 she lost half of the isle of San Domingo; and before 1825 all her vast possessions on the American continent were lost to her forever. Her only foreign possessions now are the isles of Cuba and Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and some small African colonies.

BOUNDARIES OF OREGON.—The error appears to be current that the boundaries of the New State of Oregon are co-incident with those of the former Territory. Even the Philadelphia Inquirer, noted for its accuracy, gives the limits as reaching from the Pacific to the Rocky Mountains, and from the 46th to the 42d parallel of north latitude; an area of 227,000 square miles, only a fraction less than that of Texas. The error is material. The act of admission defines the boundaries of the State to be the ocean on the west, the Columbia river to its intersection with the 46th parallel, and that parallel on the north; the Snake river to the confluence af the Owyhee, and a line due South from that point on the east, and the 42d parallel on the south. The area thus designated covers a trifle more than half of Oregon Territory; in square miles about 115,000; a surface far exceeding that af any of the older States, yet falling very much short of the extent either of California or of Texas. Kansas, if admitted, would bring with it an area greater by 21,000 square miles, than that of Oregon. [N. Y. Times.

THE POSTOFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.—An Increase of Postage.—The difference between the U. S. House and the Senate on the Postoffice bill could not be reconciled, and that important bill was lost. The House insisted that the increase of the rates of postage was a revenue measure, and could not, therefore, be originated in the Senate. The Conference Committee endeavored to compromise the difficulty by originating a new bill, but the strict constructionists of the Senate objected, under the rules, to the second reading of the bill and thus defeated it. The effect is to deprive the Postoffice Department of its appropriations but it is said that it will create but slight public inconvenience. All the General Appropriation bills were passed. The provision which the Senate had attached to several bills, increasing the rates of postage and abolishing the franking privilege, were rejected by the House.

MISSISSIPPI AND TENNESSEE RAILROAD.—This road, which, as the reader is aware commences at Memphis and runs to Grenada, where it intersects the Mississippi Central Railroad, appears to be in a prosperous condition. The Hernando Free Press says the friends of the enterprise may rejoice in the certainty that in less than two years this rond will be completed, and that we will be in direct communication with the Crescent City. We are informed that the President, Colonel F. M. White, has obtained all the means necessary to carry out the contract lately entered into with Messrs. Pope and Strong, who have undertaken to put the road through to its junction with the Mississippi Central Road at Grenada.

BRITISH ACQUISITION IN THE PACIFIC.—The Sydney Morning Herald, received by the last Australian mail, says that the British Government has purchased 200,000 acres of land from the Fejee Islanders for the sum of $15,000, to be paid to satisfy the American claims against the Fejee Government. In addition to this grant of 200,000 acres, there shall be grants of such other lands as may be needed for local Governmental purposes; such requirements to be agreed by a commission, to consist of two Fejean chiefs and two British gentlemen, presided over by the local representative of her Majesty, the latter official to act as umpire in all disputed questions.

APPROPRIATIONS IN MISSOURI.—The Legislature of Missouri have, it is said, made appropriations which, in the aggregate, exceed those of the previous year by $223,400. The public printer has been allowed $25,000. The contingent expenses of the General Assembly are increased by the same sum. $50,000 have been appropriated for repelling the banditti of the frontier. A general spirit of extravagant expenditure seems to prevail throughout the country.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

Great Britain.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 26.—Lord Cowley's special mission to Vienna was to conciliate the difficulties between France and Austria. ..... The new Atlantic Telegraph Company have held several meetings for making arrangements to carry out their enterprise. ..... The English Government have offered a subsidy to the Galway line of steamships for mail service of three thousand pounds for each voyage across the Atlantic. ..... Lord Lyons, the newly appointed Minister of Great Britain to the United States, sailed for Washington via New York on the 22d inst.

France and Austria.

It is reported that orders have been given to the military commanders to prepare for a campaign and that these orders were given by the Emperor immediately after his return from Compeigne. ..... A war circular has been issued from the war office, directing the troops to be trained to force marches and night blynues. ..... All the military surgeons have been ordered to join their respective corps. ..... Immense quantities of lint have been sent to Lyons. ..... The prime minister of Austria, Count Buol, still believes in peace, but the Emperor of Austria, thinking differently, is preparing for a vigorous defence of the Italian States which are under the rule of Austria. ..... The Second Chamber of Deputies of Hanover have passed a resolution that the Government will assist in repelling any attacts upon Austria or Germany. ..... It is reported that the Emperor Napoleon is about to visit the King of Sardinia, to confer in relation to the State of Italy. ..... Three new forts have been ordered to be constructed at Venice within the space of six weeks, and 5000 workmen were to be employed upon the works. ..... A reinforcement of troops had been sent to the Danube by Turkey.

A French Visit at Night.—In the House of Committee Sir Charles Napier said that a few nights previous a French ship of war had anchored off Spithead, and sailed again before day-light. He asked whether the Admiralty knew of the fact, and whether the visit was made for the purpose of taking soundings, or otherwise. ..... Sir S. Packington said the fact was known to the Admiralty, but the object of the visit had not been ascertained. He thought it no unusual occurrence.

From Washington.—Postmaster-General Brown is dead. Joseph Holt, Commissioner of patents is appointed in his place. G. W. Jones of Iowa is appointed Minister to Bogota. ..... Robert McLane is appointed Minister to Mexico.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN, March 8.—The Aeronaut Thurston Found.—A dispatch received here from Adrian announces that the remains of Ira J. Thurston, the celebrated Aeronaut, whose disappearance last fall, with his partially inflated balloon created so much interest, have been found. His remains were found about ten miles West of Toledo, and recognized, although nearly six months have elapsed since his disappearance. ..... It will be remembered that Mr. Thurston made a successful balloon ascension on the 16th of September last, and that on his alighting, after he had disconnected the lower portion of the balloon, and had allowed part of the gas to escape, he playfully seated himself upon the valve of the balloon, intending only to go up a short distance and descend. The disconnected balloon, however, becoming unmanagable, he was soon carried out of sight, and the above is the first intelligence of his fate.

WASHINGTON, March 10.—The Mississippi Bar Resolution.—The joint resolution which passed Congress provides for the appropriation of $35,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for removing the obstructions at the mouth of the Mississippi. ..... The President did not sign the resolution, and informed a Louisianian that he withheld his signature because of the constitutional objections, and on account of the discretionary powers therein conferred. ..... Senator Seward's resolution, which was adopted, requests the Secretary of War to furnish Congress with copies of contracts, and give information as to what measures had been taken for the rescue of property now in jeopardy owing to the obstructions. The War Department is now closed, and further inquiry on the subject has been postponed for the present.

Funeral of the Late Postmaster-General.—The funeral of the late Postmaster-General Brown took place to-day, and was attended by a very large concourse, including the President, the Cabinet, the Senators and members of the House of Representatives, foreign Ministers, many private citizens of Washington, and strangers from other cities.

Tehuantepec Route and Railroad.—Soon to have a Railroad—New Steamship—California News—Sandwich Islands—Russian Movements—Mexican War.

The News.—Recent letters from the Isthmus, by the Quaker City, informs us that stages will soon run through, over the whole route. The road is very fine, with the exception of a mile or two at the Sochil end. Four different parties are engaged in surveying the railroad route, preparing to break ground shortly, when they propose to have a grand time. San Francisco is not very far from as now, and will soon be brought within shorter time of New Orleans. The news from this route from California, Oregon, the Sandwich Islands, British Columbia, Austrin, and Mexico, will be a feature in the New Orleans Christian Advocate of increasing interest and value. G. C. Garrison's steamship the Orizaba, has commenced competition with the Panama line, which will reduce freights, and increase emigration. Walker's seizure of the Transit property broke down the competition. The former enemy of Vanderbilt, Garrison, is now said to represent him. The heretofore unsettled state of the Transit route has been the chief difficulty in increasing steamship facilities. ..... The weather in California has been fine for farmers and miners. Spring has come—the grass is ankle high. Wheat and barley flourishing, and a great grain crop is expected. The gold yield promises to be more abundant than ever. The Frazer river gold mines are not promising. The Southern overland mail route is a success. The Northern one has just caved in, on account of cold and snow. California is strong for Cuba and the Pacific railroad. Senator Gwin will be proposed as a candidate for the Presidency. ..... What to do with the Chinese is becoming a serious question. Trouble is likely to result from it. They are numerous, and are in the way of American miners. It is sought to prohibit their immigration to the State. Poor Chinese. ..... From the Sandwhich Islands the news is to the 15th of January. The royal family bid fair to increase, and peace and plenty prevailed. The country plantations were slowly recovering from the effects of the disastrous floods of last fall. ..... By the last arrival from the Sondwich Islands was received some curious intelligence, by an American exhaler, which was to the effect that the Russian Government had given strict orders to its cruisers in the Sea of Okhotsk to prevent all foreign vessels from whaling there—and as the American vessels were the most numerous, to especially exclude them. ..... From Australin we learn that new gold discoveries had been made at a place called Windsor. Heavy rains had fallen and trade was dull. ..... Mirmoon, the Zuloaga leader, was approaching Vera Cruz, the stronghold of the Juarez, or Liberal party, who is exerting himself in preparation for defence. A decisive conflict will probably take place. ..... Recently, in Skirmish, Mirmoon's forces were worsted.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, March 12, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current of Saturday the 12th inst. The past week has been a period of a good deal of activity in our leading staple, Cotton, both demand and prices having been favorably influenced by the European advices received within the week. Tobacco also has moved off more freely, but Sugar and Molasses have been in only moderate request, and prices of the former have given way. In the various articles of Western Produce the operations are only to a moderate extent, being confined mostly to the requirements for home consumption.

COTTON.—In our semi-weekly report we had occasion to notice a good degree of activity in our Cotton market, the sales of the first three days of the week amounting up 33,500 bales, and the favorable advices by the Europa, which were before the public on Tuesday morning, had enabled factors to obtain slightly improved prices for the middling grades. On Wednesday there was again a good attendance of buyers, and further sales were effected to the extent of about 12,000 bales. On Thursday the Arabia's advices, one week later, were received early in the day, and being interpreted favorably an active demand prevailed, resulting in fully 25,000 bales, generally at full prices, and closing with an upward tendency. These large transactions left the market with a greatly reduced supply of desirable lists on sale yesterday, and this fact, together with a still further advance in the rates claimed, caused the lushess to fall off to about 13,000 bales; making a total for the past three days of 50,000 bales; and for the whole of the week, 83,500 bales; the receipts, during same period, 35,050; and the exports 54,351 bales. Stock, in Presses and on ship-board, not cleared on 11th inst. 489,379 bales. With respect to prices, the tendency has been in favor of sellers for a day or two past, and the advance within the week is fully ½c. per pound in most qualities, many parties holding at rates above our figures.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN BOOKS.

Whenever we see a good thing we like to circulate it, to-wit:—

"Mind your Own Business, is an old injection which cannot be too scrupulously observed. Especially would we urge it upon our Church to regard to our publishing interests. The time was when we had to depend upon others for our religious literature, not having a book or paper in the land that we could call our own. But our circumstances have changed; we now have an ample supply of weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies, the largest list of general religious reading books and Sunday-school books printed in this (Southern) country; many of which have reached to an almost unparalelled circulation. Besides we have multiplied greatly in our numbers and wealth. Only let us purchase, read and circulate the issues of our own press first, and as largely as they deserve, and we shall extend our achievements beyond the highest expectations of the most believing ones among us. Scarcely a day passes which does not reveal some new success of our press. Let us be of good cheer then, and push on in our "great work;" rejoicing always and heartily in the great good being done by others, but attending faithfully to the peculiar work which God in his wise providence has assigned to us."

Of the SECOND PART, we have only the following Books, which we sell at the prices annexed, less 20 per cent. on time, and 20 per cent for cash.

Of these Books we have not time now to speak particularly. But see it at present to mention "Bledsoe's Theodicy" at $1 50, and in Turkey at $2—the greatest thunderbolt forged against Calvinism in three centuries. It has proved itself exceedingly troublesome to all of that faith; in fact, as "horrible" to them as the Decree was to Calvin.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

Edward Everett a Schoolboy Orator.

Edward Everett looms so large in the eye of the public at the present time, that everything about him is read with interest. He was born in Dorchester, Massachusetts, on the 11th of April, 1794, and baptized on the 13th, by the Rev. Thomas Mayo Harris, the pastor of the family, a man of uncommon culture, and highly esteemed for his personal and great excellence. The following verses were written by Mr. Harris, to be spoken at an exhibition by his little friend Edward, who was already distinguished by his remarkable precocity. The expression, "little roan," applies to the color of Edward Everett's hair.

Pray how should I, a little lad,
In speaking make a figure?
You're only joking, I'm afraid—
Do wait till I am bigger.

But, since you wish to hear my part,
And urge me to begin it,
I'll strive for praise with all my heart,
Though small the hope to win it.

I'll tell a tale; how farmer John
A little roan colt bred, sir,
And every night and every morn,
He watered and he fed, sir.

Said neighbor Joe to farmer John,
"Ain't you a silly dolt, sir,
To spend such time and care upon
A little, useless colt, sir?"

Said farmer John to neighbor Joe,
"I bring my little roan up,
Not for the good he now can do,
But will do, when he's grown up."

The sword you can well enjoy,
To keep sleek coats from spotting,
The little colt, you think, is I—
I know it by your smirking.

And now, my friends, please to excuse
My limping and my stammers;
I, for this once, have done my best,
And so I'll make my manners.

"Father, I Feel so Happy!"

The writer has but one child, and he has gone to be with the Lord. Of his many sweet sayings, which will ever live in memory, coming home to the heart with that tender and sacred influence which can be borrowed only from the spiritual, one of the sweetest is that which we have quoted above.

Such was the state of this little boy's health, during the latter part of his brief and happy life, that many of his Sabbath's were spent with his mother at home. On those days, a double portion of the Spirit's influences seemed to be imparted to him. They descended gently upon him like the dew of heaven; and from the opened windows of heaven they seemed to penetrate and pervade every corner of his soul. They irradiated his countenance; they transfused his spirit; they filled him with a holy joy in the things of Christ, in listening to "that sweet story of old," and in singing, with subdued voice, the hymns he loved. "Let the little ones come unto me." [illegible] Sabbaths, which afforded so delightful a foretaste of the eternal rest into which he was about to enter, would [illegible] anxiously on those perplexing days when, sooner or later, agitate almost every family, to the freedom of man and the sovereignty of God, especially to the possible influence of [illegible] "of one mind," and whom the entire interval of divine service [illegible] to remove his difficulties, and to present [illegible] in such a light as would, at least, reconcile [illegible] the mystery in which those questions [illegible] Gradually, the light seemed to [illegible] the clouds lifted and rolled back; [illegible] what he could not fully comprehend; [illegible] pervaded his believing and loving [illegible] compelled to interrupt this hallowed intercourse [illegible] to speak, to more than one, [illegible] which belong to their everlasting peace, we were [illegible] when, looking up with a composure and [illegible] which will never be effaced from our memories, [illegible] with an earnestness and sweetness of voice [illegible] all upon our ears like the words of "heavenly [illegible] Father, I feel so happy!"

[illegible] that this dear boy, then, for the first time, [illegible] the quickening power of the Holy Spirit; but we [illegible] to them drank deeper at the fountain of living [illegible] From that time, he evidently dwelt in [illegible] that time, the Gospels, he had long [illegible] delight, became his "vital breath;" and songs [illegible] from infancy, were breathed [illegible] melody and rapture.

[illegible] forth, the language of his life. [illegible] to have been premonitory of his approaching [illegible] and can understand why he was moved to utter them [illegible] especially, better than ever before, the power of [illegible] may be traced in the briefest saying of a [illegible] object of the heart's affection. We daily bless God for [illegible] brief utterance of a triumphing faith. We praise him for [illegible] that it continues to waft to us from the celestial [illegible] especially, for the assurance it affords, that, however great the happiness of our darling boy then was, it was not [illegible] to be compared with the joy which he now knows—joy [illegible] as it hath not entered into the heart of man to conceive.

Humorous.

A Relic of Barbarism.

An act was passed into the English Parliament in 1770, that all women, of whatever age, rank, profession or degree, whether virgins, maids or widows, that shall from and after such act impose upon, seduce and betray into matrimony, any of his majesty's subjects, by the scents, paints, cosmetic washes, artificial teeth, false hair, Spanish wool, iron stays, and high-heeled shoes, or bolstered hips, shall incur the penalty in force against witchcraft and like misdemeanors, and that the marriage, upon conviction, shall stand null and void.

Belonging to Another Parish.

At a missionary sermon in a country village, all the congregation stood [illegible], with the exception of one rustic, who, when he was asked why he continued unelected, replied: "I don't belong to this parish."

A Shower of Gold.

A fine looking gentleman marched up Broadway, in New York, recently, lavishly scattering gold dollars along the street as he proceeded. It is hardly necessary to say that a large crowd followed him. An officer remonstrated, and received a shower of gold in his face. Unlike Danae, the officer refused to accept this token of affection from the Broadway Jupiter, and put an end to the liberal gentleman's exploits by hand and collar, calling him, placing him on a cart and carrying him to the station.

Cheering in a dying Man.

A bright thought, that of Smithson, the founder of the Smithsonian Institution, when he was dying of an unknown disease. Smithson had had five doctors, and they had been unable to tell what his disease was. At length they told him that he must die. Calling them all around him he said: "My friends and the Ile, make a post mortem examination, and find out what ails me; for really I have heard such long and learned discussions on the subject, that I am dying to know what the disease is myself."

The "Times" Vienna correspondent says—We have received [illegible] of Lord Palmerston [illegible] The [illegible] costume de rigueur is a [illegible] coat, waistcoat and breeches, with high boots. Lord Palmerston formed [illegible] one of the Imperial parties de chasse equipped in his Hanoverian "pink," well known in every [illegible] and spinney for many a mile about Broadlands. The day [illegible] and threatening heavy rain. The Emperor urged [illegible] on a swinging [illegible]. "Oh, no, your Majesty," was Lord Palmerston's pithy and pointed reply, "you know [illegible] ever gets through our red-coats." This to the "Nephew of my Uncle," with Waterloo "undigested," I think was telling and spirited. [London Correspondent.

An Awkward Fix.

The Hollidaysburgh (Pa.) Information, of the 10th inst., says, that a German, named Cash, while out hunting in Clearfield county, came across a bear-trap, and having never seen one before, stopped for the purpose of examining it, but unfortunately put his foot on the trigger and was shut up. In this predicament he remained for three days, nearly dead from hunger and cold, when the bear came to examine it, and Cash, seizing hold of a bear, he had caught a man.

Poem Translated into George Sand.

Prince Metternich, in speaking of the charitable sale held [illegible] year at the Hotel Lambert by the Princess Czartoriska in favor of the distressed Poles, relates an anecdote, which it seems Madame George Sand held a stall, on the occasion, and displayed a quantity of small articles in linen and embroidered muslin. Baron James de Rothschild happening to pass, the fair saleswoman addressed him with the usual request to purchase something. "What can I buy?" said the Baron, "you have nothing that I can do anything with.... But stay, an idea strikes me. Give me your autograph; sell me that." Madame Sand took a sheet of paper and wrote the following words: "Received from Baron James de Rothschild the sum of one thousand francs for the benefit of the distressed Poles, George Sand." M. de Rothschild read it, thanked her, and, presenting a note for the sum mentioned, passed on with the autograph, highly gratified. The clever marchande had reason to be so likewise.

Use of the Express.

There is no telling to what uses the Express will be put after a while. Who would have thought of forwarding children through that particular species of agency? And yet we perceive that a bright boy of nine years was delivered in Lancaboro', Mass., a few days since, for the purpose of attending school, having been forwarded by Adams' Express from Hopkinton, Texas. The "freight" had been four weeks on the road.

A Legless Lord.

The following story, which we have from a New York friend recently from Paris, is none the worse for being true: Lord Cowley, the British Minister in Paris, has occasional annoyances. Lord Miltoun (a gentleman whom nature failed to provide with legs) wished to be presented at Court with his wife and daughter. The morning of the day on which the presentation was to take place, the Emperor sent word to Lord Cowley that he could not receive Lord Miltoun, as he heard he had no legs, and that he must sit while the Emperor stood. Lord Cowley was much vexed, but sent an attache to convey the disagreeable news to Lord Miltoun. Meanwhile the Duke de Bassano came himself to Lord Cowley to tell him that Lord Miltoun's chair had arrived at the Tuileries; that it must be instantly taken away, and that its legless owner could not be received. This was rather mortifying to the British Minister, but the Emperor was inflexible.

Astronomical.

A little girl, showing her little cousin (a boy about four years of age) a star, said: "That star you see up there is bigger than this world." Says he: "No it ain't." "Yes it is." "Then why don't it keep the rain off?" said he.

Grumbling.

The hardest situation for a grumbler to be in, is to feel like grumbling, and having nothing to grumble at.

Piccolomoni.

Replied to a serenade at Troy: "Shentlemen—I em veer mooch obligee for dis complemenz. I am veer poore speak Anglish, unt I feele chleepy."

DIED POOR.

"It was a sad funeral to me," said the speaker, "the saddest I have attended for years."

"That of Edmondson?"

"Yes."

"How did he die?"

"Poor, poor as poverty—his life was one long struggle with the world, and at every disadvantage. Fortune mocked him all the while with gilded promises that were destined never to know fulfillment."

"Yet he was patient and enduring," remarked one of the company.

"Patient as a Christian—enduring as a martyr," was the answer. "Poor man! He was worthy of a better fate. He ought to have succeeded, for he deserved success."

"Did he not succeed?" questioned the one who had spoken of his perseverance and endurance.

"No, sir; he died poor, as I have just said. Nothing that he put his hand to ever succeeded. A strange fatality seemed to attend every enterprise."

"I was with him in his last moments," said the other, "and thought he died rich."

"No; he has left nothing behind," was replied. "The heirs will have no concern as to the administration of the estate."

"He left a good name," said one, "and that is something."

"And a legacy of noble deeds that were done in the name of humanity," remarked another.

"And precious examples," said another.

"Lessons of patience in suffering; of hope in adversity; of heavenly confidence when no sunbeams fell upon his bewildering path," was the testimony of another.

"And high trust, manly courage, heroic fortitude."

"Then he died rich!" was the emphatic declaration, "richer than the millionaire who went to his long home the same day, a miserable pauper in all but gold. A sad funeral did you say? No, my friend, it was rather a triumphal procession! Not the burial of a human clod, but the ceremonial attendant on the translation of an angel. Did not succeed! While his whole life was a series of successes. In every conflict he came off the victor, and now the victor's crown is on his brow. Any grasping, soulless, selfish man, with a share of brains, may gather in money, and learn the art of keeping it; but not one in a hundred can bravely conquer in the battle of life as Edmondstone has conquered, and step forth from the ranks of men a Christian hero. No, no; he did not die poor, but rich—rich in celestial affections. And his heirs have an interest in the administration of the estate. A large property has been left, and let them see to it that they do not lose the precious things through false estimates and ignorant depreciations."

"You have a new way of estimating the wealth of a man," said the one who had first expressed sympathy for the deceased.

"It is not the right way? There are higher things to gain in this world than wealth that perishes—riches of the priceless value that ever reward the rich merchant who trades for wisdom, buying it with the silver of truth and the gold of love. He dies rich who can take his treasure with him to the new land where he is to abide forever; and he who has to leave all behind on which he has placed affection, dies poor indeed. Our friend died richer than a Girard or an Astor; his monument is built of good deeds and noble examples. It will abide forever."

T. S. ARTHUR.

LIVING FOR ADMIRATION.

Rev. Dr. Alexander, in his recent volume of Sermons, utters the following solemn warning to Daughters: What a horrid fraud Satan is practicing on the Church, in regard to the daughters of Christian parents! In fashionable circles—dare I name them Christian—the years where girlhood merges into maturity are frequently sold to the adversary. The young American woman is taught to deem herself a goddess. If there be wealth, if there be accomplishments, if there be beauty, almost a miracle seems necessary to prevent the loss of the soul. Behold her pass from the pedestal to the altar. The charming victim is decked for sacrifice. Every breath that comes to her is incense. Her very studies are to fit her for admiration. Day and night, the gay but wretched maiden is taught to think of self and self-lish pleasures. Till some Lenten fashion of solemnity interrupt the whirl, the season is too short for the engagements. Grave parents shake their heads at magnificent apparel, costly gems, night turned into day, dances, at which Romans would have blushed, pale cheeks, bending frames, threatened decay; and yet they allow and submit. And thus, that sex which ought to show the sweet, unfinished innocency of a holy youth, is carried to the overheated temples of pleasure. Thus, the so-called Christian verifies the Apostle's maxim: "She that liveth in pleasure, is dead while she liveth."

WEARING FLANNEL.

The very best thing that can be worn next to the skin, in summer as well as winter, is common woolen flannel. One color has no advantage over another, except that white is more agreeable to the sight; it is more likely to "foll up" in washing, but this may be almost entirely prevented, if done properly. Pour boiling hot strong soapsuds on the garment in a tub, let it alone until the hand can bear the water, then pour off and add clean water, boiling hot, let this stand also as before; pour off, and add more boiling clean water, and when cool enough, merely squeeze the garment with the hands—no wringing or rubbing. Stretch it immediately on a line in the hot sun, or before a hot fire, and as the water settles at the most dependant part of the garment, press it out with the hand, and be careful to stretch the fabric as soon as the water is squeezed out, aiming as much as possible to keep the flannel hot until it is dry. If woolen garments are treated literally as above, they will remain pliable and soft until worn out.

Recent scientific experiments, carefully conducted, prove the truth of the popular sentiment, that woolen flannel is the best fabric to be worn next to the skin; as it absorbs more moisture from the body than any other material, and by so doing, keeps the body more perfectly dry. Cotton absorbs the least, hence the perspiration remains more on the skin, and being damp, the heat of the body is rapidly carried off by evaporation and suddenly cools when exercise ceases, the ill effects of which no intelligent mind need to be reminded of. Hence it is, that the common observation of all nations leads them to give their sailors woolen flannel shirts for all seasons and for all latitudes, as the best equalizers of the heat of the body. [Hall's Journal of Health.

MATRIMONY VS. INFIDELITY.

"If Hume, and Gibbon, and Rousseau, and Bentham," said Rev. Dr. Wm. Adams, in a recent sermon, "unmarried as they all were—had been each the father of a family—if they had ever gone in person to summon the family physician in some exigency of intense anxiety, we should never have heard of those frosty and infidel philosophies from their pens; by which so many hearts have been chilled and cursed. As you entered the family chamber and bent over the couch hallowed by the great mystery of birth, and the tears of high-wrought sensibility could not be refrained as you caught the breath of your first born—you discover all at once that a new well had begun to spring up in your soul, deep and living beyond the reach of death."

DIDN'T THE SAVIOR GET IN.

One Sabbath morning a little boy, four years old, came near his father, who was reading a sermon on the text, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock"—Rev., iii: 20. The little fellow's notice was attracted by what he heard, and he listened with fixed attention. The sermon was hardly good enough to be fully comprehended by the child; for such excellence in preaching is as rare as it is desirable. He caught enough, however, to know that the Savior earnestly desired to enter the heart. At the close, he immediately asked, "Pa, didn't the Savior get in?"

A SOUTHERN SIGHT.

Last Sabbath afternoon we went to the basement room of the Presbyterian Church, where we found about twenty ladies and gentlemen engaged in teaching about two hundred and fifty negroes (mostly youth and children) the catechism, reading and, expounding the Bible and learning them the sacred songs. As we looked upon the interesting spectacle we wondered if Greeley, Giddings or Garrison had ever condescended to meet with the Africans they profess to love so much, and point them to the "Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world?" [Athens (Ga.) Banner.

DRINKING AMONG YOUNG MEN.

The Philadelphia Sun says truly that indiscriminate drinking among our young men must eventually make its mark upon the population of our cities. We can see it already betraying itself in the rising generation. It is impossible for any man to drink even pure liquors six or seven times a day without suffering severely in constitution. And when he transmits this impaired constitution to his son, who in turn imparts it still further by the same course, it requires little foresight to see that we are preparing a population for our cities that will not in physical frame be much better than the wretched Aztecs.

Garden, Farm, and Plantation.

The Beautiful in Horticulture and Floriculture.

It has been shown by our best writers, that the families where the beautiful things of the garden and lawn are substantially parts of home, are as a whole, most contented and happy, and best deserve to be so; and that the individuals of such families are apt to carry into separate life, all the lessons taught them at home. The influences of the beautiful in horticulture are all good, and the pleasures which come with its practice, leave no sense of satiety behind—no feeling of regret for the morrow.

Do you not admire that simple little cottage, with its graceful trees from our native woods; the Wild Jasmine and Bignonia, making beautiful, while they conceal the rough outbuildings—the little "front yard," or more fitting lawn, gemmed with shrubbery and sparkling with flowers, with neat walks bordered with velvety turf, or natural ones over it—all in keeping, and all suited to the means of the tasteful owner? The question naturally arises, how much time and money has all this cost? Perhaps less than a tithe of what his rich neighbor had expended to rear that great pile of hoards and shingles, or that more ambitious mountain of bricks and mortar, with a countenance as black as an overgrown idiot's and as bare of beauty as a lumber-yard or a brick-kiln—with scarcely a thing (except weeds in the ground or paint on the walls) either greener or brighter than the man who can deem this huge abortion, the ne plus ultra of architectural taste.

In England and the Northern, as also in most of the Southern States, the sine qua non of a gentleman of taste is to have a conservatory attached to his house, whence it may be entered by the members of this family, and its beauties enjoyed. Such expenditure evidences an appreciation of those delights which the study of Floriculture places within the reach of all, even a season of the year when the beauties of the parterre disappear, and the value of such a source of enjoyment is necessarily exhausted by the partial disappearance of vegetation, even during our comparatively tropical winter. Surely then no house, pretending to be the abode of the wealthy, educated and the refined, should be without such an appendage.

"Education begins in the cradle and ends in the coffin," and things set on the mind with more force than words. Place, therefore, before young, and within their reach, pure and rational enjoyments. Pleasure is as necessary as pain is inevitable. Then let us find our pleasures in that which elevates, and thereby escape that which debases. All love, or can learn to love, beautiful flowers and beautiful trees, etc.

And what, among objects of transitory character, at least, can so enliven the domestic hearth, as a beautiful collection of flowers, making bright Summer within while rude Winter reigns without.

Population and Agriculture of Texas.

The Intelligencer learns from the census at the State Department, that we have in Texas, a total population of 458,020, of whom 138,265 are slaves, 290 free negroes, and the residue white; of these 67,350 are voters. We have been accustomed to say for the last year, says the Intelligencer, that Texas has 500,000 population, and this record does not change our opinion; for if the census takers did not omit 41,335 souls, it is very certain that more than that number have come in since the rolls were closed.

By the United States census of 1850, Texas had a total population of 212,592. This population has been more than doubled in eight years. The same ratio of increase for 24 years, would give us, 4,000,000 of inhabitants, which exceeds the present population of the State of New York.

The census also states that the total number of acres in cultivation is, 1,948,225; of which 927,347 are in corn; 208,097 in wheat; 681,908 in cotton; 15,965 in sugar, and 164,897 in miscellaneous. [Galveston News.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

JOHN BRYANT NUNN, son of Samuel and Jane Nunn, was born in Harris county, Georgia, 19th January, 1832, and died in Auburn, Alabama, 6th November, 1858. His parents were members of the Methodist Church, and took especial pains to rear him religiously. He dated his earliest religious impressions from the age of three years. He was noted from his childhood for his docility, his kindly spirit, and his remarkable conscientiousness. The sprightliness of his mind was early developed; he was noted for his rapid mental improvement. When about thirteen he was converted, and joined the Methodist Church; and, during his life, was an earnest and devoted follower of Christ. In 1848 he was prostrated by an attack of typhoid fever, after which his health underwent a gradual but steady decline until 1854, when he took his bed, never to leave it in health. In the Spring of 1857, he passed much time in the neighborhood of Talladega Springs. While there, and indeed throughout his entire travels, he received affecting marks of sympathy and attention. So deeply graven upon his grateful memory were these acts of kindness, that he never spoke of them without the liveliest emotion; and his bereaved parents would convey through this channel, to these unknown friends, the sincerest thanks of their hearts. God will reward them in a better way. During his last illness, he exhorted all to a life of consecration to God. After he grew speechless he retained his consciousness, and evidently united in spirit in the prayers of Christian friends about his bed. After one of these seasons of devotion, he gasped out the word, "part." His mother, catching his meaning, sang that affecting chorus—"Oh, that shall be joyful! to meet, to part no more." With an almost imperceptible sinking, his life ebbed calmly away until he sweetly slept in Jesus. During the whole of his long sickness he exhibited the Christian graces, in a maturity of experience which surprised all who conversed with him. His sufferings were indescribable, yet his soul serenely trusted in his Savior. His soul was often in a flame of divine ecstacy—and his longings after heaven, were irrepressible. He spoke of death with unaffected familiarity, and saw its approach without the slightest apprehension. He left behind him such a testimony that his name will ever remain, with all who knew and loved him, "as ointment poured forth."

MISS BETTIE A., daughter of Bro. AMBROSE M. CHAPMAN, of Mansfield, De Soto Parish, La., died in Macon, Ga., in her 16th year. Sweetly blending "the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit," with beauty, intelligence and dignity, she was indeed lovely and beloved. Though piously disposed from early childhood, and strictly observing the external forms of religion, yet she was not converted until a few months previous to her death. Her evidence of pardon was bright and happy. Death came with sudden summons; but she was well prepared to receive it; for, during her brief illness, she seemed perfectly resigned and assured. Just before breathing her last, she joined, with those around her dying bed, in songs of holy triumph, and exclaimed in the fullest assurance of faith: "The Lord is my shepherd; yes, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me."

C. R. J.

MRS. EMELINE McKENZIE died near Midway, in Monroe County, Ala., on the 25th January last, in the 39th year of her age. She embraced religion and joined the M. E. Church in early life. An affectionate daughter and wife, a kind mistress, she died a peaceful death. She said to her friends she dreaded nothing beyond death. But the passage through gave evidences of her resignation and preparation for death, and has left behind, for the comfort of her friends, that for her "to die was gain."

THE OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vasey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing of the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, but ought to go home to those in who's hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE, Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As my testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible one on my children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of physician. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and one half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the risen three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

ARMINIANISM AND CALVINISM.

Of Effectual Calling.

Calvinism teaches that, "All those whom God hath predestinated unto life, and those only, he is pleased, His appointed and accepted time, effectually to call by his Word and Spirit, out of that state of sin and death in which they are by nature, to grace and salvation by Jesus Christ;" "enlightening their minds, spiritually and savingly, to understand the things of God; taking away their heart of stone, and giving them a heart of flesh: renewing their wills, and, by his almighty power, determining them to that which is good; and effectually drawing them to Jesus Christ—yet so as that they come most freely, being made willing by His grace."

Calvinism further teaches, that "This effectual call is of God's free and special grace alone."—Not from anything at all foreseen in man, who is altogether passive therein, until being quickened and renewed by the Holy Spirit, he is hereby enabled to answer this call, and to embrace the grace offered and conveyed in it.

Calvinism also teaches, that "elect infants," dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ, through his Spirit, who worketh when and where and how He pleaseth. So, also, are all other elect persons who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the Word."

Calvinism further teaches, upon the subject of Calling, that "others, not elected, although they may be called by the ministry of the Word, and may have some common operations of the Spirit, yet never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved; much less can men not professing the Christian Religion be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent to form their lives according to the light of nature and the law of that religion they possess; and, to assert and maintain that they may, is very pernicious and to be detested."

Confession of Faith, pages 65–70

Calvin, Book 3, chap. 21, teaches to the same effect. He says: "In conformity, therefore, to the clear doctrine of the Scripture, we assert that by an eternal and immutable counsel God hath, once for all, determined both whom he would admit to salvation and whom he would condemn to destruction. We affirm that this counsel, as far as concerns the elect, is founded on his gratuitous mercy, totally irrespective of human merit; but that to those whom He devotes to condemnation, the gate of life is closed by a just and irreprehensible, but incomprehensible judgment. In the elect, we consider calling as evidence of election, and justification as another token of its manifestation, till they arrive in glory, which constitutes its completion. As God seals his elect by vocation (or calling) and justification, so, by excluding the reprobate from the knowledge of His name and sanctification of His Spirit, He affords another indication of the judgment that awaits them."

Arminianism, (and we believe the Bible also) teaches, that Jesus Christ by his sufferings and death made an atonement for the sins of all mankind in general, and of every individual in particular; that, however, none but those who believe in him can be partakers of the divine benefits.

That the divine energy, or grace of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift of God through Jesus Christ, begins and perfects every thing that can be called good in man; and, consequently, all good works are to be attributed to God alone—that is the glory of them, as moving us to their performance, not as the actual doer of them; that this grace of the Holy Spirit, which is offered to us all, does not force men to act, but may be "resisted" and rendered ineffectual by perverse and obstinate impenitence.

These views in relation to the atonement—and that gracious concomitant of it, the enlightening, awakening and sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit—as expressed by Calvinists and Arminians, differ most widely. Calvinists holding in substance that the elect have a call, which they denominate "effectual"—but, in the sense in which they use it, it means nothing less than irresistible. The Arminians holding that men may "quench," "vex" and "resist" the Holy Ghost, and that they often do, and perish.

The Calvinists hold that non-elect persons may have some common calls, (we wonder what for?) but such men never truly come to Christ; if non-elect, they cannot. The Arminians hold, that divine grace enough to save every accountable man is given; and that if any perish, it will be not because they were not elected, and did not have grace sufficient for salvation, but because they reject Christ, resist the Holy Spirit and persevere in sin.

VERITAS.

"GOD IS LOVE."

All nature proclaims the existence of God—His wisdom, power and goodness. Yet, though,

> "In reason's ear they all rejoice,
> And utter forth a glorious voice—
> Forever singing as they shine,
> The hand that made us is divine,"

it is not till revelation comes to interpret that voice—that man can understand it. Then indeed, when revelation speaks, "The Heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy work. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge."

No other language equals the sublimity of that in which the nature and attributes of Deity are presented by the sacred writers. Moses says, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. * * * And God said, let there be light, and there was light." David says, "He spake and it was done; He commanded and it stood fast. From everlasting to everlasting thou art God. If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me." Isaiah says, "Behold the nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are as the small dust of the balance. Behold, he taketh up the isles as a very little thing. And Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt offering. All nations before him are as nothing; and they are counted to him less than nothing, and vanity."

Sublime as these quotations confessedly are, yet I do not conceive that any among them all equals this of the beloved disciple—God is love. As a sentence, it stands by itself in unapproached and unapproachable grandeur. The most sublime and comprehensive sentence ever expressed by man or angel. It is a thought, which all revelation and all nature combined, but develope and illustrate. God is infinitely wise and powerful, and present, and eternal and good, and merciful, and holy, and just. But a combination of all these attributes, is love. Let us illustrate this idea by a property of light. A ray of light falling upon a prism is refracted into the seven elementary colors, red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo and violet. Let these rays be re-assembled into a single point; and that point will be white light, alone. Thus, as the Deity shines to us through the medium of his word and of his works, his various attributes are manifested to our perception. In His works, the limits of which the mind, aided by the sight of worlds lying beyond worlds in the vast infinity of space, labors in vain in its wildest flight to conceive of, we behold His omnipresence. In those thousands of mighty orbs that move at His command in their allotted circuits; that at His command sprung from chaos into form and beauty, we see His power. In the tender regard for the happiness of all his creatures, as exhibited in all His works, we behold His goodness. His wisdom is proclaimed by the perfect system pervading all His works, and the adaptation of every thing to the end for which it was made. When we see the whirlwind and the earthquake, the famine and the pestilence, the messengers of His righteous judgment—the angels who kept not their first estate overthrown, and lingering in eternal fires—we feel that He is just. When we look at his forbearance to man—at His gift of His own Son for man's salvation; when we hear Him pleading with man to live—inviting, entreating, and, in the person of His Son, weeping over the finally impenitent—we feel that He is merciful. But blend all these attributes together—view the whole Deity at once—and God is love.

Look at Him creating the universe by the word of His power, yet caring for the sparrow; worshipped and adored by ten thousand times ten thousand exalted intelligences, yet regarding the faintest cry of distress from the penitent soul; consuming fire upon the throne of justice, yet Jesus dying upon the cross for man, while the sun is veiled in darkness and earth's strong pillars bend—and God is love!

"This God is our God for ever and ever!"

THE HERE AND THERE OF A BIBLE AGENT

Visit to LaFayette and Oak Bowery—Reflections of an Agent—Summerfield Sunday-school—Bishop Andrew Teaching Negro Children—The Schools.

Suffer me to add something more to my travels, as Bible Agent, through your columns.

On the 26th of February I went up to Lafayette, the county seat of Chambers, and stopped with an old friend of my father, Mr. William Gilmer, formerly of Georgia, and a brother of Gov. Geo. R. Gilmer. I found him away, on a trip to his plantation in Arkansas; yet his kind wife gave me a cordial welcome and made my stay very agreeable. Next morning, which was the Sabbath, attended Sabbath School, and gave a talk and assisted in teaching.

They have here quite a promising school, which must, under the Divine blessing, add to the numbers and piety of the Church. Rev. J. P. Dickinson, minister in charge, is a sterling working Methodist preacher, beloved by his people, who are profiting by his example and teaching. At 11 in the forenoon I preached to a good congregation, and raised considerably over $100 for the Bible cause. This was a good collection. The pastor of the Presbyterian church was absent, but he had informed his congregation of my appointment, and urged them to attend. At 3 P. M. I preached to the colored congregation, and felt much pleasure in the effort. At night occupied the pulpit in presence of a large and attentive congregation. I trust the good Lord owned the word delivered, to the profit of more than one soul.

I had an appointment at Oak Bowery on Tuesday night, the 1st. March. The heavy rains, however, diminished my congregation to such an extent that my collection for the good Book was small. It was good, however, for the number present. Rev. Bros. Williamson, Samuel Harris and Matthews were there, to worship and contribute; others were there who gave.

Mr. Editor, I have been compelled to believe that there are persons in the Church who remain at home when they knew a collection is to be taken up, even for the Bible cause. Such people have not more religion than they will need when they come to die. Are these men getting ready to give an account of their stewardship? It is to be feared that every dollar they so carefully hold back from God and His cause will be summoned as a witness against them, and that it will eat as doth a canker. If I am not mistaken, there are legions of church-members who are most alarmingly asleep to the duties of their stewardship. May the awful warnings which ring out in the Word of God speedily awake them! There is a depth of meaning in our Savior's teachings upon covetousness, which the Church has not yet fathomed. Says He "Take heed and beware of Covetousness." Who can tell how much danger is foreshadowed in that "take heed and beware!" Let the parables, of the rich man, and the rich fool, give it emphasis.

Thank God, there are some who understand their obligations to God and His Church, and are ready to honor the first presentation of his drafts upon them. Ah, my brother, you cannot tell how my soul has been refreshed, as I have asked a contribution from a good brother to my cause, and have had him to smile upon me and say, "Yes, your cause is a good one; none better; the Bible should be circulated;" then open his purse and hand me five, ten, twenty, thirty or fifty dollars! You cannot leave such a man without loving him, and desiring that heaven's choicest blessings may abide upon him.

Saturday, March 5th. Visited Summerfield, at the invitation of Rev. John S. Moore. I stopped with him at his boarding house, Sister Markham's. Hearing that a public debate was to take place at night, in the chapel of the Female College, between six of the young men of Rev. Mr. Connerly's school, I attended. Three were on each side of the question, representing the two literary societies. I got in after the debate commenced, but understood the subject to relate to the comparative excellence of the English and United States Governments. Some of the speeches evinced good scholarship and close thought, and point to a bright future for these young men. Some of them are preparing for the ministry, and will, no doubt, be very useful to the Church. The audience was a large one, the music by the young ladies enchanting, and the occasion exceedingly interesting.

Sunday, 6th. Attended Sabbath-school—and such a Sabbath-school! composed of between three and four hundred scholars, male and female. The Rev. Mr. Connerly is the superintendent, and if there is a better one in the State, I do not know it. Summerfield is the residence of Bishop Andrew; and here I met him in the school, where he takes his place as a teacher, laboring as if he felt that preaching almost every Sabbath was not enough for him. What a rebuke to the ten thousand drones in the Church! He also teaches a class of colored children on Sabbath afternoons. Here is a large colored Sabbath-school. At the request of my good brother Connerly, I gave the School a short address. Then followed a short intermission; after which, I presented the claims of the Bible, and raised a collection of $220. This was fine, especially when it is known that the morning was rainy and lowering. There are few places subjected to more calls for money than Summerfield, and few which respond more liberally.

The Rev. Mr Connerly—assisted by the Revs. J. S. Moore, Fitts, and others—is doing a noble work. He has, if I mistake not, near 200 boys under his instruction, and that instruction is the right sort, taking in head and heart. His scholars, when they apply for admission into college, are generally well prepared. I have reason to know this, having lived two years at the University of Alabama, and heard those say so who stand at the door to guard the entrance. I suppose nearly a dozen young men are here preparing for the ministry. Brethren friendly to the "Ministerial Aid Society, of the Alabama Conference," should help them.

Our noble Brother Merrah is stationed at Summerfield, and, I understand, giving profound satisfaction; indeed I am not surprised at that, for, if I had to choose a pastor, I do not know any one I would pass him by for. He is beloved by young and old.

The Rev. Mr. Montgomery has here one of the noblest collections of young ladies in the State. He told me he had 180 in the college proper. Most of these are grown. He is doing a great work, in training up the daughters of our State. Multiplied hundreds have gone into society, who have shared the benefits of his instructions. He gave me $50 for the Bible cause. May the blessing of God rest upon the Institution over which he presides.

VISIT TO THE PARISH PRISON.

Our city prison is a strong institution, and I suppose a most necessary one. In company with a friend, a few days since, I paid the prison a visit. It is situated near the square; its walls are high and thick, doors and windows heavily jointed with grim iron bars. Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays are visiting days. We went on Monday, and were shewn into the office of the captain. Presently the captain came in, and proposed to shew us the prison. First we went to visit three men confined in a separate dungeon, who are under sentence of death and to be executed four days afterwards. We inquired of the captain of what faith the condemned were, and whether they would be willing to see us.

"They are Catholics, but would be willing to see anybody, of any religion."

He then informed us that the men were full of religion. We went up some flights of stairs, and through several passages, until we came opposite to a black massive door. Soon the long end heavy keys were creaking through the wards and turning bolt after bolt. We entered on a gallery about twelve by eight feet, immediately in front of the prisoners' cell. The cell door was open and they were walking at liberty on the gallery. The cell was carpeted with blankets; on these were the pallets of the prisoners. Around the walls of the cell were various rude pictures in fresco style, of scenes, real or imaginary, in the Savior's earthly life—much such as we see in Catholic churches and print shops—the work of one of the prisoners, which he seems to take a pride in showing. There was a rude altar, a crucifix with a little figure nailed to it, some rosaries and little books of devotion. The prisoners wore crosses and little heart-shaped amulets around their necks—worn, we suppose, as religious charms. Upon inquiry they professed the most entire readiness to die.

They were bold looking men, had committed desperate murders, and seemed to us to exhibit but little of the humility and solemnity fitting their awful circumstances.

They said they had entire trust in Christ, told us that they had received the Holy Communion and that they believed it was "the real body and blood of Christ."

After looking and hearing, the captain said,

"See! I told you they are full of religion."

They certainly had a good deal of religious machinery, and professed to believe one of the most unbelievable dogmas of the Papal Church. We obtained a New Testament, and one of us read a portion of 5th Matthew and a part of the third chapter of John. When we asked for a Bible, one of them said they were not allowed to have it, they might not understand it. Of these men—one, a German, and another, an Irishman, had been bred papist; the other, a Scotchman, had been bred, he said, in the Church of Scotland. I noticed that while the Word was read, the Scotchmen seemed to listen with much more intelligence and reverence than the others.

We then proposed prayer, and all kneeled down. At the conclusion of the prayer my friend and I rose up; but one of the prisoners, the German, began an audible prayer in rather broken English, in which he told the Lord, that my friend and I meant kindly, but that we were greatly in the dark; that, like the the Jews, we had rejected Christ; that the curse which the holy Church had been obliged to pronounce against the first Reformers rested upon us; that unless we believed that we ate the real body and blood of Christ, we could not be saved; and to enlighten and save us, he prayed in the name of the Holy Virgin, and for Christ's sake amen.

The captain, though I suspect not remarkably devout or spiritual, had the instinctive politeness of a Frenchman,—saw at once the rudeness of the prisoner, and said to us "You forgive him?" "Certainly," said we. We left them feeling sad at this apparent insensibility and low and sensuous apprehension of the Gospel. Indeed, Rome has so much that appeals directly to the senses, that we see not how common minds can rise above the material, to a spiritual apprehension of Christ.

With great courtesy, the captain showed us through the prison. The prison incloses a square of perhaps four hundred feet. At the east and west side are three-storied houses; on the north and south, lofty walls, unscaleable and hopelessly high. Through the centre of the square, from north to south, runs another large building connecting with the other two. On either side of this middle building there is a paved square, of perhaps seventy-five by forty feet. The cells in the day time are all thrown open, and the prisoners walk and talk ad libitum. In one of the squares were all the drunkards perhaps a hundred, some little more than mere boys, then middle-aged and grey-haired men; men from all lands, who had passed through all the vicissitudes of life. Most of them looked dilapidated and broken down.

We then went to the other side. Here were criminals—murderers, housebreakers and burners, counterfeiters, pickpockets, rogues and rascals of high and low degree. In this square, as in the other, they were at large; some reading, walking, talking, playing cards or smoking cigars. The average population is two hundred and fifty, and the annual cost over forty thousand dollars. The prison was very clean, there was no unpleasant smell, nothing offensive—"only man was vile!"

I thought if the hell of the impenitent were just what this prison is—evil natures, abandoned associations and remorseful memories—it would be quite sufficient to frighten me away from it. I felt a chilly horror creep over me to be in the presence of so much crime and woe!

CLERICUS.

HOW COFFEE CAME TO BE USED.

At the time Columbus discovered America, coffee had never been known or used. It only grew in Arabia and Upper Ethiopia. The discovery of its use as a drink is ascribed to the Superior of a Monastery in Arabia, who, desirous of preventing the monks from sleeping at their nocturnal services made them drink the infusion of coffee, upon the report of some shepherds, who observed that their flocks were more lively after browsing on the fruit of that plant. Its reputation rapidly spread through the adjacent countries, and in about two hundred years it reached Paris. A single plant, brought there in 1614, became the parent stock of all the coffee plantations in the West Indies. The extent of consumption can now hardly be realized. The United States alone annually consume at the cost of its landing from fourteen to fifteen millions of dollars. You may know the Arabia or Mocha, the best coffee, by its small bean and dark color. The Java and East India, the next in quality, is a larger bean and of a pale yellow color. The West India Rio has a blue, greenish-grey tint.

JEWISH KINDNESS TO PROTESTANT EXILES.

Messrs. Editors:—Although instances of kind feeling on the part of Jews towards their Christian neighbors have not been wanting, they are but little known to most. We trust the following account, taken from the history of the emigration of the Protestant Salzburgers, by J. G. H. Gumhiren, may not be uninteresting to your readers:

"It appears that about a century ago, more than 20,000 peaceful inhabitants were expelled from their native country, the province of Salzburg, then under the rule of Prince Maximilian Gnuhilph, of Rhienburg, the Roman Catholic Archbishop. The exiles, whose only crime was their firm belief in the pure word of God, and their rejection of the errors of human tradition, found an asylum, through the Christian generosity of Frederick William I., King of Prussia, in Prussian Lithuania, near Konigsberg."

The wanderers met with much sympathy from their Protestant brethren in all the places through which they passed on their way to their new home. The conduct of the Jews towards them, is thus recorded by the author: "Everywhere the exiles met with a kind and friendly reception from the Jews, one of whom thus accounted for this proof of their benevolence:—"It is true they are not of my religion nor of my nation; but I behold in them men created in the image of God, who has commanded us to do good to the stranger. The sight of them reminds me of my ancestors when they went out of Egypt, and who, no doubt, would have been pleased if others had done good to them on their journey, and received them with hospitality." This noble conduct of the Jews in the village Klein-Neerdinger, deserves to be particularly mentioned, more especially as it affords a strong contrast to that of the Roman Catholic inhabitants. The emigrants arrived in the village on the 18th of August, 1732—the heat was most oppressive; both men and their cattle suffered intensely from thirst, and sank exhausted on the ground. But the Christian inhabitants looked on without pity. In obedience to the instructions of their priests they had removed the buckets from the wells, and refused to supply the fainting pilgrims with water, even for payment; much less would they afford them any other refreshment; but they were lavish in applying insult and opprobrious epithets to the strangers, in which they were energetically assisted by their worthy priests. When the Jews saw this, they took the thirsty ones to their wells, assisted them to the best of their power, brought bread and beer to them as refreshments, and gave them moreover, pecuniary assistance. At Hildesheim, Weimar and Hanburg, also, the Jews manifested benevolence and hospitality to the exiles. At Hubbestadt the Jews made a collection of thirty-six dollars (Prussien) for the strangers; and the presents given by them to individuals, amounted to at least one hundred dollars. An anathema was at the same time published in the synagogue against any one who should venture to take advantage or profit from the travelers. The Jews at Gunzirhausen, all poor people, collected two dollars, which they handed over to Goebel, the Prussian Commissary, who conducted the wanderers, for the Salzbergers. At Regensburg, a Jew by the name of Solomon, offered to take the charge of twenty of the travellers, but he could only get twelve for his share; these he entertained most excellently, and loaded them with presents. At Nawen, a Jewess stood in the street, distributing money to all the emigrants, who were passing by. At that moment, one of them, who was sick, went into a chemist's shop for some medicine, which was given him gratuitously. The Jewess noticing it, offered him some money on coming out, but could not induce him to take it. The Commissary afterwards asked him why he had refused it. He replied: "The women had not the appearance of being able to give much away."

The Jews at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, expressed a great desire not to be excluded from taking a part in the public entertainment given to the travellers, and contributed thirty dollars to the collection made for them. At Berlin, the Jews not only distributed presents among the strangers on their arrival, but handed alms over to Mr. Van Herold, (a gentleman appointed Director-General of the affairs of the Salzburgers,) the sum of thirty-three dollars.

We sincerely hope our Christian brethren will reciprocate, and aid our missionaries in their endeavors to assist our brethren in the flesh, temporally and spiritually.

SMITHSON SERMONS.

A volume of Sermons has recently appeared, under the title of "Methodist Pulpit, South," and are published by Wm. T. Smithson, a banker in Washington city, and a layman of the Methodist Church, for the benefit of our Church in the Federal capital. The enterprize of Bro. Smithson is worthy of the warmest encouragement, and every preacher should feel himself personally an agent to assist in forwarding his noble design. It is a burning reproach to Southern Methodism that we have permitted Northern Methodists to usurp so great a pre-eminence in the metropolis of the nation. We ought to have a large building in the heart of the city—attracting, by its architectural taste and colossal magnitude, the attention of the transient visitor, the member of Congress, the foreign Ambassador, and the Chief Magistrate of the nation. It ought to be a place of sufficient attraction at any rate, to draw the members of our own Church to its pews. It is generally understood that our membership is small in Washington—consisting mostly of tradesmen, and clerks in the departments. The Church edifice is inconveniently located and somewhat encumbered by debt. It ought to be at once a pleasure and a duty to every friend of Southern Methodism to aid in the building up a representative Church in the Federal Metropolis. The Northern Methodists have rallied, and on Southern soil, in the capital of our nation, erected a "Metropolitan Church" at a cost of $60,000. This was done by voluntary subscriptions abroad. A week or two ago we saw the announcement of an abolition sermon, delivered in one of their Churches. Is there not patriotism, and laudable Church pride enough in the bounds of Southern Methodism to wipe out the disgrace that attaches itself to us in this respect? If you cannot send a voluntary subscription to Bro. Smithson for this truly noble enterprize in which he is engaged, you can order a volume of the Sermons—the profits, on the sale of which, are scrupulously devoted to the erection of a suitable Methodist Church in Washington city. The book is richly worth the price, while, in buying it, you aid a most beneficent object. It contains nineteen sermons—from as many different distinguished ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The volume is also embellished by a fine steel engraving of each preacher who has contributed a sermon. In this volume you will become acquainted with the physique, thought, and feeling of many of our preachers in the different Conferences. The price of the book is only $1,50, and can be sent from Washington by mail at an additional cost of 25 cents. Address—W. T. Smithson—and enclose $1,75. Buy the book: Buy it for yourself—Buy it for your friend. It is a delightful souvenir.

A TRACT FOR THE TIMES.

At the late session of the Alabama Conference W. C. Harris, Chairman of the Committee on Sunday schools, submitted their report, which was adopted, as follows: The following facts contained in the Statistics deserve to be brought distinctly before you.

1st. While there has been an increase the past year of 648 in the aggregate number of scholars, our figures show on some Districts an alarming decline. On the Mobile District for instance, there is a decline of from 21 to 14 schools, from 1096 to 913 scholars, as a comparative view of the Statistics of last year will show. Wherefore this painful fact? Your Committee would waive a question, the answer to which, they trust, is to be found in the grave-yards that hold the victims of the epidemic, rather than in the unfaithfulness of corregeous pastors. On the Montgomery and Eufaula Districts the decline has been equally great, without the mournful veil of an epidemic to cover it. The Blountsville and Lowndesboro Districts have suffered a deterioration, but not so great. Your Committee gladly turn from these symptoms of paralysis to Camden and Demopolis Districts, the former of which has increased well nigh threefold, the latter doubled itself in every statistical line.

2nd. The meagre supply of Sunday-school literature evinces either a defect in our publishing machinery or a want of appreciating zeal on the part of our ministry. In one District the number of books does not equal the number of scholars. Moreover the very District which is most central to commerce is most destitute of books. The following question presents a problem which we fear treads hard upon the feet of some, who, with a laudable zeal, press the vaster systems of benevolence; namely, why, is it that in the Mobile District, intersected as it is with the channels of commerce, there are fewer books than in the less accessible—Blountsville and Talladega?

THE PREACHING OF SAVONAROLA IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

The Florence correspondent of the Newark Daily Advertiser, on the hint that Spurgeon is coming to America, recurs to the strange career of the Italian priest, Savonarola, whose preaching produced such wonderful and even fantastic results in Florence some hundreds of years ago. We quote from the letter: Acting upon the notion of turning the wisdom of this world to account, the Italian Luther gave a memorable example for those who seek to lead the world to piety through its passions. In the reaction, which is sure sooner or later to follow, his imitators must disavow their glory, or perish to save it. The best enthusiasm awakened by Savonarola's preaching in Florence continued for eight years unabated. He moved alike the learned and the unlearned to tears. Scholars and artists were among his converts, and such numbers flocked to hear him, that it became necessary to preach separately to men, women and children, from the impossibility of admitting them all at once into the Duome, though it holds six or eight thousand. In short, high and low, rich and poor, yielded to the wonderful powers of the preaching friar.

Departing from the old Italian routine-preaching, he vigorously applied scripture to all the wants and disorders of the times. His was an impassioned oratory, unprepared, abounding in poetic imagery. He spoke with the love and authority of a prophet, and the whole population was stirred. Unlike his contemporaries, who enriched their discourses from Cicero and Virgil, Dante and Petrarch, he drew all his illustrations from the Bible and the human heart. Through his eloquent appeals, vast sums were given by the rich to feed the poor; an enormous amount of restitution money was paid; and a great deal lent freely, without interest, to aid industrious youth. Princes and people crowded to the cathedral, hours before the time, to secure places, and the profoundest attention attested the speaker's power.

But Savonarola was a man, and he made mistakes; he was a fanatic as well as a reformer, and an iconoclast of the most merciless kind. He called on his converts to bring their household gods—nude statues, pictures, licentious poetry, novels, carnival-masks, dancing-robes, etc., to the sacrifice! Then penetrating the mysteries of the toilette, with his all-seeing eye, he brought out from their hiding-places, cosmetics, perfumes, veils, mirrors, ornaments, in fact, all that could minister to female vanity, together with cards, dice, and other games; and building for them a pyramidal pageda in the duomi square, set fire to the whole, amid the acclimations of the frenzied populace. In this holocaust were consumed many invaluable works of art; besides precious illuminated manuscript copies of Petrarch's Sonnets, of Boccacio's Decameron, and other precious writings, with admirable portraits of Donatello, Bartolomeo, and their peers—any one of which would now bring thousands of dollars. These artists were in truth contributors of their own noblest paintings to the funeral-pyre, for they themselves did not escape the common contagion. A rich Venetian merchant offered $25,000 for the works in ivory and alabaster alone, which were destroyed, with antique vases of rare devices, and numerous other objects of cunning artifice. Verily, a costly sacrifice! The picturesque crowd beheld this desecrating spectacle with transports of joy, and the bells meanwhile rang out responsive peals.

But ere long, another spectacle was seen—an auto da fe of men! The aforetime priest of the sacrifice and two of his disciples, were burned on the very same spot; and while they were consuming, thin savage joy of the multitude found like expression, in shout and song—the natural re-action of misdirected enthusiasm.

A SPIRITUALIST ON SPIRITUALISM.

I most solemnly affirm that I do not believe that there has, during the past 500 years, arisen any class of people who were guilty of so great a variety of crimes and indecencies as the Spiritualists of America. For a long time, I was swallowed up in its whirlpool of excitement and, comparatively, paid but little attention to its evils, believing that much good might result from the opening of the avenues of spiritual intercourse; but during the past eight months, I have devoted my attention to a critical investigation of its moral, social, and religious bearing, and I stand appalled before the revelations of its awful and damning realities, and would flee from its influence as I would from the miasma, which would destroy both soul and body. Spiritualism and prostitution, with a rejection of Christianity, are twin sisters, which everywhere go hand in hand. With but little inquiry, I have been able to count up over 70 mediums, most of whom have wholly of an abolition sermon, delivered in one of their Churches. Is there not patriotism, and laudable Church pride enough in the bounds of Southern Methodism to wipe out the disgrace that attaches itself to us in this respect? With but little inquiry, I have been able to count up over 70 mediums, most of whom have wholly abandoned their conjugal relations, others living with their paramours, called "affinities," others in promiscuous adultery, and still others have exchanged partners. Old men and women, who have passed the meridian of life, are not unfrequently the victims of this hallucination. Many of the mediums lose all sense of moral obligations, and yield for the time, to whatever influence may be brought to bear upon them. Their pledges, their integrity, or their oaths, are no more reliable than the shifting breezes of the whirlwind, for they are made to yield to the powers which for the time control them. DOUGLAS JERROLD.

Charles Dickens furnishes the following anecdote of Jerrold: "Of his generosity I had a proof within these two or three years, which it saddens me to think of now. There had been an estrangement between us—not on any personal subject, and not involving an angry word—and a good many months had passed without my even seeing him in the street, when it fell out that we dined, each with his own separate party, in the stranger's room of a Club. Our chairs were almost back to back, and I took mine after he was seated and at dinner. I said not a word (I am sorry to remember) and did not look that way. Before we had sat so long, he openly wheeled his chair round, stretched out both his hands in a most engaging manner, and said aloud, with a bright and loving face that I can see as I write to you, 'For God's sake, let us be friends again! A life's not long enough for this.'"

ENTIRE CONSECRATION.

One of the most beautiful examples of entire consecration to the Master's work is given in the life of Rev. D. T. Stoddard, missionary to the Nestorians. Rev. J. P. Gulliver of Norwich, in a review of this life in the Bibliotheca, gives these illustrations of his devotion:

He set sail from Boston to Smyrna on the 1st March, 1843. The embarkation was an affecting scene. The wharf and deck were crowded with the friends of the six missionaries who were then going, together, to a land of darkness. A lowering morning and the pattering of a gentle rain, were in full accordance with the spirit of the occasion. The solemn services over, a tearful leave-taking followed. But in the midst of that absorbing scene, when, if ever, the missionary might properly be lost in the son and the brother, Stoddard, true to the passion which burned through his after life, seeing a college acquaintance standing at a distance, with whom he had before conversed on the subject of missions, pressed his way out from the group about him, and calling his friend, with a warm grasp of the hand drew him on board, and said, with deep emotion, "I want you to come out to Persia. I know you have weak eyes, but I will try to find a place in the mountains, if not upon the plain, where you can labor. Promise me that you will come." And there he stood completely absorbed, during those precious moments while the crew were casting off the hawsers, the last connecting link with home and friends, apparently forgetful of all beside, and only able to say, as he returned to the impatient company of weeping relatives: "Wist ye not I must be about my Father's business?"

IMPORTANT.—By a note from the Publishing house, we are informed that the list containing the names and addresses of several who subscribed, at the late Conference in New Orleans, to the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review, has been mislaid or lost. Those subscribers who do not receive the Review, by forwarding their names and address to this office will have the matter attended to.

ECONOMY OF METHODISM.

The late Judge Gaston is reported to have expressed the opinion, that the Methodist Discipline presented the most complete system of Church government in the world.

How did the Methodistic plan grow to its present proportions?

"When John Wesley was asked to give an account of the economy of the people called Methodists, he wrote: 'They had no previous design or plan at all, but everything arose just as the occasion offered. They saw or felt some impending or pressing evil, or some good necessary to be pursued; and many times they fell unanimous on the very thing which secured the good or removed the evil. At other times they consulted on the most probable means, following only common sense and scripture; though they generally found, in looking back, something in Christian antiquity very nearly allied thereto."

FIFTY YEARS AGO.

REV. C. C. GILLESPIE, Editor New Orleans Christian Advocate:

MY DEAR SIR: I send you a copy of a letter written by the late Governor Claiborne of Louisiana to the then Mayor of New Orleans. So far as I am informed, the Methodist ministers referred to, were the first Protestant ministers that visited the city, after it came under American jurisdiction—perhaps the first that ever entered it. The "Principal," mentioned in the Governor's letter, is, I believe, the large building below and adjoining the Cathedral, opposite the Jackson Square. Yours very truly, J. F. H. CLAIBORNE.

Bay St. Louis, Mississippi, March 18.

New Orleans, June 16, 1809.

HON. SAMUEL MATTHEWS, Mayor etc:

Permit me to introduce to your acquaintance the Rev. Mr. Dow, and McLeod, Methodist ministers, who have visited this city with a view of preaching the Gospel. There being no established Methodist Church, I have to request you to be good enough, during their stay, to allow them, on Sabbaths, the use of one of the rooms in the Principal, perhaps the room used by the Superior Court would be most appropriate.

Under our Government, where all religions are tolerated, Ministers of the Gospel of every denomination, should be received with respect.

WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE.

LET EACH DO SOMETHING.

A subscriber, who sends a new subscriber, writes: "Let each preacher get ten new subscribers—each steward five—and each church-member one."

Let us help our friend to arrange it a little better. Let each traveling preacher get ten—each local preacher three—each steward and class-leader two—and each subscriber one.

Could that be done? Yes! It could be done more easily than many other things that must be done this year.

What would be the result? Why, it would give us twenty thousand subscribers! That is, it would more than double the present list.

It would give us thirteen thousand new subscribers in one year.

We say this to show how easily a great work could be accomplished in a short time by a united effort.

And yet, easy as it is to, not more than five or six hundred a year has been the increase, for years past.

This shows that the majority of our people do almost nothing.

The writer of this has added nearly a thousand new subscribers to one of our papers in one year, by his own personal effort.

The editor labors hard to make a good paper. He labors hard to advance all the Church interests. After all, there are many that cannot be pleased; and yet, who labors to increase the circulation and usefulness of the paper? A few, here and there.

Men travel over whole sections of a state—address large congregations wherever they go—write long communications for the advancement of the interest they have in charge; complain, if you reject or shorten them or if the printer should make a mistake—and yet, never send a subscriber or a dollar to the office.

Others travel over large circuits and districts, or fill important stations—have large congregations—protracted meetings—revivals—fine opportunities to advance the circulation of the paper—yet do almost nothing for it.

But here and there, on a poor circuit or mission, an unsalaried preacher labors, and gets a salary that would not supply pocket change for some others—and he sends hundreds of dollars, and perhaps over a hundred new subscribers, in one year. If all, according to their opportunities, labored in the way the last mentioned does, instead of five or six hundred increase—it would reach a figure too large to be mentioned "in this connection."

Can preachers and Christian people look at these things without being aroused to action, and then wonder at the impenitence of sinners? Consistency is a good thing!

NORTH CAROLINA UNIVERSITY.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate in showing up the unfairness of the management of the University of North Carolina, is doing a good work, in the right way. With a dignity becoming its representative position; with a charity and courtesy equal to Christian obligation; and yet with a stern sense of justice equal to both, it seems determined to correct an evil partyism, the pertinacity of which is only equaled by the patience with which it has been borne. We hope it will continue the same work, in the same spirit—"mind the same things, and walk by the same rule."

The Advocate sums up the facts as follows:

Methodists in the State, about 60,000—Episcopalians, 3,000—Presbyterians 15,000—Baptists 45,000.

The Trustees—only one Methodist—with a membership four times as large as the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches combined, and equal to the whole number of Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and Baptists; the Methodists have but one fifty-fifth part in the control exercised by the Board of Trustees!

The Faculty, (including Tutors, and 'professors' also,) now stands thus: 7 Episcopalians: 5 Presbyterians: 2 Methodists: 1 Baptist.

We have intimated that the policy pursued for some years past apparently looks to a combination of the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches to control the University. Do not these facts look that way?

These two Churches have 13 members in the corps of instructors. Methodists and Baptists combined have only 3. The result is then—Methodists and Baptists, with 105,000 members, have three representatives in the Faculty; Presbyterians and Episcopalians, with one-seventh part of that number of members, have four-fives as many representatives in the Faculty!

REV. C. H. SPURGEON.—The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon has abandoned his contemplated trip to America, certainly for the present year.

MR. DICKENS' PROFITS.—A new volume of Dickens' stories has been announced. It is said he has made already $50,000 by his "Readings."

AN UNACCLIMATED RELIGION.

Contention and bitterness between the different branches of the Christian Church is an evil, against which we have borne a steady testimony. There are, however, presumptions and arrogancies—individual and otherwise—"cropping out" occasionally in connection with certain of our brethren, which, without giving up our kind feelings and good wishes for their denomination, we feel bound, in consideration of the public health, to notice.

A Presbyterian contemporary, not distant, but seemingly not "to the manor born," and who has not been distinguished for modesty and courtesy in his notices of the doctrines, usages and relations of sister Churches, recently told the following strange story of himself.

He had been trying hard to increase his circulation. In the course of the canvass he met with an individual who remarked that he wished to see a religious paper established in this region, but that the one in question "was too religious for this climate!".

Such an objection, from one who "wished to see a religious paper" prosper, seems rather to have puzzled our fellow-laborer. We are inclined believe, however, that the paradox can be explained, by referring the objection to the kind of religion taught by the paper in question, and somewhat to the way in which it is taught. There are different kinds of religion, as the Bible proves; for instance, it speaks of "pure religion and undefiled, etc.," and it also speaks of a religion "which is vain."

The kind of religion taught is about this: The human race is divided into two classes—"the elect," whose salvation was secured by an immutable decree of God, and rendered as certain as such a decree could make it; and the "reprobates," whose damnation was secured by the same decree, and is equally certain.

So much for the kind of "religion." The objector, being, no doubt, a practical man, knows too well that if our contemporary succeeds in making our practical sinners believe it, you might as well try to turn the Mississippi up stream as to turn them from their love of money, sin, pleasure, and dissipation. To every exhortation to repentance, especially when the lure of their besetting sin is nigh, they will just say, "What is to be will be," and "there is no use talking."

Then as to the way in which he teaches this kind of "religion." His paper says:

"Who banished, imprisoned, and slaughtered tens of thousands of the Calvinistic Waldenses and Huguenots? Roman Catholic Arminians. Who persecuted the Jansenists of France? Arminians. Who executed and slew with the sword thousands of Calvinistic puritans, for the high crime of resisting civil and religious tyranny? English Arminians. Who dyed many a dark glen, many a heather plain of Scotland, with the best blood of her citizens? English Arminians. Who, as a body, (with some honorable exceptions) opposed the American revolution? American Arminians. Who wrote a treatise against the revolution, which Toplady says he stole from Dr. Johnson? Mr. Wesley, the founder of the Arminian Methodists. Who petitioned the General Assembly of Virginia against the petition of Calvinists for religious toleration? American Arminians.

* * * * * * * * *

"Who are found at the head of the great majority of the colleges of the land? Calvinists. Who have nearly all the theological seminaries? Calvinists. Who make nearly all our school books, and are generally regarded as the best teacher of our schools? There is not a first-rate college in the land that is under Arminian influence. They all rank low in the estimation of the scholars of the country. If a man is not a Calvinist, it is prima facie evidence that he is an scholar, that he cannot teach.

* * * * * * * * *

"Go to Whitefield, and the Calvinistic preachers of his day, and they will tell you, no genuine revival ever took place except under Calvinistic preaching. It is impossible. God never thus honors the doctrines the devil originates.

* * * * * * * * *

"In the army of Arminians we find all the Roman Catholics, except Jansenists, all Pelagians, Socinians, Arians, or Unitarians, Universalists, high Church Episcopalians, Puseyites, Swedenborgians, Mormons, Campbellites—in fine, all the vile heretics, from the very first one Satan made to the hosts of the present time. To these add all the unregenerate of every grade of wickedness. This first opened my eyes. I found all adulterers, fornicators, drunkards, liars, blasphemers, perjured persons, profane swearers, Sabbath breakers, all haters of God were haters of Calvinism. This determined me to seek the company of more pious people.

No wonder that an objection was made that our brother was "too religious (in his kind and way) for this climate." The sinners of "this climate" are a practical people, and, therefore, this kind of "religion" does not suit them. They are a refined and courteous people, and, therefore, this way of teaching "religion" does not please them.

An apt illustration of what we mean by this kind of "religion" occurred in this city the other day. A little boy, brought up in the faith alluded to, (that is, Calvinism,) went to Church with a little boy brought up in the faith of the New Testament—that Christ "tasted death for every man," and is the "propitiation for the sins of the whole world." There was a revival in the Church where they went. After service, the little boy brought up in the unacclimated "religion" was asked how he liked the meeting? He said he did not like so much noise—praying for penitents around the altar, the rejoicing of the newly converted, and the like. Said he, "I like the way our Church conducts service much better than yours. I like every thing about our Church but its religion; I like your religion the best." The objector to the unacclimated "religion," and the objection of this little boy to the "religion" of his Church, both, doubtless, referred to the same thing, (Calvinism.) We have no idea that any objection has ever been made to the piety of our contemporary. He is mistaken, and has suffered discouragement unnecessarily. It is his "religion," and his consequent manners, that do not suit "this climate." If its piety could only rectify its "religion," but—"what is to be will be."

Speaking of "climate" suggests another objection that our friend almost every week complains of as being made to him, and which has more to do with "climate" than the first objection. He says that Dr. Newton and other persons charge him with sustaining a politico-ecclesiastical platform which denounces Slavery as sinful, and pledges all its adherents to this faith. We know but little about this matter, and nothing but our sympathy for our neighbor, excited by his continual complaints as to climatic objections to him, could have induced us, at this time, to have alluded to it. Dr. Newton has been publishing, it is true, some very ugly sentences, enclosed in quotation marks, which he says he takes from our neighbor's platform. "Deliverances," he calls them, we believe. "Deliver us" from any such "deliverances;" they are certainly too "religious" for this climate."

In order to illustrate the appropriateness of the caption of this article, and of our remarks as to the kind of religion, we quote below the action of the General Assembly of the Old School Presbyterian Church, in 1818, 1845, 1846, and 1858, as arranged by Dr. Newton, New School Presbyterian, in a recent number of the Philadelphia Christian Observer.

Action of the Assembly of 1846.

"Our Church has, from time to time, during a period of nearly sixty years, expressed its views on the subject of Slavery. During all this period, it has held and uttered substantially the same sentiments. Believing that this uniform testimony is true and capable of vindication from the word of God, the Assembly is at the same time clearly of the opinion that it has already deliberately and solemnly spoken on this subject with sufficient fullness and clearness:

ACTION OF 1818.	ACTION OF 1845.
Slavery is a "gross violation of the most precious and sacred rights of human nature.	Slavery is "no bar to Christian communion."
Slavery is "utterly inconsistent with the law of God."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
Slavery is "inconsistent with the dictates of humanity and religion."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
Slavery is "totally irreconcilable with the spirit and principles of the gospel of Christ."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"Slavery creates a paradox in the moral system."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"Slavery exhibits rational, accountable and immortal beings in such circumstances as scarcely to leave them the power of moral action."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"The slave is deprived of his natural right."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"The slave is degraded as a human being."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"Our country has inflicted a most grevious injury upon the unhappy Africans by bringing them into slavery."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"It is a duty indispensably incumbent on all Christians to labor for the complete extinction of slavery."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"It is manifestly the duty of all Christians to use their honest, earnest and unwearied endeavors to obtain the complete abolition of slavery throughout Christendom, and if possible throughout the world."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"We rejoice that the Church to which we belong commenced as early as any other in this country the good work of endeavoring to put an end to Slavery; and that in the some work many of its members have ever since been, and now are, among the most active, vigorous and efficient laborers."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"We do indeed tenderly sympathize with those portions of our Church and our country where the evil of slavery has been entailed upon them. At the same time we earnestly exhort them to continue, and if possible to increase their exertions to effect a total abolition of slavery."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"We exhort others to forbear harsh censures and uncharitable reflections on their brethren who unhappily live among slaves whom they cannot immediately set free; but who, at the same time, are really using all their influence, and all their endeavors, to bring them into a state of freedom, as soon as a door for it can be safely opened."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
"We warn all who belong to our denomination of Christians, against unduly extending the plea of necessity; against making it a cover for the love and practice of slavery, or a pretence for not using efforts that are lawful and practicable, to extinguish this evil."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.
Slavery is "a blot on our holy religion."	Slavery is no bar to Christian communion.

ACTION OF 1856.

"We see no occasion to revise the constant and unalterable faith of our Church" ON THE SUBJECT OF SLAVERY

We think our neighbor's authority, Toplady, is mistaken in asserting that Mr. Wesley "stole" his treatise "from Dr. Johnson." We do not think the old saint would steal. He was opposed to the revolution, as many noble Englishmen were; but he was not the enemy of the Americans, nor the friend of their oppressors. He has done much for this country. He was honest and brave. What he was, he professed. He avowed and supported his "deliverances," whether suited to the "climate" or not. We make these statements fearing our friend might hurt his reputation, now he is dead.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

WE HAVE received the April number. The delay common in the publication of the Quarterly in former times, did it much damage. Its appearance in good time now, is doing it much good. We draw largely from its pages, both for the benefit of the Quarterly, and for the interest of the Advocate. In the present number, the Editor says:

"OUR PUBLISHING-HOUSE.—Our business is reviving: orders are increasing: all our presses are throwing off work as fast as they can. The panic affected us greatly, yet we did some work last year, as will appear from the Report of the Superintendent, who states the amount and value of work done at the Southern Methodist Publishing-house during the year ending February 22, 1859, as follows: Number of volumes printed, 438,620; number of magazines printed, 106,500; number of newspapers printed, 810,000; number of "tokens" printed, 18,037; number of single impressions printed, 4,509,250; number of pages printed, 71,150,500. Cash cost of volumes printed, $67,536 25. Value of stereotyping and composition completed during the year, $19,509 03. Value of press-work done, $9,004 50. Wages paid operatives in Press-room, Composition-room, and Stereotype-room, $21,076 49. The foregoing does not include a large amount of stereotyping, stereotype-jobbing, press-work, etc., done for other printing-offices, etc. Let us have the patronage of the entire Southern Methodist Church, and our Publishing enterprise will be a triumphant success.

"OUR CHURCH PAPERS.—In the front rank of ecclesiastical agencies are our Church papers. Of these we have a goodly number. First, there is the Sunday-school Visitor, a most beautiful monthly, which ought to be in every school and family in the land; and the Home Circle, (Nashville,) which is a vade-mecum for any lady, whether she be in the drawing-room or kitchen, the closet or garden, the library or—anywhere else. Then there is the Evangelische Apologete, published at Galveston, for our German friends; and those who are capable of judging, say that the editor is admirably qualified for his office. By its side is the Texas Christian Advocate, a power in that great State. The Pacific Methodist, San Francisco, Cal., defends the outposts. In the North-west, St. Louis, Mo., there is another sturdy sentinel, that will let no one pass without the watchword: at Memphis is another, and at New Orleans another, both guarding well the lower regions of the great inland sea and the Gulf: on the Atlantic seaboard, at Richmond, Raleigh, and Charleston, are three vedettes, not one of whom was ever heard to say, with Corporal Nym, "I dare not fight, but I will wink, and hold out mine iron;" and then, to come back to the place of beginning, there is the great Central, by general suffrage worthy of its responsible position. We did not intend to be so military when we began to particularize our Church papers, nor do we wish to convey the idea that they are remarkably pugnacious—none of them, we believe, are unduly so, considering that they belong to the Church militant; but we intended to felicitate the Connection on the fact of its having so many trustworthy agents laboring successfully to promote all its interests. With such a variety, surely every member and friend of the Church may be furnished with a paper adapted to his peculiar wants and tastes. We are pleased to see that our Church periodicals generally eschew bootless controversies and discourteous personalities. Summaries of news, especially religious and ecclesiastical, are more edifying than scholastic essays on abstruse points of divinity, such as sometimes find their way into the columns of the religious press. On the whole, we feel like congratulating our excellent confreres on their successful management of this delicate matter. They seem sometimes forced to "marry a man to get rid of him". The Christian Advocate and Journal is very ably edited, though we differ toto cælo from its deliverances in regard to the peculiar institution. The Baltimore Christian Advocate, a new paper, is true as steel to the great principles of Methodism; its editorials are remarkably spicy, racy, and vigorous—the editor being a son of the late venerable Dr. Bond. The Church, North, has "Advocates" also at Cincinnati, Auburn, Pittsburg, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, Salem, besides Zion's Herald at Boston, the Sunday-school Advocate, the Missionary Advocate, and the Quarterly Review, at New York, German Apologist and Ladies' Repository, at Cincinnati. Some of these we know to be well edited: one or two of them, perhaps, might be spared. What a potent instrumentality is the religious press!

"NEW EDITIONS of a great many of our books have just been printed, and others are in the press. Life of Capers is likely to have a good run; Theophilus Walton already has it—the eleventh thousand is out. Watson's Dictionary enlarged, with New Biblical Atlas and Gazetteer, the second edition beautifully brought out; Australia, Art of Printing, Chapters for Children, Dawn of Civilization, Alfred the Great, Learning to Feel, Fifty Beautiful Ballads, and others of this class, are in the list—a good sign for the young folks: we are glad to see a demand for this kind of reading. The Dairyman's Daughter, with an introduction containing nearly half as much matter as Mr. Richmond's narrative. The wonder has been expressed that any one could write the history of the Isle of Wight without noticing the Dairyman's Daughter: some may perhaps wonder that Mr. Richmond could write her life without hinting that she was a Wesleyan Methodist. We presume he suppressed this fact, to secure for his book admission into circles where Methodism was at a great discount. Our addition to the narrative gives it great interest, while the cost is not increased. Our Sunday-school Hymns, Questions on Genesis, and Southern Methodist Primer, are reprinted in large editions: let them be everywhere introduced. The editor's little book on Holiness is also in the list of reprints: the times seem to demand a plain, scriptural, Wesleyan essay on this subject, and ours has been considered not unmeet for the place it occupies. There is also a new edition of our book on Baptism. We may take occasion to say, that after reading a great many new works on that subject, we have found nothing that we consider necessary to add to our treatise. We presume there are very few available arguments, if any, that have not been pressed into service. Several books, etc., have been written in reply to the treatise: we have not read them, but our friends who have, assure us that our positions are fruitlessly assailed: we advanced none but such as we thought would stand the test. As the book covers all the points belonging to the subject of Baptism, some of our Bishops, and other leading men, have recommended it as a suitable text-book for those who may not be able to find another so convenient for the purpose. We are pleased to see a demand for a new edition of Bishop Pierce's Incidents of Western Travel, to which another chapter (on Texas) has been added, increasing the value of this interesting work. A large edition of Songs of Zion, a Supplement to our Church Hymn Book, and the best collection of hymns and spiritual songs apart from that work, and another of the Discipline, have also been issued—a favorable symptom. Those excellent little books, Home, by Hay, and Family Government, by Bishop Andrew, and others which we cannot now specify, are in the list. Our Fifty Dollar Young People's Library will be kept full, ready for the largest demands. Our friends would do well to send for the Almanac, containing the Catalogue, and make out orders to supply the schools in this springtide of the year.

"IN PRESS.—We are printing a valuable work by Dr. Sasnett, entitled, "Discussions in Literature and Religion:" it contains the best of his essays, furnished from time to time to various periodicals, addresses, etc., carefully corrected and revised. It will be a portly duodecimo. The numerous friends of Dr. S. will be glad to see these valuable papers reproduced in this form. We need not say the author is one of the most vigorous thinkers of the age. Dr. M'Tyeire's prize essay on the "Duties of Masters," has been revised and enlarged—we should rather say rewritten—and will deservedly take its place with the standard literature of our Church: we bespeak for it a universal circulation—a work of this sort is greatly needed. The Life of Adam Clarke, by Dr. Etheridge, which was noticed in this Journal at the time of its first appearance in England, advance sheets having been kindly sent us by the Wesleyan editor in London, will be a rich addition to our biographical literature. It has had already an immense run in England. The Old Life of Clarke is an interesting but chaotic work—compared with which this is a perfect cosmos: we have writers among us, perhaps, who could have produced its equal, had they been in possession of the materials which the family of Dr. C. and the British Conference laid at the disposal of the learned biographer.

"THE MINUTES OF THE ANNUAL CONFERENCES OF THE M. CHURCH, SOUTH, for 1858, show an increase of 43,398 ministers and members, during the year. The increase would be about 44,000 if several charges in the Kentucky Conference had been reported. This would make the total number of ministers and members about 700,000: the figures reported are 699,175. The delay in the issue of this Annual was occasioned by the non-reception of statistics from certain quarters. We make up the statistics of the Pacific Conference from a Church paper, the official copy not having yet reached us."

THE NEW AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

This extensive and valuable work, already fully brought before our readers, by advertisement and editorial notice, and which is to comprise fifteen large volumes, has now reached the fourth volume, which we have received, and the fifth one will soon be out. The value of the work may be understood from the following facts: It is a reliable reference book on all subjects—a library in itself—giving in a condensed form, an amount of general information which, without such a work, could not be obtained without an impracticable range of reading. Indeed, the general reader could never obtain the requisite books. The press, throughout the United States, commend it highly. The ablest writers, in large number, are engaged in contributing to it. It is intended to be as impartial as possible; if errors or omissions creep in, they will be corrected. The leading men of the country, of all classes, have already subscribed for it.

THE WAR QUESTION IN EUROPE.

THE FEELING IN ENGLAND.—"Spectator," the well-informed and able London correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, who, for many months, has expressed the opinion that the design of the French Emperor is to wage war with Great Britian, all his declarations of amity to the contrary notwithstanding, writes as follows in his letter of the 18th ult: From every part of France details daily arrive of increased military and naval preparations. The tone of the press is alike belligerent. The industrial and financial classes in vain endeavor to stem the tide, and are rapidly becoming convinced of their impotence. In a short time the requisite feeling of irritation will be aroused to induce the country to plunge into anything. At present the month of April seems to be contemplated as the time for action. If April and May are allowed to pass, there may then be hope for the year. About twelve months back, when almost equal alarm was prevalent, it was mentioned to your readers that, if we could get over the Spring, we might trust in a respite till 1859. A similar opinion may now be entertained, but the hope of an equally favorable result is held only by the minority.

It is believed that the Government are at length thoroughly convinced that mischief is at hand. In both Houses of Parliament the same may be clearly discovered. Among officials of all kinds it is still stronger. Little is publicly said on the subject, and this discretion is a consequence of the sense each man has that he knows his neighbor's thought, and that we had better by common consent get ready as soon as possible.

There is nothing in the Italian question to inspire this universal distrust. It arises from a conviction that there is a foregone conclusion in favor of a revival of the attempts of the First Napoleon, that the Italian question is merely a pretext, and that if this pretext is removed, another and another will be attempted until the desire be attained.

Positive intelligence has been received that Austria, under the advice of England, will consent to refer any point in dispute to diplomatic adjustment. This, of course, should remove all fears of war, if those fears had no other ground than that which has thus far been avowed. But people look to Cherbourg, and are cognizant that the Italian question has not had anything to do with a single stone of that work. They also recollect that nearly twenty years ago the Emperor announced to France that he represented a principle, a cause, and a defeat. The principle was universal suffrage, the cause that of the empire, the defeat, that of Waterloo.

While the misgivings of the public are turned in this direction, Europe is favored with a new Parisian pamphlet—not avowedly of Imperial manufacture, but from a quarter quite as significant. Its title is La Guerre, and its author, M. Emile de Girardin. M. de Girardin is always eagerly in the van of national movements, and the Emperor knows the men to select for any literary purpose. The Italian scheme, in a diplomatic sense, has failed. Fresh ambitions must be aroused. The potentate who crushed the Roman Republic, finds his sentiment in that quarter misunderstood. He must now take a wider field and regenerate not a portion but the whole of Europe. Russia is to be his sole partner; Europe must be divided into two governments—that of the East and that of the West. All the minor nations would willingly submit themselves to these two powers. England might resist unless Cobden and Bright could be brought into government, but, if so, she must be coerced. She must be driven from the command of the channel, and deprived of every naval station of advantage. This, says M. de Girardin, would be a work worthy of Napoleon the Third. It would be a war that would repay its cost—a war that would avenge Waterloo—a war that would give to France her lost frontiers, and place Europe in equilibrium.

WE now give, from another quarter, Harper's Weekly, a view of

The Emperor Napoleon and His Policy.

The English journals are once more furious with the Emperor Napoleon; and, as usual, quite a number of American papers follow the example. The Englishmen call the French Emperor the usual hard names, and charge him with desiring to dismember Europe and destroy the peace of the world to gratify his own ambition. This charge servile and ignorant journals in the United States seem only too ready to echo.

It is difficult to reconcile the abuse and the accusations of the British journals with the facts. No one, be he even an English journalist, pretends that the state of Italy is satisfactory, or even safe; Naples is subject to a grinding despotism; Rome is garrisoned by French troops; the legations and the Milanese are also garrisoned by foreigners—Austrians; Tuscany is overawed by Austria; Piedmont is in a state of extremely menacing revolutionary effervescence. A country lying in the centre of the Old World, and in such a condition as this, can not, certainly, be said to be in a safe or stable situation. And it is unreasonable, to any the least, to accuse Napoleon, whose interests are eminently conservative, of desiring to feed his own ambition when he looks forward to some radical change in Italy.

Rumor has it—we have reason to believe, with good foundation—that the Emperor of the French has proposed to the Emperor of Austria to vacate simultaneously Rome and the Milanese, and to allow the Italians to make another effort to govern themselves. To this proposal the Austrians are said to have replied in the negative. Under the circumstances, can the Emperor be blamed for expressing his dissent from Austria's policy in a marked manner, and from giving every moral aid and countenance to the only Italian power which does not stink in the nostrils of every liberal man?

British prejudice is equally deaf to argument and blind to facts. Because Napoleon has organized a government that is not suitable to the English, therefore—so the English reason—he can mean nothing honest. This least reflection would satisfy them that Italian conquest is the last thing he can desire. He might have insisted on territorial reward for his outlay in the Crimean war; and it would have been an excellent thing for Turkey if he had. But he had the wisdom to perceive that the old theory of conquest is fallacious, and that to annex a Turkish province would be winning a loss. Just so with Italy. If Napoleon wanted to conquer or annex a part of Italy, Austria would only be too happy to divide with and aid him. Clearly, however, he sees the expense and peril, and he does not see the gain, of the operation; and he will have nothing to do with it. Whatever his private motives may be, his policy is clear: he seeks the re-organization of Italy on an Italian basis. And in this, it seems, he deserves the support and approval of every lover of order and good government, and of every hater of tyranny and revolution, throughout the world.

A man of Napoleon's calibre is not to be diverted from his purpose by the brawling of British tradesmen who fear commercial panics, or by the tirades of British journalists who have only just got over the belief that wooden shoes and fried frogs were the staple institutions of France. Whatever his design is, the world may rely upon it that he foresaw the obvious difficulties in the way, that he knows how to meet them, and that he will persevere in his course. According to the law of periodicity there ought to be, about this time, a political upheaval of some kind or other in Europe. Under a roi faineant, it might be a street fight in Paris, ending in an overthrow of the reigning dynasty. Under Louis Napoleon, it may become a crusade for Italian liberty, in which, whatever the British publicists and politicians may say, liberal men in England, as elsewhere, can not help but sympathize with the crusaders.

SOUTHERN PUBLISHING ENTERPRISE.

It affords us great pleasure to comply with the request of a personal friend, by copying from the Tribune the correspondence of some of our most intelligent citizens with the Rev. Doctors Hamilton and Neely, inviting them to address our citizens on the features of the great publishing enterprise, upon which the entire Southern Convention of the Methodist Church is engaged.

Aside from sectual religious proclivities, we cannot resist the conviction that this is the most important movement which we have yet seen, to relieve the South from that literary thraldom which yokes her to unfriendly Northern thought, and to establish her upon the independent basis of her own mind.

The books that now feed our youth with moral nourishment are replete with sentiments of the most deleterious nature, and do more to extinguish the life-giving principles of patriotism and home-love than all other external material causes combined. The cheapness with which literary work can be done at the North has engrossed the publication of the country in that quarter; and as the people there are bent upon their own interest, it is only such matter as contributes to their own prosperity that finds its way to the reading world. The present is truly a great scheme, and embraces the entire field of the South, under the supervision and care of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and will furnish an example worthy of imitation by all other creeds in the grand and common labor of purifying the sentiments and sympathies of the Southern people from the debasing touch of Northern ideas. The capital of this organization is one million dollars. The mother Institution is established at Nashville Tenn., with branches in various parts of the country; and there will be another at Mobile, with a basis of $50,000. I will be under the management of Southern men; as surely our people must perceive that this movement, under the fostering care of the largest religious denomination of the country, and the repressless zeal which has ever marked its determined purpose, is a long stride even in the inception of the enterprise, towards the moral, intellectual and social independence of the South, so far as her fountains of light are concerned.

We wish the Institution a hearty Godspeed, and hope that it may receive the cordial support of the entire South, and that it may be the means of a literary exodus out of that house of Northern bondage which has already too long disgraced the character and enterprise of the Southern people. Rev. Messrs. Neely and Hamilton are well known for their eminent abilities, and we beg to recommend our people, of all social classes and religious sects, to attend their explanations on the occasion appointed by the correspondence. [Mobile Register.]

"HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE."

MR. EDITOR: Although out of the line of letters, I do not feel that I am altogether ineligible to the formation and expression of an opinion even in regard to literary subjects. From no other motives than those of Christian philanthrophy, excited by an interest in the education of the poor and the welfare of future generations, I call attention to a matter that has attracted notice in both religious and secular papers. I have reference to "Mulkey's System of Orthoepy and Orthography," which is being disseminated throughout our State with great success under the supervision of Dr. W. A. Mulkey, son of the Rev. William Mulkey of Nashville, author of the system. I unhesitatingly give it as an honest belief, from what I have seen of its practical working in the school-room, that much of the time, labor and money consumed in teaching children to read and spell may be saved, and that too on purely scientific principles. We find our most distinguished scholars expressing their conviction that, by the proper use of the charts and books now in the hands of thousands throughout the country, as much as half the time and labor may be redeemed by the Mulkey method. If it be what it is represented as being, should it not receive the zealous support of the poor-loving throughout Christendom, where the English language is spoken? Having for several years engaged in the distribution of Bibles among the illiterate sections of Alabama, I am satisfied that the Dr. is accomplishing a great good in arousing the people to an interest in education heretofore unfelt and unknown, and indoctrinating their children in the principles of that which I conceive to be the inductive and most efficient mode of imparting a knowledge of spelling and reading. Feeling it to be my duty, I humbly submit for publication this imperfectly and hastily written article. S. E. SWOPE.

Bluff Springs, Alabama, March 10th, 1859.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE BROOKS HOUSE has an advertisement in this paper, to which we call attention, and to which we most heartily recommend our friends. When visiting the city, if you wish comfortable quarters—a home while you stay—go to Brook's. With the wide square and beautiful trees, and sweet green grass in front, we do not know a more pleasant place.

RHEUMATISM CURED.—We refer once more to the advertisement of Dr. Mortimore's Remedy of Rheumatism. This is the fourth column of evidence in its belief. The proprietor assures us that he could furnish additional evidence to fill a column anew weekly, for twelve months, and then not publish all that he has now on hand. We are satisfied however that if the evidence which has appeared in the last few numbers of our paper, will not convince the afflicted of its efficacy, a volume would not do it.

We hope our readers have preserved each number of our paper, so that if at any time afflicted with this painful disease, or if they know a friend who is afflicted, they may know where to obtain this remedy.

THE METHODIST.—We again call attention to the advertisement of this truly valuable work, to be found in another column. It is highly commended by the Methodist press generally.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE has an enlarged advertisement in this paper, and is prospering encouragingly. We have not room this week to notice it as we wish.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF LOUISIANA.

The closing exercises of the session of 1858–59 of the Medical Department of the University of Louisiana took place at the Academy Hall on Saturday.

After the opening overture, Dr. Hunt called over the names of the graduates, who rose one by one until the whole number were standing, when by "authority of the State, under the seal of the University of Louisiana, and by the power vested in him as Dean of the College by the Faculty of the Medical Department," he conferred the degrees of Doctor of Medicine on the following gentlemen:

Cornelius F. O'Neil, John G. Mestayer, John F. Moodie, A. Stewart, Benjamin B. Barnett, Edmond H. Fournier, C. Callaway, Thomas H. Lanier, James W. Talbert, Charles Turleton, Harry Percy, Geo. O. Brounham, John S. Goodman, John J. Roberts, David J. Smith, James P. Ever, Alexander P. Brede, Patrick H. Griffin, Francis M. Trezevant, Joab B. Speara, Lewis H. Hill, Pinkney D. Chrisman, James M. Owens, Richard L. Dunn, John J. Lyons, Sheldon Stiles, William Offat, John H. Davis, Calvin U. Silliman, James Knowles, James W. Wingate, James H. McDonald, George Monroe, Wiley P. Smith, John S. Stevens, Samuel A. Hill, Randall Pope, Alexander P. Hall, John B. P. Johnston, Zachariah J. Scott, John M. Morrison, Augustus H. Moore, James C. Fox, William A. Walton, Charles D. Lewis, Charles G. Cowon, W. H. Kilpatrick, James E. Reeves, John D. Smith, Peter L. Redmond, John W. Cothran, Isaiah G. W. Steedman, Elisha Harris, Alfred G. Tobault, Alexander T. Howe, David P. Mecham, Samuel R. Davis, James M. Quinney, Peter Taylor, W. Bennett, Virgil V. Madden, Lucius L. Holcombe, Wiley J. Barron, William P. Finley, Thomas Gaildis, William L. Jones, David B. Turner, William P. Powell, James M. Haynes, D. S. Chesser, William D. Jennings, John P. De Jarnette, Robert F. Wade, Thomas H. Castleton, *Augusto Leicher, James Moore, William T. Haddox, Charles M. Erwin, James A. Smith, Samuel Meeker, James W. Oswald, Henry Snow, Edward C. Charles E. Buck, Joseph Stevens, James Burns, Rufus H. Prateu, Numa Lambert, William M. Mercer, James W. Saunders, Murtin D. Murgan, John I. Oatis, Andrew W. Smyth, Samuel Murphy, William W. Leggett, Ebenezer M. Smalley.

After conferring the degrees, the Dean addressed the graduating class a most eloquent charge, delivered in a very earnest and impressive manner, which they must carry in their hearts as the professional benediction of their chief preceptor in science which they profess. He congratulated them upon the attainment of the high and honorable testimony to their proficiency, which had just been conferred upon them, as the alumni of the University of Louisiana. He referred to the circumstances of theirs being the largest class it had ever graduated; and of its great and increasing prosperity, the number of matriculates at this session being three hundred and thirty-three, and from all the Southern and Southwestern States of the Union which now send their sons to New Orleans for instruction in the most important of the sciences. The great body of the respectable physicians of the South was now composed of the graduates of this college; at none other, even in the world, had the student such general advantages, aside from the circumstances of its location making him familiar with those Southern diseases, which, as a physician in Southern practice, it would be his province to treat.

What rendered the advantages of this college so great was the opportunities afforded by the Charity Hospital for study of diseases. At this institution an average of seven hundred patients were under treatment; these the students could visit, examine, and converse with, which they are not allowed to do at any other college; elsewhere they could walk the wards of a hospital, but did not dare to lay a hand upon a subject. As a result of the operations of this college, and the benefits arising from students becoming familiar here with peculiar diseases of the South, statistics show a falling off in mortality of slave plantations of one-half within less than a score of years.

models representing diseases of the eye and of the skin; specimens of urinary and biliary calculi, from Dupuytren's museum, Paris, from London, and prepared at the college; fossil remains, skeletons and parts of skeletons of beasts, Egyptian mummies, etc. It is a peculiar and most instructive and interesting entertainment to stroll through this museum of the parts and fragments of parts of physical humanity—some of them representing healthy nature, and others the progress, ravages and distortions of diseases and other causes.

We conclude our "passing through college" by a visit to the dissecting rooms—the hitter end of an otherwise agreeable perambulation, for we were a visitor to that haunt of horrors whose professional duty it was not to look upon the surroundings with the eyes of science, but only with the vision of humanity. There was nothing awful to be seen in the light, airy rooms but a few skeletons, parts of skeletons, preserved limbs, and a long row of tables like those in a butcher's shambles, ranged on the sides of the rooms, the floors of which are water tight and slope to a gutter in the middle, which carries off the fluids. We regarded these tables with interest when informed that there lay upon them at one time during the past session, the bodies of thirty dead men, which one hundred live men, students of the college, were busily engaged in dissecting—cutting up in the cause of science. A rare picture, that—a hundred men at work with flashing knives and instruments in the flare of gas-light upon thirty stark, staring, stiff, white corpses! No college in the country affords such advantages for the study of surgery, etc., as this. Proper subjects can always be obtained. [Crescent.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

Arrival of the Weser and Asia.

NEW YORK, March 19.—The steamship Weser, which left Cork on the 6th inst., arrived at this port yesterday, bringing advices from London and Liverpool to the evening of Saturday, the 5th inst. Her news is four days later than we had by the City of Washington.

The Canard steamship Asia, Capt. Lott, has also arrived at this port with Liverpool dates to the morning of the 5th inst., anticipated by the Weser.

General and Political News.—The political news generally more warlike in its character. There is less confidence manifested in England in the success of Lord Cowley's mission to Vienna to attempt a conciliation of the difficulties between Austria and France. The Paris and Vienna journals, and the numerous letters to the press of England and other portions of Europe, from France and Austria, are quite belligerent in their tone, and the war spirit is growing stronger in Austria and Italy. It is reported that Austria, upon receiving the proposition of England as a basis for a settlement of the Italian question made a counter proposition to Lord Cowley in which Austria is supported by the Prussian Government.

Warlike Preparations.—The warlike preparations at Marseilles have been slightly relaxed within a few days, but in other ports of France no abatement of the formidable preparations is reported. In Italy, the military and warlike preparations are continued with unabated vigor.

War feeling in Austria.—The Emperor of Austria is becoming more warlike in his tone and bearing, having become much embittered against France, on account of Napoleon's assumption of the right to interfere in the affairs of Italy, which Austria arrogates exclusively to herself. The Vienna journals assume a decidedly warlike tone, and the war fever is increasing in Austria and the German States.

Later from India.—Liverpool, March 5.—Later advices from India and China have been received in England, which confirm the previous accounts of the termination of the campaign in Oude. A formal declaration to the effect that the revolution in Oude was at an end, had been made by Sir Colin Campbell, the Commander-in-Chief of the British army. The British troops had entered the province of Nepaul, and commenced a campaign to reduce the fugitive rebels in that section to submission.

Parliamentary Reform.—The members of the Liberal party in the British Parliament propose to unite against the reform bill presented to Parliament by the Government.

LONDON, March 5.—The British Cabinet.—Viscount Harding has withdrawn from the Cabinet, and others are reported as on eve of withdrawal. Lord Lennox has withdrawn from the Treasury.

The French Budget.—The French Budget has been called up in the committee of the Legislative body. The committee declared by a vote of ten to four that they could not examine a peace budget in the presence of warlike demonstrations on every side, and resolved to await an explanation from the Government.

Military Movements in Russia.—Russia has an army of 60,000 men on the left bank of the Pruth, and has considerably augmented her Georgian army.

Disagreement of the French Ministry.—One of the Paris journals reported that a serious disagreement and an angry conversation had taken place between Prince Napoleon and Count Persigny, upon the Italian question. The Moniteur contradicts the report, while assurances that no such conversation took place.

Mails by the Arabia.

The War Question in Europe.—We fear that war is inevitable. Everything foreshadows it. The only hope is that the visit of Lord Cowley to Vienna may be attended with a happy issue, but the chances seem the other way. Louis Napoleon appears determined to push matters to the last extremity—to peril his throne and his dynasty on the result. Hitherto we have given Louis Napoleon credit for being a shrewd, cautious, wily man, who having by a series of unprecedented successes reached the throne of France, was not likely to forfeit the prize by illjudged caprice; but we have evidently mistaken his character, as those most intimate with him have. He has long been brooding over the project which he is now bent upon carrying into execution, and the immense preparations which for months past he has been making for the onslaught, prove conclusively that his mind has been occupied with what his lips dare not avow. He palters even with his friends in a double sense; he keeps the word of promise to their ear, but breaks it to their hope. If any man knew his intentions, Lord Palmerston, we should have thought was the man. He sacrificed the position of First Minister under the Crown for his sake—he was the first to sympathize with his overthrow of the Republic. But no one is more surprised than Lord Palmerston at the course which his Imperial client is pursuing. The actions of a man of this kind baffle all calculation. Visions of military glory flit before his heated imagination, and he is impressed with the idea that to him is confided the task of remodelling the map of Europe. We receive, therefore, without distrust, the statement that he will take the field in person, with Canrobert for his subaltern, and the probability is that we are on the verge of a war the direst and most bloody which has ever stained the annals of modern Europe. There is one slight satisfaction, one gleam of sunshine in the dark picture—it cannot last long. Fortunately, modern lustruments of warfare are so destructive that the strife cannot, as of yore, be protracted for twenty or thirty years.

[Liverpool Times, Feb. 26.

The hope of protracted peace grows every hour less. The news to-day strengthens the adverse news of yesterday. France is energetic in preparing for an expedition to Italy, or perhaps to some other place. It is among the feints of despotism to look one way and row another. Great Britain may not be safe. People think Louis Napoleon not quite sane, and few things are more to be dreaded than the unscrupulous cunning of a madman. [Liverpool Post, Feb. 25.

Austria.—Vienna, Feb. 22—The Agram Zeitung, an official paper, thus confirms information which was contained in my letter of the 13th inst.: "The Austrian Government has expressed its readiness to recommend administrative reforms to the Papal Government, but will never, even if a war should result from its refusal, co-operate in an attempt to enforce the execution of such reforms. In regard to the occupation of the Papal dominions, the Imperial Government has declared that it will withdraw its troops from Bologna and Ancona at the same moment that the French quit Rome and Civita Vecchia. The right of garrison in Commachia Ferrara, and Piacenza, which is secured to Austria by treaty, will be maintained."

The French Government, or rather the Emperor Napoleon, considers the foregoing conditions unacceptable; but this Cabinet is by no means likely to make any other. During the last few days the policy of Austria has undergone a change. Count Buol was strongly urged by the representatives of England and Prussia to avoid giving the Emperor Napoleon a pretext for going to war, that he was much more submissive than was agreeable to the Emperor Francis Joseph, who is resolved not to bear any part of the yoke which Louis Napoleon is trying to impose upon his brother Sovereigns. "His Majesty's views," says a perfectly well informed person, "may be expressed in a few words. For the sake of peace he is ready and willing to make any concessions which are consistent with his honor and dignity, but he will not recognize the claim of the Emperor of the French to be considered sole arbiter in all European questions of importance. His Majesty is of opinion that one Power has no right to put a constraint on the will of another, and he therefore declines to force the Papal Government to make those reforms which are considered necessary. Austria will not permit any one to meddle in her internal affairs, and she will scrupulously abstain from interfering with those of other powers." I hear to-day that the question of occupation is in a fair way to be settled, the Papal Government having expressed to the Paris and Vienna Cabinets its wish that the French and Austrian troops should be withdrawn within a given period. For some time past councils of war, at which the Emperor presided, have been held here, and yesterday matters of the highest importance were definitively settled. If the Emperor Napoleon should think fit to join Sardinia in an attack on Austria, which Heaven forbid! he will find Austria prepared for defense, and her troops full of confidence. For the moment Austria will hold her peace, but any decidedly hostile movement on the part of France would hardly fail to lead to an imperial manifesto.

DOMESTIC.

NEW YORK, March 18.—The Coroner's jury have held an Inquest over the body of Mike Walsh, and have given as their verdict that he died of apoplexy.

The New York Tribune's Washington correspondent says that Gen. Walker's departure for California is connected with a new filibustering expedition against Nicaragua from the Pacific side.

The correspondent believes General Walker will be joined by General Henningsen with his emigrants from Arizona.

WASHINGTON, March 18.—The balance in the Treasury is now $7,000,000, but much of this amount is derived from the recent ten million loan.

WASHINGTON, March 19.—All the special mail agencies, seventeen in number, have been discontinued.

The order of the Post-office Department, granting extra compensation of postages, affecting about eighty Postmasters, has been revoked.

There was a considerable fall of snow here last night, and it is feared that the fruit is killed.

WASHINGTON, March 21.—Senor Mota, the representative of the Juarez Government in Mexico, left Washington to-day for New Orleans, on his way to Vera Cruz. The trial of Dan'l E. Sickles for the murder of P. H. Key, is to commence on the 28th inst. Gen. Geo. P. Morris, senior editor and proprietor of the Home Journal, has been appointed Consul to Havre.

No Extra Session.—The President has decided not to call an extra session of Congress, unless some urgent contingency besides that of the Postoffice deficiency arises. The Cabinet fully concur in this decision.

VICKSBURG, March 21. Extensive Crevasse above Vicksburg. The steamer Vicksburg, from Memphis, reports the water at a stand at many points above here. The crevasses previously reported at Cammack's Landing and at Brunswick, are very large, and the water is rushing through rapidly. There are two small crevasses near Ashton, and one at Carolina Landing, all on the left bank or Mississippi side of the river. Passengers by the Victoria report that the Levee is broken at McNeel's place, at Colonia, at Mrs. Crenshaw's, at Bolivar, at Prentiss, and at a place near Greenville. The water has fallen eight inches at Providence. The new levees at Point Lookout and at Hegaman are pronounced to be perfectly secure. At Tennessee Landing the river has fallen seven inches during the last 24 hours, caused probably by the numerous crevasses below. No breaks are reported on the Louisiana side of the river.

ST. LOUIS, March 21.—The Mississippi at this point has risen ten inches during the last 24 hours, and is still swelling rapidly. The Upper Mississippi, at St. Paul, is also rising rapidly. Lake Pepin is still closed.

HARTFORD, Ct., March, 21.—Great Freshet in the Connecticut River.—There is a great freshet in the Connecticut river. The water is now twenty-four feet above low water mark and still rising. The lower part of the city nearest to the river is all under water.

At Springfield Mass., the river is twenty feet above low water mark, and all the meadow lands between Springfield and Hartford are overflown.

SAVANNAH, Ga. March 21.—Another British Outrage.—A letter received in this city, (via Baltimore and Louisville,) from the Postmaster at Apalachicola, says that the American bark E. A. Rawlins has been seized by the British war steamer Virgo, on suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade. The Postmaster reports that the bark was taken while in St. Joseph's Bay.

DETROIT, MICH., March 21.—The Great Western Railway Accident.—By the accident on the Great Western Railroad, near Hamilton, on Friday night, five persons were killed and thirteen seriously wounded. The whole train, with the exception of the last car, was plunged into a chasm fifty feet deep, which had been washed out by the heavy rains, carrying away the track for some distance. None of the killed or injured passengers are from the South.

NEW YORK, March 21.—Outbreak in Venezuela.—Later advices from Venezuela have been received by an arrival at this port, which represent that serious disturbances had taken place in the interior of that country. A serious outbreak had occurred at Coro of so threatening and formidable a character as to render it necessary to send for troops from Porto Bello to aid in quelling the revolt.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, March 22, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 19th inst.:

The operations of our markets have been considerably interfered with by rainy weather within the past week, but the aggregate business in our leading staples has reached a fair extent nevertheless. The demand for Cotton, it will be seen, has received an impulse within the past few days from favorable European advices, and Sugar and Molasses have gone off more freely at somewhat better prices, though in Tobacco the movement has been somewhat less active, and only a moderate business has been done in the various articles of Western Produce.

.....The City of Washington's advices, three days later from Europe, were received on Wednesday morning, reporting an advance of ⅛ to 3-16d. in the Liverpool cotton market, with sales for three days of 32,000 bales, Middling Orleans being quoted at 7¼ to 7¼d. The Manchester advices were favorable, but political matters were still in a very unsettled and uncertain state.

.....The river continues to rise, and is now barely one foot below high-water mark.

COTTON.—With unfavorable weather, a poor assortment on sale, and very full prices generally claimed, operations in the early part of the week were comparatively limited, the sales of the first three days of the week, having been confined to about 14,000 bales. On Wednesday the favorable accounts from Europe gave an active impulse to the demand, which notwithstanding unfavorable weather, resulted in fully 17,500 bales. On Thursday the weather was still more unfavorable, particularly in the early part of the day, and with a reduced supply of desirable lists, full prices claimed, and but a moderate attendance of buyers, the business was quite limited, the sales barely reaching 3000 bales. Yesterday the weather was of a highly favorable character for business, but with a large amount of previous purchases to receive, (in which there is much delay and annoyance, owing to the crowded state of the presses) and later European advices being about due by the regular weekly steamer, buyers hold off, and the market wore a rather quiet appearance, though there were sales effected to the extent of about 9,500 bales; thus making a total for the past three days of 30,000 bales; and for the whole of the week, 44,000 bales; the receipts, during same period, 37,772; and the exports 61,120 bales. Stock, in Presses and on ship-board, not cleared on 18th inst. 465,031 bales. With respect to prices, we have to remark that in the active and somewhat excited demand which we have noticed as having prevailed on Wednesday, the closing rates indicating an advance of about ⅛c. in the Middling grades, and though since then very full prices have generally been demanded no further marked advance appears to have been realized.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN BOOKS.

Whenever we see a good thing we like to circulate it, to-wit:—

"Mind your Own Business, is an old injuction which cannot be too scrupulously observed. Especially would we urge it upon our Church in regard to our publishing interests. The time was when we had to depend upon others for our religious literature, not having a book or paper in the land that we could call our own. But our circumstances have changed; we now have an ample supply of weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies, the largest list of general religious reading books and Sunday-school books printed in this (Southern) country, many of which have reached to an almost unparalleled circulation. Besides we have multiplied greatly in our numbers and wealth. Only let us purchase, read and circulate the books of our own press first, and as largely as they deserve, and we shall extend our achievements beyond the highest expectations of the most believing ones among us. Scarcely a day passes which does not reveal some new success of our press. Let us be of good cheer then, and push on in our "great work;" rejoicing always and heartily in the great good being done by others, but attending faithfully to the peculiar work which God in his wise providence has assigned to us."

A NEWSPAPER WANTED.—A correspondent from Washington county, Mississippi, writes that a newspaper is much needed in that country, and that any one starting one there can make it profitable, as neither of the adjoining counties has a paper, and there is much legal advertising to be done in each, all of which could be had by a paper published in Washington county, together with a sufficient number of subscribers.

The above we clip from an exchange, for the purpose of saying that the New Orleans Christian Advocate office has for sale all the type and other materials necessary for the establishment of such a paper, at a low price. Apply soon.

NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

All the Books Published by the Church, South—that is, the Books in the FIRST PART of the Catalogue issued at Nashville—we have, and sell at NASHVILLE PRICES. Of the SECOND PART, we have only the following Books, which we sell at the prices annexed, less 20 per cent. on time, and 25 per cent. for cash.

Of these Books we have not time now to speak particularly. Suffice it at present to mention "Bledsoe's Theodicy" at $1 50, and in Turkey at $2—the greatest thunderbolt forged against Calvinism in three centuries. It has proved itself exceedingly troublesome to all of that faith; in fact, as "horrible" to them as the Decree was to Calvin.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

Woodpecker's Tongue.

"The woodpecker taps the hollow beech-tree." Tap, tap, tap, tap, rap, rap. "How it echoes through the still woods," said a little boy strolling in the woods, and every now and then hearing the tap, tap, tap, and rap, rap, rap, of the hard working little bird. "What 's he doing it for, I wonder?"

"He 's getting his breakfast. He lives on the worms and insects which inhabit old trees. First, he taps at the tree, to find out if it 's hollow; then he drills a hole in it, rap, rap, rap, until he comes to the worms, then he darts his long tongue into their cozy nest, and hooks them out into his mouth. There is the bill hard and sharp, which he taps and drills with. There is his long tongue, with a sharp, bony thorn at the end of it, covered with something like teeth turned backward to keep fast hold of the worms. It is three or four inches long, and is a tool well made for his work; is it not? Woodpeckers would make great havoc with the worms which infest and destroy fruit-trees, if we would invite them to our gardens, and not frighten them off with our fowling-pieces."

"Besides getting his breakfast with his bill, he builds his nest with it in the same way; that is, he bores out a hole in the soft cotton wood, lines it with a blanket of moss, and the mother-bird lays her eggs. The woodpecker's mouth is certainly a very curious tool, exactly fitted to the work it has to do. Did the woodpecker invent it himself, do you suppose, as men invent their tools?"

"No, no," the little boy answers. "God, himself, contrived it. He makes all the different mouths his creatures have: and oh, they are so different." I am sure we can say with good King David, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all." Childs Paper.

Downward.

A writer in a morning paper states that in the Winter of 1854-5, four young bank clerks used to meet for euchre-playing alternately at their residences in Brooklyn. These meetings continued pleasantly for a while. The party keeping early hours, and no gambling being allowed. A year later the party was not re-organized but met accidentally on Christmas eve, at a raffle in Brooklyn. The downward path was already entered upon. The results sum up as follows: One of the young men is travelling in Europe, his bondsmen have paid $3000 for him, in which sum he was in default at the bank where he was employed. Another is in Sing Sing prison for forgery. The third is Oscar B. Field, the recent defaulter in Brooklyn, and now wandering with the mark of Cain upon his brow—the murderer of his own peace and of the happiness of his family. The fourth commences these words and concludes his story thus:

"And as the latter casts a glance over the past, a shudder creeps through his frame as he thinks over the fate of his companions, and thanks a merciful God that saved him from the abyss into which he had almost plunged himself."

"There were other bank clerks among the party, and ere long their defalcations must come to light, for they have been possessed of sums which they could not have come by honestly."

A Blind Girl.

A little girl had been attacked with sudden pain in the head, which ended in blindness. She was taken to an eminent oculist, who pronounced her incurable. She wished to know what the doctor said about her state, and her mother told her. "What! mother," exclaimed the child, "and am I never more to see the sun, nor the beautiful fields, nor you my dear mother, nor my father, O! how shall I bear it?" She wrung her hands, and wept bitterly. Nothing seemed to yield her the slightest comfort, till her mother, taking a pocket Bible from the table, placed it in her hands. "What is this, mother?" inquired the disconsolate little girl. "It is the Bible, my child." Immediately a more of its most consolatory passages presented themselves to her mind. She paused, turned her poor benighted eyeballs toward the ceiling, while an angelic expression played on her countenance, and then, as if filled with the Holy Spirit, breathed forth in an impassioned but scarcely audible whisper—" Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven." Such was the wonder-working power of that blessed Book.

Early Piety.

Rev. Dr. Plumer has been publishing in the New York Observer, some excellent letters on early piety. In his last letter he says: "One excellent and judicious brother of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, a few months since received forty children into full communion on a profession of their faith. I trust others will have a good excuse for doing similar acts of love."

Humorous.

A Story of Lord Rosse.

The following is narrated of the celebrated scientific earl, who is said to be as much at home in a machine-shop as in St. Stephen's.

When Lord Oxmantown, he represented King's county in Parliament, and, when attending his duties in London, would sometimes escape from a dull debate to the forges of Birmingham, or the ship-building yards of Blackwall.

Some standing circumstances occurred during these incognito visits. His lordship is a strong-built, mechanical looking man, and many a time has a brother operative, in admiration of his ability, pressed a pot of porter upon him. It is even said that he once or twice shared the honest pewter on such occasions with the celebrated engineer, sooner than part with a clear-headed benefactor, to him. One anecdote is well authenticated. He was at one manufactory—the name I have heard but have forgotten. In walking through the works, he met with the principal, who, finding him well versed in the subject, and taking him for a practical man, explained some improvements he was about to make. His lordship discovered a fallacy in the plan, and predicted that it would fail; but the other was confident in his calculations, and so they parted. Some time afterwards when his lordship was walking in the House of Commons, he was accosted in the street by one who turned out to be his too confident acquaintance, and who said—"I have often, since we last met, wished to see you; you are right, I was wrong; and I am going to make you an offer; my engineering foreman is going to leave me, and if you will come down and construct the trunk your own way, I will give you a post."

"I am much obliged," replied his lordship, "but could not accept your offer without consulting my father."—"One would think you were old enough," said the other with some scorn, "to be out of leading-strings. And when can you hear from your daddy?"

"I can give you an answer at once," said Lord Oxmantown, who now his father, the then Earl of Rosse, approaching. When the latter came up, he was informed of the offer, and entering into the joke, said he was quite willing his son should accept the post if it did not interfere with his Parliamentary duties. "And who the deuce is he? and who are you, old gentleman?" roughly demanded the Brummagem. "I am Earl Rosse," was the reply, "and this is Lord Oxmantown." Eventually the latter consented to look down for a few days in Warwickshire, and give his friend the benefit of his best advice, which ended, this time, in the thoroughly successful completion of the improvement in hand. Pay Promptly.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

THE DEBT PAPER.

"John, what has become of last week's paper?" inquired Mrs. C——, of her husband.

"Surely, wife, I cannot tell; it was brought from the office, I think."

"Yes, James brought it home on Thursday evening; but neighbor M—— and his wife being here, he laid it on the parlor table."

"Oh, M—— has got the paper, I remember now lending it to him."

"I am sorry for that; I think you do very wrong, husband, in lending the papers before we have read them. He who takes a paper and pays for it, is certainly entitled to the first perusal of it.

"I know it, wife, but neighbor M—— do a't take a paper, and I can't refuse, when he asks to borrow ours."

"Do n't M—— take a paper?" inquired Mrs. C——, with surprise.

"No."

"Why not? he is, as he says, always very fond of reading."

"Yes, but he seems to think himself unable to take one."

"Unable! He is certainly as able as we are. He pays a much larger tax, and is almost always bragging of his superior cattle and ——"

"Hush, wife! It is wrong to speak of our neighbor's faults behind their backs. He promised to return the paper to-day."

"I hope he will. It contains an excellent article, which I desire very much to read."

Mrs. C—— was an excellent lady, and probably possessed as liberal feelings as her peace-loving husband; but she could not believe it to be their duty to furnish a free paper to their more wealthy and covetous neighbor.

M—— had formerly taken a paper; but thinking it too expensive, to the no small discomfiture of his wife and little ones, he had ordered its discontinuance. He, however, dearly loved to read, and had for a year or more, been in the habit of sending "Little Joe" on the disagreeable errand of borrowing old papers from his neighbors.

The next morning, after breakfast, she was heard to say—

"Well, John, the paper has not been returned yet."

"Ah, indeed! I guess neighbor N—— has either forgotten his promise or is absent from home," replied C——.

"I think," she continued, "we had better send James after it."

"Would it not be best, wife, to wait until afternoon? N—— may return it before that time."

"As you think best," was the reply.

They waited until nearly dark, but no paper made its appearance. James, a smart lad of ten years, was now instructed to proceed to neighbor N——'s and get the paper. He soon arrived and made known his errand. He was very politely informed that it was lent to R——, the blacksmith—who lived half a mile further on. James, unwilling to return home without it, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, continued on to the blacksmith's.

It was quite dark when he arrived, but he soon made his business known, and was informed by Mrs. R—— that "little Sis got hold of the paper and tore it up."

"I'll take the fragments," said James, who was for having nothing lost.

"The fragments, Jim!" exclaimed Mrs. R——, "Old Donk, the pedlar, came along here to-day, and I sold 'em with the rags."

James, somewhat dispirited by his unsuccessful mission, and not being very courageous in the dark, silently beat a hasty retreat for home; where in due season he arrived, and reported the result of his errand.

"Ah," very composedly remarked Mr. C——, "I suppose R—— asked neighbor N—— to lend him the paper, and he did not like to deny him. We cannot, I think, accuse either of doing intentional wrong; and one paper," continued he, "is of little value."

"You may argue, N——'s case as you please," replied Mrs. C——, "but be assured of one thing."

"What is that?" asked Mr. C—— with evident fear.

"Nothing, only neighbor N—— will not long be at the inconvenience of troubling people for old papers."

In about three weeks after this conversation, N—— was informed by the postmaster that he had a paper in the office. He was highly pleased at this announcement, but could not think who was so very kind as to send him a paper. After many conjectures, however, he came to the conclusion that it was some friend whom he had assisted in former years.

One year had passed; the paper continued to come, and N—— was still ignorant whence it came; but one day at a "hauling," he informed his neighbors of his good fortune, and expressed some fears that he would have to do without a paper soon.

"No, you shan't," said James C—— in a loud tone of voice, "for mother sent on two dollars for you last week."

"Well done, Jim," shouted a dozen voices, while a simultaneous roar of laughter ran along the line of teamsters.

N—— who had previous to this announcement been remarkably cheerful and talkative, became suddenly silent, while a deep red color, the emblem of shame, mantled his brow. This was a good lesson to N——.

Early next morning he went and paid Mrs. C—— the four dollars, acknowledged his error, and was never known afterwards to take less than two weekly papers.

LINES on the Death of the Children of E. T. and E. GLENN, of Auburn, Alabama.

LAID THEM IN THE TOMB.

Four lovely buds have grac'd our family tree—
There's but one left. O, tell, where are the three
That gave bright promise of their future bloom?
Friends sadly whisper—" laid them in the tomb;
Gone—gone!" My heart the echo loudly knells:
While Misery, companion-like, now dwells
Where all was sunshine once. Not so, to-day—
I miss the well-known steps, and sounds of play,
The laugh of merry wildness, kisses dear,
Their fairy forms that ever flitted near.

Consoling Sleep, alone doth lay its spell—
Its cheating dreams doth picture all; as well.
No longer, in the tombs there seem to lay
Stiff little forms; but nimble, in their play
Their little hands well-laden, to me bring
Wild flowers, the children of the Spring;
Their prattling tongues again doth bid me note
The gushing music from some warblers throat.
Awak'ning, breaks the spell; 'twas but a dream;
Yet, for a moment, it did so real seem.

One left of four! Let's try and thankful be—
Mayhap this bud may ripen on the tree.
Then let us kiss the chastening rod, Divine,
The welling complaints of the heart confine,
'Tis true, we've eyes; but never can we see
One little moment of Futurity!
We know not but a few more hours on earth,
A life of sorrow may have given birth;
Then, Heavenly Father, may we ever feel
That all things always happen for our weal. REVILO.

SLATTERNLY WOMEN.

FANNY FERN never said a truer thing, than when she said the following: "Chiefest of all subluinary abominations, is a slatternly woman. I blame no man who rushes from a house whose mistress habitually, and through choice, pours out his coffee in curl-paper or tumbled hair, dingy, collarless morning gown, and slip-shod feet. If there is any time when a woman looks prettier than at any hour in the twenty-four, it is in a neat breakfast robe, (calico, if you will, provided it fit well, and the color be well chosen;) and if there is a time when a plain woman comes nearest to being handsome, it is in this same loveable, domestic dress. I will maintain that the coffee and eggs taste better, and that the husband goes more smilingly and hopefully to his day's task, after helping such a wife to bread and butter. I could never comprehend the female slattern—thank heaven! there are but few of them; or understand how a woman, though she had no eye to please but her own, should not be scrupulously neat in all the different strata of her apparel; and certainly in these days, when noomnibus can drive up to a ferry-house, without encountering an expectant bodyguard of male uncle connoisseurs, waiting to see hurried ladies alight, who shall say that a trim gaiter-boot or nicely fitting stocking, wastes its trimness, or is unappreciated?

"I repeat it. I blame no man for rushing in disgust from a house whose mistress is a slattern; who never pays her husband the compliment to look decent in her person or in her house, unless company is expected; who reserves her yawns and old dresses for her husband, and strikes an attitude for his male friends."

MARRYING COUSINS.

It has been ascertained by careful investigation into the influence of marriages of consanguinity upon offspring, that over ten per cent. of the blind, and nearly fifteen per cent. of the idiotic, in the various State institutions, for the subject of their defects are the offspring of kindred parents. And making an estimate based upon the best ascertained data, there would be found to the twenty millions of white inhabitants in the United States, six thousand three hundred and twenty-one marriages of cousins, giving birth to three thousand nine hundred and nine deaf and dumb, blind, idiotic and insane, distributing as follows:

Deaf and dumb, 1116; idiotic, 1864; insane, 299. Then if the figures of the last United States census be still applied to our population, there would be found in the Union 8136 deaf and dumb; of whom, 1116, or 11.8 per cent. are children of cousins; 7078 blind, of whom, 649 or 08.1 per cent. are children of cousins; 14,257 idiotic, of whom, 1844 or 1.20 per cent. are children of cousins; 14,973 insane, of whom 299 or 0.10 per cent. are children of cousins. Boston Post.

HOW TO KNOW GOOD FATHERS.

It is a good sign and true, when you see amid a little group of boys, one dart from the rest, and tossing his arms above his head, shout, "There 's my father!" as he runs to meet him. You may be sure, no matter what business troubles soever that man may have, that there is a spot in his heart still fresh and green, which the cares of the world have had no power to blight. "There 's my father!" With what a pretty pride the fellow shouts this! He must be indeed a brute, whose fatherly heart does not swell with love, whose eyes do not glisten, who does not at such a moment, feel amply repaid for that day's toil, no matter how wearisome. After all, Love is the only thing worth having in this world. They who stand over new made graves tell us so. Fame and money, and ambition, dwindle to nothing beside the white, calm brow of death, though God knows it may be but the youngling of the flock, whose lips have never learned to splinkle our name. [N. Y. Ledger.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

THE REV. JOSEPH H. PHELAN, formerly of the Alabama Conference, died at Rockford, Alabama, February 17, 1859. The news of his death will give sorrow to many a heart. When I was stationed in Tuskaloosa, in 1844, brother P. resided in that city. He was then in the practice of law, and was one of the most consistent members of the Church in that station. A very cordial friendship between us was then formed—and continued to the end of his sojourn on earth, and, by God's grace, shall be renewed in heaven. His excellent and sorrow-stricken widow wishes me, as an intimate friend of her departed husband, to furnish a memoir of him for the Advocates. This melancholy task is easily performed, as she has not only furnished the material, but also put it in a form which requires but little labor to prepare it for the press. She writes: "The Rev. Joseph H. Phelan was born in Richmond, Virginia, in the year 1818. His boyhood was spent in and around Huntsville, Alabama, and his manhood, in early life, in Tuskaloosa and Marion, where he practiced law. When he felt he was called to preach Christ to his dying fellow men, he, without a murmur, gave up all worldly ambitions—refused honors, which he might so gracefully have worn, and was content to fight the battles of his Redeemer. He joined the Alabama Conference, in Tuskaloosa, January, 1847; remained a member of that body four years, and would have 'died in the work,' had not a bronchial disease forced him to seek a less laborious field of labor. He served the State several years very efficiently, and gained the love and esteem of all who knew him, by his consistant course as a Christian and his urbane manner to all. His was a noble and beautiful soul; and I can truly say that he was as near guiltless as any one in the flesh can be. He professed Christ at the age of fifteen, and has never been known to swerve once in his purpose. Prayer and thankfulness were ever on his lips, and from his heart he preached the truths of the gospel. He was a man of rare gifts: his every thought was a gem. During the last ten days of his life he enjoyed one continual feast of love, peace, hope, and joy unspeakable: In truth, a continual unfolding of God's glories was visible for days before the spirit fled. Among other requests he made was this, that I should not think of him, after his departure, as being in the grave, but as one of a band of angels, flying from world to world, wearing the conqueror's crown, and waving the palm of victory amid the white-robed ones of the Redeemer's kingdom. The song of triumph, in the Christian conqueror's mouth, is very beautiful. Truly, the grave can claim no victory—the sting of death is naught! No wife, bereft of a husband, has ever had more to console and soothe than I have; yet, there never was a husband more deeply mourned for. He was everything that the heart of woman could ask. He most beautifully adorned the home-circle: there his virtues shone forth, and there, as a father, husband, and friend—to know him was to love him, and to see him, praise. He leaves an aged mother, two brothers, and a host of friends, besides his heart-broken wife and three little boys, to mourn his loss. But he is not lost; for I am sure he is now an angel in Paradise, and, perchance, he has winged his way to earth, and is now hovering around me, pleased to see that I am so sincerely convinced that he is safe." Blessed religion, that inspires such hopes and imparts such consolations, in the time of bereavement and sorrow! I have nothing to add to this beautiful tribute of conjugal affection, except to beg pardon for making this use of a private letter. The sufferings of brother Phelan were severe and protracted, but he bore them with truly peace and triumph, realizing the truth of our poet's paradox:

"Jesus comes with my distress,
And agony is heaven!"

MRS. ELIZABETH CAROLINE LANEY, consort of Rev. James H. Laney, of the Mississippi Conference, died 8th March, 1859. Her affliction was short, only four days. Her disease, inflammation of the throat, by which she was deprived of speech, but, retained her proper mind to the last. Although she could not converse with her friends, she gave satisfactory evidence that she was going to her home in heaven. When she was cold and dying, she would raise her hands as high as she could, and articulate the word Heaven, plain enough to be understood by those near her. Her husband, being anxious for her to leave a bright evidence to her friends and children, said to her, if she felt Jesus precious to her soul, he wished her to manifest it by a kiss; she instantly, with her cold lips, kissed her husband in token of Victory. Our departed sister was a native of Georgia. Of her childhood and youth I know nothing. I became intimately acquainted with her about the year 1847; and from personal knowledge, I can truly say, she was a devoted wife, a kind and affectionate mother, and an indulgent mistress. She passed none by who needed her assistance. Her premature death was brought on by her assiduous attention to the sick. She possessed the pleasing art of bringing all around her under the influence of her happy spirit. She was admirably qualified to fill the position of an itinerant preacher's wife. When her husband would leave her to attend to his ministerial duties, she never said to him, "stay with me;" but rather "go, and preach a full and free salvation to a lost and dying world." She embraced religion at a camp-meeting in Georgia, about thirteen years ago. Of her conversion, we have heard her say she has never doubted. By her death, seven lovely children, all of tender age, are left to bewail the sad loss of a mother's love, and a mother's care. May kind heaven assist and protect our deeply afflicted brother, in this trying dispensation. F. A. LAMKIN.

MRS. SARAH S. WATKINS, wife of Rev. Dr. B. E. Watkins, died December 12, 1858, in Coosa county, Alabama, in her 54th year. She was the daughter of John and Nancy Berry, born in Whitley county, Kentucky, July 6th, 1805, obtained religion at 12 years of age, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. She removed to Alabama. She kept the faith from her conversion, and rejoiced amid the sufferings of that painful disease, (Cancer) of which she died. Her sufferings were painfully protracted, being confined to her bed the last eighteen months of her life—yet she murmured not. Being often asked about her religious state—her reply always was, "My confidence is in my Savior. My trust is where it has always been." About eight days before her death, she said her way was clear. She exhorted visiting friends to be faithful. Her last and expiring words were for her husband, children and friends to meet her in heaven.

ROBERT AQUILA, son of Dr. H. L. and Mary Densler, died Feb. 20, 1859, near Burnsville, Dallas county, Alabama, in the 11th year of his age. Aquilla was an interesting little boy—the idol of his parents, and admired by all who knew him. His disposition was of the most sweet and placid nature—his manners were winning and pleasing, and his little soul was full of young tenderness. Though he was but a little boy, yet he bore his sufferings with manly patience, until at last as quietly and composedly as an infant sleeps, he passed away. And, now that life's sorrows and sufferings are with him no more, he has reached his great reward in heaven. Yes, little Aquilla is now safely housed in the mansion of eternal bliss, and may this pleasing thought comfort the bereaved parents and console the brothers and sisters. K.

That once loved form, now cold and dead,
Each mournful thought employs;
We weep, our earthly comforts fled,
And wither'd all our joys.

Hope looks beyond the bounds of time,
When what we now deplore,
Shall rise in full immortal prime,
And bloom to fade no more.

MRS. NANCIE N. HURST, wife of Rev. W. W. Hurst, died in Sunflower county, Mississippi, on the 31st of January, aged 27 years. Sister Hurst was truly one of the "excellent of the earth," and though thus early called away it was not before she had "professed a good profession before many witnesses" and her Christian worth had come to be known and appreciated. At the age of fifteen she gave her heart to God and joined his Church. She sustained a Christian character worthy the "holy women" of old. On the near approach of death she testified "My confidence is in Christ, and I can fully trust Him;" and then without struggle or murmur, like the beloved disciple leaning on Jesus' breast she "Breathed her life out sweetly there."

THOMAS LOFFLIN, in the 31st year of his age, died in Covington county Mississippi, March 4, 1859. Bro. Loffin has been for some years a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and at the time of his death was a steward on Leaf-river Mission. He was ever ready to converse on the subject of religion, and join the company of the pious. During his last illness, his disease, typhoid fever, prevented him from conversing much, but that little gives a hope, that he was ready to give an account of his stewardship. J. BOYES.

FLORENCE NAPOLEON, infant son of A. H. and Elizabeth Carnes, aged one month and twenty days, died of erysipelas, February 29th, 1859, in Franklin county, Miss., after a long and severe illness. He now reposes in the arms of that blessed Savior, who hath said "Suffer little children to come unto me;" where all is joy and peace. ROBERT MCDONALD.

SARAH JANE, infant daughter of Isaac V. and Julia H. Enochs, aged twenty-four days, died after a brief illness of 14 hours, at her father's residence in Hinds county, Mississippi, on the 6th inst. "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not for of such is the kingdom of heaven;" is the language of one that spake as never man spake. ISAAC V. ENOCHS.

Importance of Agriculture.

In the Patent Office report for 1857, in an article on the "Progress of Agriculture in Russia, Prussia and the United States," by Dr. J. Browne, the writer lays down the proposition, that the growth, prosperity and wealth of nations, are primarily determined by the productive forces each country possesses within itself. He cites England, a commercial nation, to illustrate his position, by stating that her income tax shows that the net revenue of all her manufacturers and commerce, with all her personal capital, does not exceed two-thirds of the net revenue derived from her agriculture alone. This fact may be new to many. It serves to show in the strongest possible light, the importance of agriculture, since England, of all the nations of the globe derives most benefit from manufactures and commerce.

Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your precious may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, to the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]
Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, seven in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression on occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great mortification, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the inc

ARMINIANISM AND CALVINISM.

Of the Perseverance of the Saints.

CALVINISM teaches that, "they whom God hath accepted in his beloved, effectually called and sanctified by his Spirit, can neither totally nor finally fall away from the state of grace; but shall certainly persevere therein to the end, and be eternally saved."

That "this perseverance of the Saints depends not upon their own free will, but upon the immutability of the decree of election, flowing from the free and unchangeable love of God the Father; upon the efficacy of the merits, and intercessions of Jesus Christ—the abiding the Spirit, and of the law of God within them, and the nature of the covenant of grace—from all which ariseth the certainty and infallibility thereof."—Confession of Faith, pp., 95 and 96.

Calvinists assert that, "the perfections of God are strong arguments to prove the certain and infallible perseverance of the saints. God, as a being possessed of infinite love, faithfulness, wisdom and power, can hardly be supposed to suffer any of his people finally to fall into perdition. This would be a reflection on his attributes, and argue him to be worse than a common father of his family. His love to his people is unchangeable, and, therefore, they cannot be the objects of it at one time and not at another. His faithfulness to them and to his promises is not founded upon their merits, but upon his own will and goodness; this therefore cannot be violated. His wisdom foresees every obstacle in the way, and is capable of removing it and directing them in the right way. It would be a reflection on his wisdom after choosing a right end, if not to choose the right means to accomplish that end. His power is insuperable and is absolutely and perpetually displayed in their preservation and protection." Bucks Theological Dictionary—Article, Perseverance.

In our apprehension, this argument, if it prove any thing, proves too much. Let us see—God made man "in his own image and likeness," after the most glorious and perfect model in the universe—and pronounced him not only "good," but "very good." Now as God is the perfection of all intellectual and moral excellence—he must, by necessity of his nature, most love those of his creatures that most nearly approximate himself; he therefore approved of and loved his creature man; but God then as now was a "being possessed of infinite love—faithfulness, wisdom and power." Now we can say just as plausibly as the Calvinist (if we dared to be so irreverent) that if God permitted his innocent and happy creatures, made in his own image and likeness, to fall into sin and death; it "would be a reflection upon his attributes, and argue him to be worse than a common father." If this Calvinistic argument, deduced from the attributes of God, prove any thing—it also proves that man never could have fallen at all but, as man, most unquestionably has fallen, it clearly proves too much; and, therefore, for the purpose for which Calvinists employ it, proves nothing. This argument of the Calvinist not only proves nothing, and therefore is of no service to his cause, but it does him a sad disservice in that it saddles him with a difficulty which he knows not how to dispose of, to wit: if God does necessitate volitions, and infallibly keep a moral agent from sinning, why did he permit the introduction of moral evil at all? And as, according to their system, he could have done so, but in fact has not, is he not clearly responsible for its introduction into the universe. So it seems to an Arminian. But the Arminian who does not believe that holy volitions and actions are objects of arbitrary power, is trammelled with no such difficulty.

Let us consider the Arminian view of the perseverance of the saints. They believe "that the regenerate may lose true justifying faith, forfeit their state of grace, and die in their sins." The Arminian does not believe that it is necessary, or, as a general thing, that it is probable that believers will finally fall and be lost, but he believes that it is entirely possible; and, therefore, he sees the imperative need of watchfulness, prayer and diligence, in dependence on divine grace to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord. Hence, too, he sees the wisdom and the kindness of the warnings and exhortations, so frequent in the inspired word. But if, in the language of the confession, believers "can neither totally nor finally fall away from the state of grace," and if it "depends not upon their own free will but upon the immutability of the decree of election," Arminians are not able to appreciate the wisdom or the necessity of the exhortations and warnings of the Scripture, addressed as they certainly are to saints.—Neither can they, upon this hypothesis, see the need of saints giving "all diligence" to make their calling and election sure. Arminians are unable to see why saints should "fear" and "rejoice with trembling" if there is no danger, if they can neither totally nor finally fall away. Seeing their perseverance depends not upon their faithful diligence and reliance upon the grace of God, but upon "the immutability of the decree of election." Upon the Calvinistic hypothesis, it appears to Arminians, that the Holy Spirit has done a most unnecessary work in exhorting and warning saints to be faithful unto death. But as this would be irreverent, if not blasphemous, we prefer to question the dictum of Calvinism on this point—and reverently and devoutly to believe that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness—that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

VERITAS.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

GREAT FOREIGN PREACHERS.

THE PAPERS seem to teem with notices of certain ministers of the present day who are regarded as wonderful in the use of words or in the manner of their preaching, or something else that entitles them to great notoriety in consequence. I suppose that I am entitled to my opinion, also, which I here proceed to give you, in a sketch of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

I did not hear him preach nor see him while in Great Britain during the past year; but I met with many persons who both saw and heard him, many of whom I would consider as judges, both of preaching and of preachers. I also read all the sermons he delivered during the past Summer, a few days after he spoke them; and I am satisfied that his "greatness" in preaching must consist much more in a certain brusqueness or untowardness of manner in delivery, with an abandonment of the usual beaten path in the form of his sermon, than it does in the matter of his orutory.

I had laid off to go up to London on purpose to hear him, but unfortunately for my curiosity, about the time I got ready, his sermon, on "The Sovereignty of God in Man's Salvation, and Man's Responsibility," came to hand; and after reading it, I was perfectly satisfied that the author of such a sermon was not worth the trouble and expense of making such a journey—merely to hear him. In that sermon he lays it down, (first) that it is a matter of clear revelation in the Bible that God is sovereign—i. e., irresistible—in the whole work of human salvation; and yet (second) it is equally clearly revealed that every man is responsible; and (third) that he, Spurgeon, has nothing to do in attempting to reconcile these two opposite doctrines—their seeming inconsistency is not chargeable upon him etc, etc.

A man who can believe and preach as a matter of fact and revelation, that God acts only irresistibly in salvation and yet holds man accountable, cannot charm me—at least, to travel a great distance, merely to hear him—charm he never so wisely in other respects. I see by the papers that he is to be in New York during the anniversary week of May next. But we have next

Rev. H. Grattan Guinness.

Whom I both saw and heard for myself, and whose acquaintance I afterwards made. He is a young man, of some twenty-seven years of age, or more; has been, by his own account, a great traveler, and I suspect also, from what he says of himself, has been a pretty wild lark in his day. He is an Independent—not in any congregational union, but is thoroughly Calvinistic in his doctrine. His manner, as compared with the lifeless awkward appearance of ministers in that country generally, is more artistic or theatrical than otherwise. His diction is voluble and his enunciation very distinct. His matter is not at all striking—perhaps hardly more than common-place; and he makes the points of his discourse, according to the subject discussed, just about as other ministers do. He preaches without manuscript or notes—which for that country is rather uncommon—and his clear, rapid, and seemingly earnest manner of speech passes with the multitude for great preaching. I, however, do not by any means consider him a great preacher. I am very confident that I could find several young men in our Conference, who are not yet regarded by us as great preachers, who could preach all round brother H. Grattan Guiness; and some older ones, after whom he would find it difficult to give a good exhortation. I am sure that I do not wish to speak disparagingly of him, nor to be unnecessarily laudatory of others. He is very approachable and talkative in private, and inquisitive to know all he can. He is an Irishman by birth, and spoke strongly of coming to this country soon. But let us now look at the Scotch Preacher.—

Rev. W. McGillivray, D. D.,

Of the Free Church at Gilcomston, Aberdeen—is regarded, I believe, as the Ajax of Presbyterian preachers in the North of Scotland. I made two efforts to hear him. The first, by mistake—led me to hear his brother, Rev. D. Milne, of the same charge in the establishment; and the second enabled me to hear a sermon from him on I. Cor., I. xxx: "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us," etc. He is a man of medium stature, thickly set, light complexion, and on first sight of rather a forbidding countenance. His opening prayer was over half-an-hour in length, and exceedingly dull and tiresome. His exposition of the scripture (they generally give a brief exposition of the scriptures read) was excellent. His text gave him the opportunity of bringing out in full the peculiar and ultra doctrines of Calvinism. The salvation of Christians was all "of God in Christ." Christ was of God; believers were of God in Christ—not of or in themselves; their wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption were all of the sovereign grace and purpose of God; who is not moved thereto by the works, faith, or any other condition on the part of man. His manner was vigorous while delivering his discourse, not confining himself to notes. He spent three-quarters of an hour in exhibiting, explaining and enforcing that man has nothing whatever to do in salvation, is purely passive therein—God being first and last, irresistible; and, while such a doctrine must have been very comfortable and soothing to the saint, living in sloth, ease or sin, yet I could not see well how after such a sermon and doctrine, he could say one word to the sinner; but he, not having the difficulties in my mind before his eyes, and not at all daunted by the vigor of his own oratory or the consequences of his own doctrine just enunciated, turned to the sinner, while just closing his discourse, and for full five minutes poured volley after volley of denunciation upon his resistless and devoted head, because of his sins, that almost startled me. He drew up his body to its fullest height—he clenched his fist and extended his arm, as if aiming for a particular spot—he knit his brows and elevated his voice to its utmost pitch—and seemed as if he would either bruise to death or annihilate the sinner, just there and then; but the sinner did not die so far as I could see—perhaps he lives yet—and the sermon was at an end.

The matter of this discourse is a fair sample of preaching in Scotland—the ruling element in gospel preaching there, being doctrine—while the manner of this man is considerably beyond what is common.

DIVINE AUTHORITY FOR THE USE OF CREEDS.

The first thing which we intend is a brief showing that the use of creeds has a divine warrant. We find this in 2 Tim. 1: 13. "Hold fast the form of sound words which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus." The phrase "form of sound words" must import a summary of Gospel truth. The word rendered "form" has its root in a word which imports to express summarily, or give a faint likeness of—just what is done in a Creed. The word rendered "sound" imports healthy, and when tropically applied, as here, it imports soundness in the faith. It is the word used in this, "That they may be sound in the faith," and in this passage, "That the aged men be temperate, sound in the faith," and in this, "If there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine."

Other examples might be named. Indeed, it would be hardly possible better to express in Greek words our idea of a Creed, than Paul has given it in those words rendered, "form of sound words." Such a summary of the Christian faith, it seems, had been given by Paul to Timothy, was who required to adhere to it. It was not that he was to hold fast the substance of Gospel truth, but that particular form of it—not that he should abide in the habit of sound teaching, but that he should also hold fast the form of sound words. This creed had not been given to him as a divinely authorized form like the Scriptures to rule in all ages. That particular creed was not an inspired document, and, as such, intended to be used by all generations. But that command, given to a minister, to use an uninspired Creed, justifies, by divine authority, the practice of using formularies or confessions of faith. The very purpose for which Creeds are used, shows why one Creed would not answer for all ages. A Creed is used as a visible mark between the truth and error; but error is always shifting its ground. And as the popular errors change, the expression of the documents, which give the landmarks between error and fundamental truth, have need to be changed. And as the subtleties of errorists increase, the guards against those subtleties have need of more detail. What is called the "Apostles' Creed," though completed several centuries after the apostles were dead, sufficed to distinguish Christians from heretics. But the exigencies of later times required the confessions of faith to be made more full and explicit. Here, then, in the very end and use of Creeds, is a reason why no one Creed could have been given in the days of the apostles to serve through all time.

Besides it is not intended that a Creed or Confession of Faith shall be an ultimate standard to which to appeal to decide a matter of faith, as we would appeal to a divinely inspired document. If God had, in addition to the Scriptures, given, by inspiration, a summary of Gospel doctrine, to be used as a summary and symbol of faith, the Scriptures would have gone out of use. Man would have felt that they had the whole of the Gospel doctrines, or, perhaps, a single page in that summary, and that they needed no other inspired Scriptures. Hence such a form of inspired teaching would defeat its own end. So instead of this, God has seen fit to authorize, by inspiration, the practice of constructing out of the Scriptures, summaries of our own, suited to our own times, and changing in form and explicitness to meet the errors of the times.

If we look at the history of the thing, we see that there never has been a living branch of the Church that has maintained an existence for any considerable time, that has not made use of Creeds or Confessions of Faith; and yet there have frequently arisen individuals, and fragments of sects, who have protested against the use of Creeds, as an infringement of Gospel liberty, which, in their view, is the liberty of sowing tares. Indeed, this opposition to Creeds has been a general characteristic of those sects which reject fundamental truths of the Gospel. They have seen that the defence of truth is much facilitated by standing symbols of faith, and that the use of creeds stood much in their way while propagating error. So, from a natural instinct, heresy has decried the use of Creeds. The first indication of heretical tendencies, in those departing from the faith, is often a chafing against Creeds.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.

Three Phases in His Life.

The downfall of Napoleon the First—His escape from Elba in 1815—His second fall and retirement of his family at Rome—Louis Napoleon a boy at his father's table—After a lapse of twenty-one years on trial for his life at Paris—His appearance and demeanor—His imprisonment at Ham—The revolution of February 1848, and downfall of Louis Philippe—Re-appearance of Louis Napoleon as deputy, Prince President, and Emperor—General character of his administration—Unscrupulous violence of the party press under Louis Philippe—His government overturned by leaders who aspired only to supplant his ministers—the Press of the United States.

I remarked in the last number, that "the life of man and the history of nations present few contrasts so striking, in the fortune of individuals or of communities, as that which marks the successive visits of Washington to the Eastern States." As far as the fortune of individuals is concerned, the name, which stands at the head of this article, exhibits a contrast of conditions, at different periods of life, quite equal to that which is presented in the career of Washington. The year 1814 was most a momentous year in the history of modern Europe. The great drama of the French Revolution seemed to have found its catastrophe. Dethroned kings recovered their sceptres; needy emigrants returned to the possession of their titles and the hope of what seemed to stamp with permanence the great political and social restoration, the mighty hero of this world-drama, crushed by the armies of combined Europe, had been banished to a petty islet on the coast of Tuscany. Peace was concluded between the United States and Great Britain at the close of the year, and the temple of Janus was shut.

Such was the state of things when, on the 12th of April 1815, I sailed for Europe in a ship of three hundred and fifty tons, which at that time was thought a large vessel. It was the second which sailed from Boston for England after the peace, a fact sufficiently indicative of the profound torpor into which the foreign commerce of the country had sunk during the war. Intelligence did not reach us from Europe every three days, as it does now. It was six or seven weeks, if I recollect right, after the signature of the treaty of Ghent on Christmas Eve, 1814, before the welcome news reached this country. Between that event and our arrival in Europe a new and most astonishing revolution had taken place. It was announced to us by the pilot, who climbed over the bulwarks of our little vessel off Holyhead, in the rather homely statement that "Boney had broken loose again." The suspicion with which we were inclined to receive this news, was soon removed by the sight of the Liverpool papers, and the certain intelligence that the Continent of Europe was again a-blaze with war.

No one of course could foretell the result for Napoleon or for Europe. Lord Byron, in a conversation which I had with him a few days before the battle of Waterloo, alluding to the conflict which was evidently impending, expressed the opinion that Napoleon would drive the Duke of Wellington. This he said he should be sorry for, as he did not wish his countrymen to be beaten, adding, however, with bitter emphasis, that he would tell me what he did wish to see.—"Lord Castlereagh's head carried on a pike beneath his windows." But in a few days the great Message of Waterloo, (first brought by a clerk of Rothschild, in advance of the Duke of Wellington's courier) arrived from Belgium, and in a few weeks the curtain again falls on the mighty drama, (and this time never more to rise for the principal actor), at St. Helena.

New restorations of fugitive kings, new return of emigrant nobles, new adjustments of the political relations of Europe, and in the final result, the kindred of the fallen hero consigned to private life at Rome. Here it was my good fortune, in the winter of 1817—1818, to become acquainted with the venerable mother of an emperor, three kings and one queen; and with those of her children who were living at Rome, viz.: the ex-King Louis, (the father of the present Emperor of the French;) Lucian, who at an early period of his career lost the favor of his imperial brother; and the Princess Borghese, still one of the most beautiful women of her day, and as amiable as she was beautiful.

In the course of the winter I saw for the first time, at dinner at his father's table, the present Emperor of the French, then a boy of eleven years of age. The party was small, and being very near the ex-King, when we were invited to seat ourselves unceremoniously, I was about to place myself in the chair next him, and, as it happened, on his right hand. With a good-humored smile, as if not wholly in earnest, he requested me to let his son sit there and to accept a seat myself on his left hand. It probably did not enter even into his fond imagination, that the lad for whom he claimed this little remnant of royal deference would one day sit upon the throne of his Uncle. I have no distinct recollections of him in this first phase of his life, but as a handsome, well-behaved youth, with an expression somewhat beyond his years, of mature manners, and as taking little part in the conversation of the dinner table.

Twenty-one years pass, and being on a second visit to Europe in the Summer of 1840, I was present in the gallery of the house of Peers in Paris, when the handsome, well-behaved, quiet boy, with whom I had dined at his father's table in 1819, now grown up to a resolute, aspiring, fearless young man, thirty-two years of age, was on trial for his life, after the miscarriage of the affair at Boulogne. Eight years (I think) before, a similar attempt at Strasbourg had sent him into exile in the United States and England, where he lived without attracting public notice, though doubtless cherishing his visions, which were one day to burst into startling realities for himself and Europe. Nothing had occurred in the twenty-one years to call my attention to him; but when I saw him on trial for his life before the peers of France, I could not, in the extreme peril in which he stood, but recollect with emotion under what different circumstances I had first seen him. His demeanor before his judges was firm, composed, and respectful. The French criminal jurisprudence subjects the prisoner to a severe interrogatory, for a purpose wholly forbidden by our law, that of making him, if guilty, criminate himself. As far as I could judge, the young man answered with frankness the questions propounded to him, and the impression made by him on his judges—certainly the impression on the crowded galleries—was decidedly favorable.

This attempt at the time seemed rash almost to the point of insanity. In conversing with the ex-king of Holland a few months afterwards, then living in the House of Alfieri, at Florence, he expressed the opinion to me, that it was a guet-apens—a snare set for his son by the French police, in order to get the young man into their power. I have, however, since seen it stated, that the attempt was by no means so rash as it seemed; that an understanding had taken place between Louis Napoleon and the regiment stationed at Boulogne; and that a day or two before his landing, in consequence of some vague rumor having reached Paris, that the troops could not be relied upon and that mischief was brewing, another regiment was sent to that city.

The young man's head was spared and he was sent to the fortress of Ham, a prisoner for life. In that confinement unquestionably his character ripened for the empire. His occupations, never frivolous, assumed a severer cast. He studied and wrote on civil engineering, artillery and the political system of his uncle; and escaped from the fortress a more dangerous enemy to the reigning dynasty than he went in. In eight years from his sentence in 1840, the government of Louis Phillippe was overturned, as good a one, probably, as France could bear; though far too bureaucratic for a liberal government, far too mild for a despotism. It promoted the material prosperity of France, but it was neither feared nor loved. After the sad death of the Duke of Orleans, it had no hold upon the army—the sole efficient prop of a French throne. The old nobility affected to despise it, though they accepted its favors—the legitimists hated it—the republican factions swore its downfall—and the mass of the people, who were never more prosperous than under Louis Phillippe, with the fatal apathy of conservative parties, allowed it to sink. It is not certain that anything could have upheld it much longer; for, as was wittily said by one of Louis Phillippe's cabinet, who escaped with him to London, "there are two kinds of government which the French cannot bear—one is Republicanism the other Monarchy." The catastrophe, however, was dimly foreseen, for it was said by the same ex-minister, "We knew we were living on the crust of a volcano, but we did not think it was so thin."

But the volcano burst forth in February, 1848; Louis Phillippe is driven into exile, as Charles X. had been before him; the streets of Paris are piled with barricades and drenched with blood; the Tuileries are sacked, Neuilly is ravaged and the "impossible republic" is inaugurated. Louis Napoleon, enrolled as a special constable with two hundred thousand other citizens of London at the time of the great Chartist demonstration, in April, is elected a member of the ephemeral chamber; his choice as Prince-president soon follows; on the 2d of December, 1852, the quiet lad of 1819, by a coup d'etat, whose unexampled boldness is excelled only by its success, takes possession of the throne of France; and it devolved upon me, in an official capacity, to send to Mr. Rives, the American Minister in Paris, a letter of credence to the government of his Imperial Majesty Napoleon the Third.

In that capacity he has given to France the strongest government—equivalent I fear, in that country, to the best government—which she has had since the downfall of his uncle. He has completed public works, beneath which the magnificent profusion of Louis the fourteenth staggered. He has decorated and improved Paris beyond all his predecessors on the throne, and projected and accomplished the most gigantic undertakings throughout the interior and along the coasts of France. Abroad, he has consolidated the conquest of Algeria—maintained an undoubted superiority for France in the armies of England, associated with hers in the Crimea—formed a firm alliance with Great Britain, against whom his uncle waged an internecine war for twenty years; and has restored his country to her former rank in the politics of Europe. In accomplishing these objects the press has been fettered and the tribune silenced, and those liberties, which the Anglo-Saxon mind regards as the final cause of the political societies of men, have been grievously abridged. But France has yet to show that she is capable of enjoying them in peace.

Happening to be in Paris during the summer of 1840, and in the habit of reading the principal journals, as well those adverse as friendly to the government, I was amazed at the virulence and ferocity with which the political war was carried on. Had the king been a military usurper, instead of a prince succeeding by a species of popular choice to the throne, in the place of one who had forfeited it by violating the Constitution, he could not have been more fiercely assailed, and that by some of the most vigorous pens in France. Had the ministry, instead of holding power on the tenure of parliamentary support, been solely dependent on the will of a despot, they could not have encountered a deadlier opposition. The government was eminently pacific; and as such, it gave France a breathing space after the conflicts and exhaustions of her mighty wars; but it was daily denounced as pusillanimous. The king and his family lavished their vast private possessions on works of public utility and private charity, and were daily libelled as selfish and sordid wretches. When the law was appealed to, for that protection of their personal characters from these outrages, to which the humblest are entitled, triumphant verdicts of acquittal were obtained by the calumniators. The unreflecting mass of the community, in the enjoyment of peace abroad and prosperity at home, were made to believe that they were the most oppressed and insulted of nations. Well aware, from the history of the last eighteen centuries, of the fiery susceptibility of Gallic blood, instead of marvelling at the Revolution of February, 1848, when it burst out, I had for eight years been anticipating it, and predicting it to my friends.

That revolution which extinguished the parliamentary liberties of France—which turned into dreamy nonsense the doctrinarian wisdom of thirty years—and yoked together in one common humiliation, the leaders of the rival factions, was the work of party. I do not mean that there was nothing to blame on the part of the king's government, but on the 23d of February, 1848, the popular leaders thought only of displacing their opponents in the ministry; on the 24th they had overturned the monarchy. On the 24th of February, 1848, they drove out a constitutional king; on the 2d of December, 1852, they were marched to prison under the bayonets of an imperial guard. The statesman who falls at the post of duty commands respect; the politician who imperils the great interests of his country to subvert a rival is a public enemy, and merits no sympathy. If crushed himself by an impartial despotism."

All assumption of unconstitutional power is usurpation, but the government of Louis Napoleon has received the sanction of an overwhelming majority of his subjects. Mr. Berryer, in his late defence of the Count de Montalembert, says that he has seen seventeen governments in France. Of these seventeen governments, those of Louis the sixteenth and Charles the tenth—the two out of the seventeen least respected by the people, and both violently superseded—are the only ones which ruled by a regular constitutional title. It is a fact not generally known, but of which I am well informed, that in overturning the government in 1852, Louis Napoleon did but anticipate a movement of the Chambers against himself. The resolution was formed to arrest and impeach him, and no alternative remained to him but to succumb to the venal demagogues who, under the abused name of constitutional freedom, had brought France to the brink of ruin, or to extinguish them and with them, for the time at least, the liberties of the country.

It is painful to reflect how many eloquent pens and persuasive voices of France are silenced by the censor; but if they did not join in the clamor, (some of them did,) they held their peace, when the madness of party rage, by unremitting assaults on a mild and constitutional government, crushed it under a load of undeserved opprobrium. They have their reward. Would that our beloved country might profit by the example! The press of the United States is vigorous and enterprising, and reaches the heart of the community, far beyond that of any other country. It is, for good or for evil, the most powerful influence that acts on the public mind—the most powerful in itself, and as the channel through which most other influences act. If it could learn that an opponent is not necessarily an unprincipled and selfish adventurer, a traitor, a coward, and a knave; and that our neighbors on an average are about as honest and right-minded as ourselves, it would increase its own power; and the great interests of the country (which languish under the poison of our party bitterness) would be incalculably promoted. Edward Everett, in N. Y. Ledger.

Brooklyn, N. Y., 8th February, 1859.

HON. A. H. STEPHENS.

If you had entered the House this afternoon, you would have seen a large group of intensely interested members near the centre of the hall, surrounding a strange figure, seemingly half boy, and all mummy; his sparse flaxen hair combed down upon a long, narrow head; his sallow, beardless skin resembling shriveled parchment; his gaunt, slekly body swaying to and fro, with his arms sweeping around in short angles; his alto voice, sweet and shrill, like a woman's, pitched to its highest key, and piercing to the remotest corner of the crowded galleries. This is Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, closing the debate on the bill for the admission of Oregon.

This whilom Whig and now strict-construction Democrat, and leader of the slavery propaganda in the House, when sitting at a distance, looks like a boy of eighteen, who has been struggling all his life with relentless chills and fever. As he gets up to address the chair you are surprised at the attitude of the spectre before you, rising nearly six feet from the floor. The tones of his voice rivet your attention. It is not a man's voice, nor a boy's, nor exactly a woman's. You never heard such a voice before. In declamatory passages, when swelled to its full capacity, it sounds like recitative in music; or the wail of the wind in a grove of pines, or, as the long-drawn sentences monotoneously rise and fall, like the hortatory strains of a revival preacher painting the glories of Heaven, and warning from the wrath to come. The gestures, angular, sharp and impetuous, saw the air, dart forward like a rapier, and strike out right and left like a broad sword. In impassioned periods, the bony, clenched fist smites blow after blow on the desk; and the long skinny finger, following the deepest, mournful, and now glowing eye, to some distant object, serves as an exclamation point at the close of a pungent retort, an emphatic assertion or a nervous sentence.

We are thus minute in describing Mr. Stephen's physique, because it is the basis, and a large share of the superstructure, of his reputation in Congress and the country. We have seen members of the diplomatic corps, who did not understand a word of English, sit spell-bound while Stephens was speaking; their gaze riveted by the look, tone and manner of the strange being below. His admirers call him a close reasoner—the ablest in the House. He is no reasoner at all. The argumentative parts of his speeches are nothing but dogmatisms, uttered in lucid language, and with nervous emphasis; mere assumptions of premises, and assertions of conclusions. He studies the subject matter, knows its facts, and so can oft prove his statements by an apt citation, or confuse an opponent by his superior acquaintance with the contemporaneous data or the historical precedents pertaining to the question. But, though he greatly effects reasoning, his speeches show neither the form nor the substance of the therefore, the hence, and the because of real logic. He is a model debater, in that he keeps close to the pending subject; excels in short, sharp statements; views every matter from a narrow, not to say low, stand point; dissects all questions with a thin technical blade; is a bold, bitter, self-willed partizan; exceedingly unfair in his reply when his antagonist has no chance to respond or explain. In fine, conceive a fire without warmth; of a knife cutting to the bone without drawing blood; of a skeleton that shall stand upand talk, having neither flesh, nerves, lungs nor lips, and you can conceive of the matter and manner of a speech from Alexander H. Stephens.

Mr. Stephens has been compared to John Randolph. Except in some peculiarities of look and voice, he is quite unlike the unique orator of Roanoke. He never plays a part, nor affects singularity. Randolph always did, even at the solemn hour when, in the chamber of death, he traced the word "Remorse" on the card of his physician, Dr. Parish. Randolph had an exuberant, wayward fancy, to which he gave rein in his forensic displays. Stephens rarely uses metaphor, either to illustrate or adorn. Randolph revelled in quotations from poets and dramatists, ancient and modern. Stephens never cites anything more classic than Coke and Hansard. Randolph was highly dramatic in diction and delivery, and, at times, his eloquence flowed in a stream beautiful and picturesque as his own Roanoke. Stephens is always terse and pointed, and usually dry and didactic. His valedictory to-day was more ornate than any speech we ever heard him deliver before. As he put on his heavy overcoat at the close, all knew that it was not the affectation of Randolph, mounting a jockey cap at the conclusion of his speeches, but was dictated by a prudent regard for a constitution long shaken by strange maladies.

REJECTING THE REFORMATION.

Austria, Spain, Italy, France, Poland—the offer of the Reformation was made everywhere; and it is curious to see what has become of the nations that would not hear it. In all countries were some that accepted; but in many there were not enough, and the rest, slowly or swiftly, with fatal, difficult Industry, contrived to burn them out. Austria was once full of Protestants; but the hide-bound, Flemish-Spanish Kaiser-element presiding over it, obstinately, for two centuries, kept saying, "No; we, with our dull obstinate Cimburgis under-lip and lazy eyes, with our ponderous Austrian depth of habituality and indolence of intellect, we prefer steady darkness to uncertain new light!"—and all men may see where Austria now is. Spain still more; poor Spain, going about at this time making its pronunciamentos; all the factious attorneys in its little towns assembling to pronounce virtually this, "The old is a lie, then—good Heavens! after we so long tried hard, harder than any nation, to think it a truth—and if it be not rights of man, red republic, and progress of the species, we know not what now to believe or to do; and are as a people stumbling on steep places in the darkness of midnight!" They refused Truth when she came, and now Truth knows nothing of them. All stars and heavenly lights have become veiled to such men; they must now follow terrestrial ignus fatui, and think them stars; that is the doom passed upon them. Italy, too, had Protestants; but Italy killed them; managed to extinguish Protestantism. Italy put up silently with practical lies of all kinds; and shrugging her shoulders, preferred going into dilettantism and the fine arts.

The Italians, instead of the sacred service of fact and performance, did music, painting, and the like—till even that had become impossible for them; and no noble nation, sunk from virtue to vice, ever offered such a spectacle before. He that will prefer dilettantism in this world for his out-fit shall have it; but all the gods will depart from him; and manful veracity, earnestness of purpose, inward depth of soul, shall no more be his. He can, if he like, sing for hire, and probably that is the real goal for him.

But the sharpest-cut example is France; to which we constantly return for illustration. France, with its keen intellect, saw the truth and saw the falsity in these Protestant times; and, with its ardor of generous impulse, was prone enough to adopt the former. France was within a hair's breadth of becoming actually Protestant. But France saw good reasons to massacre Protestantism, and end it in the night of St. Bartholomew, 1572. The celestial apparitor of heaven's chancery, so we may speak, the genius of fact and veracity had left his writ of summons; writ was read, and replied to in this manner. The genius of fact and veracity accordingly withdrew; was staved off, got kept away for two hundred years. But the writ of summons had been served; Heaven's messenger could not stay away forever. No; he returned duly, with accounts run up at compound interest, to the actual hour in 1792; and then there had to be a "Protestantism;" and we know of what kind that was.

[Carlyle's Frederick the Great.]

A PRESIDENTIAL LEVEE.

ALL of our readers, and the small portion of the rest of mankind, have heard of the semi-monthly assemblages at the White House; as only one in a thousand of them have assisted thereat, perhaps a brief description of a levee may be interesting. The White House is white indeed. The free stone of which it is built, as stainless now as when it left the quarry, is so utterly white, that the stranger is fain to poke it with his cane to remove from his mind the impression that he is gazing at one of those palaces of painted wood, so common a few years ago, but now happily superseded by a better taste. The edifice, despite the criticism of travelers, is quite a model of solid elegance—a fair, substantial, appropriate and sufficient residence for the head of the Republic. The grounds which surround it, except a little flower-garden in the rear and a conservatory, are mere lawn and grove, with scarcely an attempt at decoration. The house stands well back from Pennsylvania Avenue, and the rear faces the broad and tranquil Potomac, the river beloved of Washington, with the unfinished monument to his memory in the foreground.

On the evening of a levee, the President's house, which usually stands pale and dim in the evening light, is in a blaze of gas. The grand rooms in the lower story are all brilliantly lighted, and a row of gas-lights in front imparts to the whole the appearance of an illumination. A band of music, the marine-band stationed at Washington, is heard within, giving token of festivity. Carriages in great numbers driven rapidly in, whirl around the semi-circular approach, and, after leaving their hooped and hooded freight, draw up in a line opposite. Throngs of pedestrian democrats are hurrying along the pavement, and pouring in at the great door, which, on these occasions, stands open to all sorts and conditions of people. There is no card nor introduction necessary. All the ladies and a large majority of the gentlemen are in full dress, but, here and there, may be seen a gentleman whose attire shows him to be a member of the Order of Traveling Knights of the Carpet-bag, and who has concluded to drop in upon the President of the United States without going through the aristocratic formalities of blacking his boots, brushing his hair, or buttoning up his coat to conceal the ravages which time and travel have made upon his shirt. But all are made equally welcome—white gloves, and no gloves, the well-shirted, the ill-shirted and the shirtless.

The ante-room, into which the visitors are first ushered, looks, on such occasions, like a second-hand clothing store in the full tide of successful experiment. Here, hats, coats, canes and umbrellas are given into the custody of the colored porters, who receive them on a long counter, giving the requisite checks, and deposit them in rows of boxes, which rise, tier above tier, higher than a man can reach. The bustle, the rows and heaps of clothing, and the counters, all convey the idea that an active traffic in human raiment is going on. At the side, there is a separate apartment where the ladies disengage themselves of their superfluous garments, and bestow upon their loveliness those last, fond, mystic touches, by which they renew that perfect assurance of faith in their charms, which the jolting of a hackney coach is wont to dispel. Thence emerging, they sweep in fluttering majesty, ample in hoop, and radiant with color and expectation, toward the too narrow door of the Reception-room.

Close to that door stands the President, past whom the entire company, in ceaseless procession, marches, each individual shaking hands with the President, and receiving from the President the assurance that he is "glad" to see him. But this is not all. A dry, dead, mechanical shaking of hands will not do. The art of the thing is, to so shake hands and so say, "I am glad to see you," as to actually leave an impression upon every visitor that the President of the United States does, in very truth, experience at the sight of him such lively emotions of joy, that nothing but the pressure of the coming crowd prevents his immediately inviting him into his private room to have a long and affectionate conversation with him upon the glorious Future that lies before us. The Presidential countenance must be clothed in smiles, and must wear those pleasant habiliments all the evening, and he must throw into the grasp of the hand and the agitation of the elbow a certain ecstatic fervor that shall thrill the heart. To do this for a small company is not difficult, but to keep it up from eight P. M. until midnight is a task before which Candidates should pause and reflect, ere it be too late. The present incumbent of the White House, it must be confessed, acquits himself in scenes like this in a masterly manner. With ample proportions and goodly grace, his hair whiter than the driven snow, his immaculate suit of black, and his truly august cravat and shirt-collar, he looks every inch a President, and welcomes the people with imposing urbanity.

Passing by the President, the crowd pours itself into the famous East-room, where it continues to eddy in a grand circle, round, and round, and round the large apartment, conversing and listening to the band, until the throng becomes so dense, that motion is nearly impossible. There are officers in full uniform, ladies in gorgeous array, members of Congress, and every-day Republicans; all mingled together in one compact mass. An hour or two of this is felt to be enough, and gradually the crowd diminishes. The East-room is worthy of its reputation. It is a most superb apartment—superb from its fine proportions and grand size, rather than from any particular splendor of decoration. It is twenty-two feet high, eighty feet long, and forty feet wide. The ceiling is nicely painted, and the walls are covered with an extremely rich golden paper, which shows magnificently when the chandeliers are lighted. A grand effect is given to the room by the carpet, which is woven in one piece, and on a large, beautiful pattern. Of other furniture, there is none, except a few mirrors, chairs and sofas. The entire floor is unobstructed, except by the line of chairs and sofas along the walls. When this East-room is not too full of people, and shows here and there a group of officers and ladies, with some elegant toilettes gracefully disposed on the sofas, the effect is as fine as any interior view can well be, and would alone repay a lover of the picturesque for attending a Presidential levee.

THE SPRING OF THE YEAR.

"Behold, I make all things new"—"Sorrow endureth for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

The land of the South is the land of Love and Song—the land of the Spring, the Sun, and the Summer. While in other regions snow and ice are yet familiar, with us

The blithe and beautiful and blessed spring,
Has come with her wealth of balm and bloom;
All hearts and all voices are tuned to sing
Our glad raisons from the wintry gloom—
With bright spring hours,
And the April showers,
And the laughing flowers,
And the gladsome sun with his gleaming rays;
Birds sing in the grove,
Their music of love—
God smiles from above,
And the heart leaps upward with joy and praise.
Earth responds the smiles of the sky with song;
Nature rejoices from hill to glen;
The gay dancing hours the chorus prolong,
Till evening intones her soft amen:
Then the sweet spring night—
Crowned with star-gems bright,
And the young moon's light—
Sings a pensive hymn to the throne above:
Man rest from their toil,
And the world's turmoil—
And the mystic oil
Of blessing descends from the world of love.

The Redemption has verily followed upon the footsteps of the Fall; and some of the weeds and sunshine of the Garden of Eden are permitted to enrich and beautify the outside earth in spring time. The spring is the real sunrise of the year. Winter is its night, and spring its morning. Calender-makers choose to tell us that the year begins in mid-winter; but God has so plainly distinguished the time of its commencement, that the most illiterate man, and the children, and beasts and birds, and even inanimate nature, understand it, without the help of an almanac.

Some persons seem to enjoy the beauty of autumn more than that of spring. Autumn is full of pensive beauty; but spring is overflowing with joy, as well as beauty. Spring is full of the spirit of life and growth; [illegible] is abundant in evidences of decay. Spring is in sympathy with the hopeful spirit with which we anticipate the future; autumn is akin to the feelings with which we look back over the past: and whatever monuments of joy may survive the past, its path is always strewn with the ruins of the sorrow.

As in human experience, so in the departure of diurnal darkness, and in the rising of the night of winter, it is beautifully true that "sorrow endureth for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." The spring is the transfiguration of the earth and nature. As the hidden glory of divinity beamed out upon the surface of the body of the Redeemer when He was transfigured, so the glories of "the King in His beauty" flow out and adorn the previously bleak and barren world in the return of the spring. The sluggish life-blood of the trees receives a new vitality, and bounds with a quickened pace; the apparently dead buds show signs of life and growth, and the soft green leaves appear; the sweet young grass modestly lifts its head above the cold surface of the ground, and smilingly greets the sun; and the first fair and frail flowers that crown the brow of the earth, like those that bedeck the beauty of a bride, bask in the balmy blessing of the sun-shine.

The spring-time is to physical nature what the baptism of the Holy Ghost is to spiritual nature. As the genial "breath of the Lord" in spring-time imparts new life to all the pulses of inanimate nature—quickens into birth the dormant seeds that lie buried in the earth—brings the blush of health and beauty to the countenance of the world—and enrobes all things in fragrant and glorious attire; so the baptism of the Spirit's love warms into vitality the frozen energies of the soul—develops the germs of spiritual life which the word and grace and providence of God have sown in the heart—adorns the character with "the beauty of holiness"—and clothes both spirit and life with the excellent grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.
